What Freud said to us about the withdrawal of libidinal interest from the external object goes right to the heart of the matter. But we still need to spell out what this might mean. At what level does this withdrawal occur? We very much get the impression that something has profoundly modified the object, but is it enough to attribute this to one of these displacements of libido that we see as central to the mechanisms of the neuroses? What are the levels, the registers, by which we can define these modifications to the character of the other that are always, we very much get the impression, central to the alienation of madness?

Here I shall take the liberty of going back a bit to try to get you to view in a new light certain aspects of phenomena with which you are already familiar. Take a case who is not psychotic, the almost inaugural case for the properly psychoanalytic experience developed by Freud, that of Dora.[1]

105 Dora is a hysteric, and as such she has unusual object relationships. You know the difficulty that the ambiguity surrounding the issue of who her love object really is contributes both to his observations and to the pursuit of the cure. Freud eventually realized his mistake and said that it was undoubtedly as a consequence of having misrecognized Dora's true love object that he caused the whole matter to fail and that the cure was prematurely broken off without allowing a sufficient resolution of what was at issue. You know that Freud was of the opinion that he had detected a relationship of conflict in her due to her finding it impossible to detach herself from her first love object, her father, and move towards a more normal object, namely, another man. Now, the object for Dora was none other than the woman known in this case as Frau K., who was precisely her father's mistress.

Let us start with the case. I shall comment on it afterwards. The history, as you know, is that of a minuet for four characters, Dora, her father, Herr K. and Frau K. Dora in fact uses Herr K. as her ego, in that it is by means of him that she is effectively able to support her relationship with Frau K. I ask you to accept this point and trust me, since I have written enough on this case in an intervention concerning the transference for you to refer to it easily.[2]

It's only Herr K.'s mediation that enables Dora to sustain a bearable relationship. While this mediating fourth person is essential for maintaining the situation, this is not because the object of her affection is of the same sex as herself, but because she has the most profoundly motivated relations of identification and rivalry with her father, further accentuated by the fact that the mother is a person completely obliterated in the parental couple. It is because the triangular relationship is supposed to have been particularly unbearable for her that the situation not only lasted but was effectively supported within the fourfold-group composition.

This is proved by what took place the day Herr K. pronounced that fateful sentence – My wife is nothing to me.[3] Everything then happened as if she had answered him – So, what can you be to me, then? She slapped his face there and then, whereas up until that moment she had maintained with him the ambiguous relationship necessary to preserve the four-person group. This disturbed the equilibrium of the situation.

Dora is only a little hysteric; she doesn't have many symptoms. You recall, I trust, my emphasizing this famous aphonia which occurred only at her moments of tête à tête with, of being confronted with, her love object, and which was definitely linked to a very special erotization of the oral function, 106 withdrawn from its usual employment as soon as Dora got too close to the object of her desire. This is no big deal, and this wouldn't have brought her to see Freud, or made those around her force her to see him. On the contrary, from the moment the fourth character withdrew and broke up the situation, a little syndrome of persecution, quite simply, appeared in Dora with respect to her father.

Until then the situation had been a bit improper, but without going beyond what we might call a Viennese operetta. As all the subsequent observations make clear, Dora behaved admirably in order to avoid any scenes and to ensure that her father had normal relations with the woman – in point of fact, the nature of these relations remains pretty much in the dark. Dora covered up the entire situation and she was on the whole reasonably comfortable with it. But when the situation broke up, she began making demands, she declared that her father wanted to prostitute her and surrender her to Herr K. in exchange for maintaining his ambiguous relations with the latter's wife.

[3] "You know I get nothing out of my wife." SE 7:98.

Am I about to say that Dora is a paranoiac? I have never said this, and I am fairly scrupulous when it comes to diagnosis in psychosis.

I made an effort here last Friday to see a female patient who obviously had behavioral problems, problems of conflict, with other people. I was brought in, in short, to declare that she was psychotic and not, as had at first appeared, an obsessional neurotic. I refused to diagnose her as psychotic for one decisive reason, which was that there were none of those disturbances that are our object of study this year, which are disorders at the level of language. We must insist upon the presence of these disorders before making a diagnosis of psychosis.

A claim against people who are supposedly acting against you is not enough for us to have a psychosis. It may well be an unjustified claim, contributing to a delusion of presumption, this doesn't make it a psychosis. This isn't unrelated to psychosis – there is a small delusion, one could describe it that way. That these phenomena are continuous is common knowledge – people have always known how to define the paranoiac as a touchy, intolerant, and distrustful gentleman, who is in a state of verbalized conflict with his surroundings. But for us to have a psychosis, there must be disturbances of language – this at least is the rule of thumb I suggest you adopt provisionally.

With respect to her father Dora experiences a significant, interpretative, or even hallucinatory phenomenon, but it does not add up to a delusion. This is nevertheless a phenomenon that is on the ineffable, intuitive road towards 107 imputing hostility and bad intentions to others – and concerning a situation the subject has, in a profoundly elective way, actually participated in.

What does this mean? This character's level of otherness becomes modified, and the situation deteriorates owing to the absence of one of the components of the quadrilateral that enabled it to be sustained. Here we can make use of the notion of distantiation, provided we know how to handle it prudently. People use it indiscriminately, but this is no reason to refuse to use it ourselves, provided we give it an application that is in better agreement with the facts.

This takes us to the heart of the problem of narcissism.

What notion of narcissism can we form on the basis of our work? We regard narcissism as the central imaginary relation of interhuman relationships. What crystallized analytic experience around this notion? Above all, its ambiguity. It is in fact an erotic relationship – all erotic identification, all seizing of the other in an image in a relationship of erotic captivation, occurs by way of the narcissistic relation – and it is also the basis of aggressive tension.

Ever since the notion of narcissism entered psychoanalytic theory, the aggressive component has been placed increasingly at the centre of technical preoccupations. But their elucidation has been rudimentary. We have to go further.

This is precisely where the mirror stage is useful. It brings to light the nature of this aggressive relation and what it signifies. If the aggressive relation enters into this formation called the ego, it's because it is constitutive of it, because the ego is already by itself an other, and because it sets itself up in a duality internal to the subject. The ego is this master the subject finds in an other, whose function of mastery he establishes in his own heart. In every relationship with the other, even an erotic one, there is some echo of this relation of exclusion, it's either him or me, because, on the imaginary plane, the human subject is so constituted that the other is always on the point of re-adopting the place of mastery in relation to him, because there is an ego in him that is always in part foreign to him, a master implanted in him over and above his set of tendencies, conduct, instincts, and drives. All I am doing here is putting into words, with a bit more rigor to bring out the paradox, the fact that the drives and the ego are in conflict and that there is a choice 108 that has to be made. It adopts some, it doesn't adopt others, this is what is called the ego's function of synthesis – nobody knows why, given that on the contrary this synthesis never takes place and that one would do better to call it a function of mastery. And where is this master? Inside? Outside? He is always both inside and outside, which is why any purely imaginary equilibrium with the other always bears the mark of a fundamental instability.

Let me make a brief comparison with animal psychology.

We know that animals have a much less complicated life than ours. At least this is what we believe on the basis of what we see and there is enough evidence of this for man to have always used animals as a point of reference. Animals have relations with the other whenever they want to. For them there are two ways of wanting to – first, by eating it, second, by fucking it. This takes place according to what is called a natural rhythm which forms a cycle of instinctual behavior.

Now, it has been possible to bring out the importance of the fundamental role, in the triggering of these cycles, that images play in the relationship animals have with their counterparts. On seeing the silhouette of a predator to which they may be more or less sensitive, chickens and other poultry go berserk. The silhouette provokes reactions of flight, chirping, and cheeping. A slightly different silhouette will produce no reaction. The same goes for the triggering of sexual behavior. It's very easy to deceive both the male and the female stickleback. The dorsal aspect of the stickleback assumes a certain color in one of the partners at the time of parade, which triggers in the other the cycle of behavior finally culminating in their mating.

There is no reason for this borderline I was speaking about between eros and the aggressive relation in man not to exist in animals, and it is brought out clearly, and it is quite possible to make it manifest, even to externalize it, in the stickleback.

The stickleback is in fact territorial. This is particularly important when it comes to the period of parade, which requires a certain amount of space on the more or less grassy river-beds. An actual dance takes place, a sort of nuptial flight, in which the female is initially charmed, then gently induced to surrender herself and set up house in a sort of small tunnel that has been previously built for her. But there is something else again that is not all that well understood, which is that once all this has been accomplished, the male will still find time to dig a lot of little holes about the place.

109 I do not know if you recall the phenomenology of the hole in Being and Nothingness, but you know the importance that Sartre ascribes to it in the psychology of the human being, the bourgeois particularly, amusing himself at the sea-side. Sartre has observed here an essential phenomenon that is close to bordering on one of these artificial manifestations of negativity. Well then, I believe that the male stickleback is no slouch in this matter. He too digs his little holes and impregnates his surroundings with his very own negativity. With these holes one really gets the impression that he is appropriating a certain field within his surroundings and, in effect, there is no question of any other male entering the area thus marked without triggering fight reflexes.

Now, experimenters, full of curiosity, have tried to discover the extension of the said fight reaction, first by varying the distance of the rival's approach, then by replacing this character with a decoy. In both cases they observed that in fact the sinking of these holes, dug during the parade, or even beforehand, is an act essentially tied to the erotic behavior. Should the invader come closer than a certain distance from the area defined as territory, this produces the reaction of attack in the male. If the invader is a bit further off, it is not produced. There is thus a point, a borderline defined by a certain distance, at which the stickleback subject finds itself caught between attacking and not attacking. And what happens then? – this erotic manifestation of negativity, this activity of sexual behavior that consists in digging holes.

In other words, when the male stickleback does not know what to do at the level of his relation with his counterpart of the same sex, when he does not know whether or not to attack, he takes to doing something that he does when he's making love.[4] This displacement, which has not failed to strike ethologists, is in no way peculiar to the stickleback. It is a common occurrence for birds suddenly to cease fighting and for one bird to start madly glossing its wings, just as it would normally do when it is trying to please a female.

It is curious that although he has not participated in my seminars Konrad Lorenz thought it necessary to place a very pretty and enigmatic picture of a male stickleback before a mirror at the front of his book. What is it doing? It is lowering its nose, it's adopting an oblique stance, tail in the air, nose down, a position it only ever adopts when it's going to stick its nose in the sand to dig holes. In other words, it's not indifferent to its own image in the mirror, even if this image does not introduce the whole cycle of erotic behaviour the effect of which would be to produce in the stickleback that borderline reaction between eros and aggressiveness that is indicated by digging holes.

Animals are equally accessible to the enigma of a decoy. The decoy places 110 them in a clearly artificial and ambiguous situation which already contains a derangement and a displacement of behavior. We should not be astonished at this once we have grasped the importance for man of his own specular image.

This image is functionally essential for man, in that it provides him with the orthopedic complement of that native insufficiency, constitutive confusion or disharmony, that is linked to his prematurity at birth. He will never be completely unified precisely because this is brought about in an alienating way, in the form of a foreign image which institutes an original psychical function. The aggressive tension of this either me or the other is entirely integrated into every kind of imaginary functioning in man.

Let us try to picture what consequences follow from the imaginary character of human behavior. This question is itself imaginary, mythical, for the reason that human behavior is never purely and simply reduced to the imaginary relation. Let us imagine for a moment a human being, in a sort of Eden in reverse, entirely reduced to this capture that is both assimilating and dissimulating in his relations with his counterparts. What happens as a result?

By way of illustration, I have already had occasion to refer to the domain of these little animal-like machines that for some time we have been having fun creating. There's of course no resemblance at all, but they contain mechanisms which have been set up for the study of a number of types of behavior which are said to be comparable to types of animal behavior. This is true in one sense, and a part of this behaviour may be studied as something unpredictable, which is interesting because it coincides with conceptions we are able to form of a self-feeding mechanism.

Imagine a machine that has no mechanism for overall self-regulation, so that the organ designed to make the right leg walk was unable to coordinate with the one that makes the left leg walk unless a photo-electric receiver transmits the image of another machine functioning in a coordinated way.

Think of these little automobiles that you see at fairs going round at full tilt out in an open space, where the principal amusement is to bump into the others. If these dodg'em cars give so much pleasure, it is because bumping into one another must be something fundamental in the human being. What would happen if a certain number of little machines like those I describe were 111 put onto the track? Each one being unified and regulated by the sight of another, it is not mathematically impossible to imagine that we would end up with all the little machines accumulated in the center of the track, blocked in a conglomeration the size of which would only be limited by the external resistance of the panelwork. A collision, everything smashed to a pulp.

This is only a fable designed to show you that the ambiguity and the gap in the imaginary relation require something that maintains a relation, a function, and a distance. This is the very meaning of the Oedipus complex.

The Oedipus complex means that the imaginary, in itself an incestuous and conflictual relation, is doomed to conflict and ruin. In order for the human being to be able to establish the most natural of relations, that between male and female, a third party has to intervene, one that is the image of something successful, the model of some harmony. This does not go far enough – there has to be a law, a chain, a symbolic order, the intervention of the order of speech, that is, of the father. Not the natural father, but what is called the father. The order that prevents the collision and explosion of the situation as a whole is founded on the existence of this name of the father.

I emphasize this. The symbolic order has to be conceived as something superimposed, without which no animal life would be possible for this misshapen subject that man is. This, in any case, is how things are given to us today, and everything tends to suggest that it has always been like this. Indeed, whenever we find a skeleton we call it human if it has been placed in a grave. What reason can there be for placing this debris within a stone enclosure? For this to be possible a whole symbolic order must have already been instituted, which entails that the fact that a gentleman has been Mr. So-and-so in the social order requires that this be indicated on his headstone. The fact that he was called Mr. So-and-so extends beyond his living existence. This doesn't presuppose belief in the immortality of the soul, but simply that his name has nothing to do with his living existence, that it extends and perpetuates itself beyond it.

If you do not see that Freud's originality is to have brought this into relief, one wonders what you are doing in analysis. It is only after it has been clearly indicated that this is where the essential source is that a text like the one we are reading can become interesting.

To take what President Schreber presents in its structural phenomenology, you must first off have this schema in your head, which entails that the symbolic order subsists as such outside the subject, as distinct from, determining, his existence. Things bring one to a halt only when one considers them as possible. Otherwise one is happy to say, This is how things are, and one 112 does not even try to see that this is how things are.

The long and remarkable observation that makes up Schreber's Memoirs is no doubt exceptional, but it is certainly not unique. It is probably unique only because President Schreber was in a position to have his book published, although censored, and also because Freud became interested in it.

Now that you have got the function of symbolic articulation into your heads you will be more sensitive to this truly imaginary invasion of subjectivity that Schreber has us observe. There is an altogether striking predominance of the mirror relationship, a notable dissolution of the other qua identity. All the protagonists he talks about – when he does do this, for there is a long period during which he is unable to speak, and we shall return to the meaning of this period – divide into two categories which despite everything are on the same side of a certain border. There are those who are apparently alive and who are free to move about, his guards and his nurses, and who are the fleeting-improvised-men – les ombres d'hommes bâclés à la six-quatre-deux, as Pichon has put it, who is responsible for this translation – and then there are the more important protagonists, who invade Schreber's body, who are the souls, the majority of souls, and the longer this goes on, the more they are ultimately corpses.

The subject himself is only a second copy of his own identity. At a particular moment he has the revelation that the previous year his own death had occurred and that it was announced in the newspapers. Schreber remembers this former colleague as someone more gifted than he. He is an other. But he is nevertheless the same, who remembers the other. This fragmentation of identity brands all Schreber's relations with his counterparts on the imaginary level.[5] At other times he speaks of Flechsig, who is also dead and who has therefore ascended to where only souls exist, insofar as they are human, in a beyond where they are assimilated bit by bit into the grand divine unity, not without having gradually lost their individual characters. Before achieving this they still have to undergo a trial to free them from the impurity of their passions, from what is properly called their desire. There is literally a fragmentation of their identity, and the subject is undoubtedly shocked by this attack upon their personal identity, but this is how it is, I can only bear witness, he says, to things that have been revealed to me. And so we see, throughout 113 this entire history, a fragmented Flechsig, a superior Flechsig, the luminous

[5] See Mem, 73.

Flechsig, and an inferior part that ends up fragmented into between forty and sixty little souls.[6]

I shall pass over many things full of details that I would love you to take enough interest in for us to be able to follow them closely. Concerning his style, and its great strength of affirmation, typical of delusional discourse, we cannot but be struck by its convergence with the notion that the imaginary identity of the other has a profound relation to the possibility of fragmentation and segmentation. That the other is structurally multipliable and divisible is clearly manifested here in this delusion.

There is also the telescoping of these images inside one another. On the one hand one finds multiple identities of the one same character, on the other there are these little enigmatic identities, variously piercing and harmful inside him, that, for example, he calls little men. This fantasmatic has often struck the imagination of psychoanalysts, who have sought to discover whether they are children, or spermatozoa, or something else. Why couldn't they just be little men?

These identities, which in relation to his own identity have the value of an instance,[7] penetrate, inhabit, and divide Schreber himself. The notion he has of these images suggests to him that they are getting thinner and thinner, becoming reabsorbed in some way by Schreber's own resistance. They maintain themselves in their autonomy, which moreover means that they can continue to harm him, only through realizing the operation that he calls the tying-to-celestial-bodies,[8] a notion he would not have without the fundamental language.

This is not just the soil, these bodies are also the planetary bodies, the astral bodies. You can see this register which, in my little magic square of the other day, I was calling that of the heavenly bodies. I didn't invent it for the occasion; I have been speaking for a long time of the function of heavenly bodies in human reality. It is clearly not for nothing that always, and in all cultures, the names given to the constellations play an essential role in establishing a certain number of fundamental symbolic relationships, which become increasingly evident as we find ourselves in the presence of a more primitive culture, as we say.

A soul fragment thus ties itself on somewhere. Cassiopeia, the brothers of Cassiopeia, play a major role here.[9] In no way is this an idea pulled out of the air – it is the name of a student confederation from the time of Schreber's 114 studies. An attachment to such a fraternity, whose narcissistic, even homosexual, character is brought out in the analysis, is moreover a characteristic mark of Schreber's imaginary antecedents.

It is suggestive to see how this network, which is symbolic by nature and maintains the image in a degree of stability in interhuman relationships, is necessary so that everything doesn't suddenly reduce to nothing, so that the entire veil of the imaginary relation does not suddenly draw back and disappear in the yawning blackness that Schreber was not so very far away from at the outset.

Psychoanalysts have caviled, employing all sorts of details, over what meaning, from the point of view of the subject's libidinal investments, the fact might have that at one stage it's Flechsig who dominates, at another it's a divine image, which is variously located in the realms of God, since God has his realms too – there is an anterior and a posterior realm. You can imagine how analysts have fiddled around with that. Of course, these phenomena are not incapable of being given a number of interpretations. But there is a register that outweighs them all, and that doesn't seem to have caught anyone's attention – as rich and amusing as this fantasmagoria is, as supple, also, in that we have located in it the various objects of the little analytic game, there are extremely nuanced auditory phenomena all throughout Schreber's delusion.

These range from low whispers to the voice of waters[10] when at night he encounters Ahriman. He subsequently corrects himself by the way – Ahriman wasn't the only one present, Ormuzd must have been there also, since the gods of good and evil are inseparable.[11] Thus he has a momentary encounter with Ahriman when he sees him with his mind's eye and not, as with some of his other visions, with a photographic clarity. He comes face to face with this God, who says the significant word to him, the one that puts all things in their place, the divine message par excellence. He says to Schreber, the only man remaining after the twilight of the world – Wretch.[12]

This translation is perhaps not exactly equivalent to the German word Luder. Charogne is the word the French translation uses, but the word is more informal in German than it is in French. In French it is rare to call your friends charogne, carrion, except at particularly exuberant moments. The German word does not just convey this element of annihilation, there are undercurrents that make it more akin to a word that would be more in the style of the feminization of the person, more frequently encountered in conversations between friends, that of being rotten, sweet rottenness [douce pourriture]. The important thing is that this word which dominates his unique face-to-face 115 encounter with God is not at all isolated. Insults are very frequent in the divine partner's relations with Schreber, as in an erotic relationship that one initially refuses to take part in and resists. This is the other face, the counterpart, of the imaginary world. The annihilating insult is a culminating point, it is one of the peaks of the speech act.

Around this peak all the mountain chains of the verbal field are laid out for you in a masterly perspective by Schreber. Everything that a linguist could imagine as decompositions of the function of language is encountered in what Schreber experiences, which he differentiates with a lightness of touch, in nuances that leave nothing to be desired as to their information.

When he speaks to us about things that belong to the fundamental language and bring order to the relationships he has with the one and only being that henceforth exists for him, he divides them into two categories. There is on the one hand what is echt, an almost untranslatable word, which means authentic, true, and which is always given to him in verbal forms worthy of our attention – there are several species of these, and they are very suggestive. There is on the other hand what is learned by rote, inculcated into a number of the peripheral, even fallen, elements of the divine power, and repeated with a total absence of sense, uniquely as a refrain. Added to this there is an extraordinary variety of modes of oratory flux which enable us to see in isolation the various dimensions in which the phenomenon of the sentence – I am not saying the phenomenon of meaning – unfolds.

Here we go to the heart of the function of the sentence in itself, insofar as it does not necessarily carry its meaning with it. I am thinking of this phenomenon of sentences that emerge in his asubjectivity as interrupted, leaving the sense in suspense. A sentence interrupted in the middle is auditivated.[13] The rest is implied meaning. The interruption evokes a fall which, while it may be indeterminate over a wide range, cannot be just any old one. Here the symbolic chain is emphasized in its dimension of continuity.

Here, both in the subject's relation to language and in the imaginary world, there is a danger, which he is constantly aware of, that all this fantasmagoria might be reduced to a unity which doesn't annihilate his existence, but God's, which is essentially language. Schreber states this explicitly – the rays must speak.[14] It is at all times necessary to produce diversionary phenomena so that God is not absorbed back into the central existence of the subject. This isn't self-evident but well illustrates the creator's relationship to what he creates. The withdrawal of his function and his essence effectively allows the corresponding nothing that is his lining to appear.

Either speech is produced or it isn't. If it is, it is to a certain extent pro- 116 duced at the discretion of the subject. Hence the subject is here the creator, but he is also attached to the other, not as object, image, or shadow of an object, but to the other in his essential dimension which is always more or less passed over by us, to this other who is irreducible to anything other than the notion of another subject, that is, to the other qua he. What characterizes Schreber's world is that this he is lost, and only the you remains.

The notion of subject is correlative to the existence of someone of whom I think – It's he who did that! Not him, whom I see here, who of course has such an air of innocence, but him, the one who isn't here. This he is the guarantor of my being, without this he my being could not even be an I. The drama of the relationship with the he underlies the entire dissolution of Schreber's world, where we see the he reduced to a single partner, this God who is asexual and polysexual at one and the same time, englobing all that still exists in the world Schreber is confronted with.

To be sure, owing to this God there subsists someone able to speak true speech, but this speech has the property of always being enigmatic. This is characteristic of all speech in the fundamental language.

Moreover, this God also appears to be Schreber's shadow. He is tainted by an imaginary degradation of otherness, and as a result he is, like Schreber, stricken with a sort of feminization.

In any case, since we don't know Schreber the subject, we have to study him via the phenomenology of his language. It is therefore around the phenomenon of language, around the more or less hallucinated, parasitic, foreign, intuitive, and persecutory phenomena of language at issue in the case of Schreber, that we are going to shed light on a new dimension in the phenomenology of the psychoses.

We could, all the same, end up making a start on Schreber's text together, because the Schreber case for us is also Schreber's text.

This year I'm trying to gain a better conception of the economy of the case. You must have some sense of the shift that is slowly taking place in psychoanalytic conceptions. The other day I reminded you that Freud's explanation, briefly put, is that the patient enters an essentially narcissistic economy. This is a very rich idea, all the consequences of which should be drawn out, except nobody ever does, and one forgets what narcissism is at the point in his work Freud has got to when he writes the Schreber case. Consequently, nobody has a clear idea, either, how novel this explanation is, that is, of what other explanation it is to be situated in relation to.

I shall return to one of the authors who have spoken in the greatest detail about the question of the psychoses, namely, Katan. He emphasizes the notion of defense. But I don't want to proceed by means of commentaries on commentaries. We have to start with the book, as Freud recommends.

Since we are psychiatrists, or at least people who are in various ways familiar with psychiatry, it's quite natural that to get an idea of what is taking place in this case we should also read with the eyes of psychiatrists.

We must not forget the stages in the introduction of the notion of narcissism
118 in Freud's thought. The word defense is used today to refer to anything and everything, in the belief that one is repeating something with a long history in Freud's work. It's quite true that the notion of defense plays a role very early on and that from 1894–95 onwards Freud proposes the expression neuropsychoses of defense. But he uses this term in a quite specific sense.

When he speaks of Abwehrhysterie, he distinguishes it from two other types of hysteria, and this is the first attempt to carry out a properly psychoanalytic nosography. Look at the article I'm alluding to.[1] According to Breuer hysterias have to be thought of as a secondary production of hypnoid states, dependent on a certain fertile moment which corresponds to a disturbance of consciousness in the hypnoid state. Freud doesn't deny that there are hypnoid states, he simply says – We are not interested in this, we don't take this to be a differential feature in our nosology.[2]

One has to understand what one is doing when one classifies. You begin by counting the number of what appear to be the colored organs of a flower, which are called petals. It's always the same, a flower presents a certain number of units that can be counted – this is a very rudimentary botany. Later, you sometimes notice that the uninformed person's petals are not petals at all, but sepals, which don't have the same function. Likewise, in what concerns us, various registers – anatomical, genetic, embryological, physiological, functional – may enter into consideration and intersect with one another. For the classification to be significant it has to be a natural one. How are we to look for what is natural?

Thus Freud didn't reject hypnoid states, he said he would not take them into account because when he was initially working things out what was important to him in the register of analytic experience was something else, namely the memory of trauma. This is what the notion of Abwehrhysterie consists in.

The first time the notion of defense appears we are in the register of memory and its disturbances. The important thing is what may be called the patient's little story. Is he able to articulate it verbally or not? Anna O. – whose portrait on a postage stamp someone brought along for me, for she was the Queen of social workers – called this the talking cure.[3]

Die Abwehrhysterie is hysteria in which things are expressed in symptoms and the discourse has to be freed. There is therefore no trace of regression, or of the theory of instincts, and yet all of psychoanalysis is already present.

Freud distinguishes yet a third species of hysteria, characteristic of which 119 is that there is also something to recount, but which is recounted nowhere. Of course, at this stage of his theorizing, it would be astonishing indeed should he tell us where this might be, but it's already sketched out perfectly well.

Freud's work is full of these prefigurations [pierres d'attente], and it delights me. Whenever one takes up an article of Freud's, not only is it never what one expects, but it's never anything other than very simple and admirably clear. And yet, there is not one of them that is not nourished by these enigmatic prefigurations. It can be said that he alone, in his own lifetime, brought out the original concepts necessary for attacking and organizing the new field he was discovering. He gives us each of these concepts accompanied by a world of questions. What's so good in Freud is that he doesn't hide these questions from us. Each of these texts is a problematic text, such that to read Freud is to open these questions up again.

We always have to come back to disturbances of memory to know what the point of departure for psychoanalysis was. Even if we assume that we have gone beyond this, we have to assess the road travelled, and it would be quite astonishing indeed should we be able to allow ourselves to misrecognize history. I don't have to follow in detail the road covered between this stage and that at which Freud introduced the regression of instincts. I have done enough in previous years for me now to say simply that it's through exploring disturbances of memory, through wanting to repair the void presented by the subject's history, and through tracking down what the events of his life have become, that we have ascertained that they will lodge themselves where one does not expect them to.

I spoke last time about displacements of behavior – one realizes that it can't simply be a matter of rediscovering the mnemic, chronological localization of events, of restoring a piece of lost time, but that things also take place on the topographical level. The distinction in regression between entirely different registers is implicit here. In other words, what is constantly being forgotten is that it's not the case that if one thing comes to the fore another loses its price, its value, within topographical regression. It's here that events acquire their fundamental behavioral meaning.

And this is when narcissism was discovered. Freud realized that there are modifications to the imaginary structure of the world and that they interfere with modifications to the symbolic structure – this is really how it has to be described, since remembering necessarily takes place within the symbolic order.

120 When Freud explains delusion by a narcissistic regression of libido, with this withdrawal from objects ending in a disobjectualization, this means, at the point he has attained, that the desire that is to be recognized in delusion is situated on a completely different level from the desire that has to make itself recognized in neurosis.

If one doesn't understand this, one will completely fail to see what differentiates psychosis from neurosis. Why should it be so difficult in psychosis to restore the subject's relation to reality, when the delusion is in principle entirely legible? This, at least, is what can be read in some passages in Freud, which you have to know how to emphasize in a less summary way than is usual. Delusions are indeed legible, but they are also transcribed into another register. In neurosis, one always remains inside the symbolic order, with this duality of signifier and signified that Freud translates as the neurotic compromise. Delusions occur in a completely different register. They are legible, but there is no way out. How does this come about? This is the economic problem that remains open at the time Freud completes the Schreber case.

I'm making some large claims. In the case of the neuroses the repressed reappears in loco where it was repressed, that is, in the very midst of symbols, insofar as man as agent and actor integrates himself into them and participates in them. The repressed reappears in loco beneath a mask. The repressed in psychosis, if we know how to read Freud, reappears in another place, in altero, in the imaginary, without a mask. This is quite clear, it's neither new nor heterodox, it just has to be appreciated that this is the main point. This is far from being a settled issue at the time Freud puts the last full stop to his Schreber study. On the contrary, this is where the difficulties begin to appear.

Others have tried to pick up where Freud left off. Read Katan for example, who tries to give us an analytic theory of schizophrenia in volume five of the collection, Psychoanalysis of the Child.[4] Read it and you will see very clearly the path that analytic theory has taken.

In Freud the question of the subject's center always remains open. In the analysis of paranoia, for example, he proceeds step by step to show the evolution of an essentially libidinal disturbance, a complex play of an aggregate of transferable, transmutable desires, which may regress, and the center of this entire dialectic is still problematic for us. Now, the turn that took place in analysis at around the time of Freud's death led to the rediscovery of this good old ever-lasting center, the ego at the controls, guiding defense. Psychosis is no longer interpreted on the basis of the complex economy of the dynamics of the drives, but on the basis of procedures used by the ego to escape from various requirements, to defend itself against the drives. The 121 ego again becomes not only the center but the cause of the disorder.

Henceforth the term defense makes no more sense than does talk of defending oneself against temptation, and the entire dynamics of the Schreber case are explained to us on the basis of the ego's efforts to escape from a so-called homosexual drive threatening its completeness. Castration no longer has any other symbolic meaning than that of a loss of physical integrity. We are solemnly told that the ego, which is not yet strong enough to establish points of attachment in the external milieu in order to exercise its defense against the drives in the id, finds another resource, that is, it foments this neo-production we call a hallucination, which is another way of acting and transforming its dual instincts – sublimation, in its own way, but with serious drawbacks.

The narrowing of perspective, the clinical inadequacies of this construction, are self-evident. That there exists an imaginary way of satisfying the thrust[5] of need is an explicit notion in Freudian theory, but it's only ever taken as one of the elements that occasion the phenomena. Freud never defined hallucinatory psychosis on the simple model of fantasy, like hunger which can be satisfied by a dream of satisfaction of hunger. A delusion in no way serves such an end. It is always pleasing to rediscover what one has previously pictured to oneself, and Freud even teaches us that this is the path that the creation of the world of human objects takes. We, too, always experience great satisfaction in rediscovering certain neurotic symbolic themes in psychosis. There is nothing illegitimate in this, but one really must recognize that it only covers a tiny bit of the picture.

For Schreber, as for homosexuals, it's possible to summarize the imaginary transformation of the homosexual thrust into a delusion that makes the subject the wife of God, the repository of good will and divine good manners. This summary is fairly convincing, and all sorts of refined modulations can be found to justify it in the text itself. Similarly, the distinction I drew last time between the realization of repressed desire on the symbolic level in neurosis and on the imaginary level in psychosis is already fairly satisfactory, but it doesn't satisfy us. Why not? Because this isn't all there is to psychosis, which isn't the development of an imaginary, fantasmatic relationship with the external world.

Today I would simply like to get you to see how massive the phenomenon is.

Does the entire delusion consist of the dialogue of this unique Schreber, who, with his enigmatic partner, the Schreberian God, is the starting point 122 for the regeneration of humanity through the birth of a new Schreberian generation? No, it doesn't. Not only is this not the whole delusion, but it's quite impossible to understand it entirely at this level. It's rather curious that in only retaining what is clear in the imaginary events, people happily accept such a partial explanation of a massive phenomenon like psychosis. If we wish to make any progress in understanding psychosis, we must develop a theory that justifies the bulk of these phenomena, several samples of which I shall give you this morning.

We shall begin at the end and attempt to understand by working backwards. If I adopt this course, it's not simply contrived for the presentation but also suits the matter at hand.

Here you have a subject who was ill from 1883 to 1884, who then had eight years respite and, at the end of the ninth year after the start of the first crisis, in October 1893, things in his pathology began again. He entered the same clinic directed by Dr. Flechsig in which he had been treated on the first occasion, and he remained there till mid June 1894.[6] His state was complex. The clinical aspect of it may be characterized as a hallucinatory confusion or even a hallucinatory stupor. Later on he was to give a no doubt distorted report of all that he had lived through. We speak of confusion to characterize his hazy recollection of certain episodes, but other elements, and specially his delusional relations with various people about him, remained sufficiently intact for him to be able to give valuable testimony about them. This is nevertheless the most obscure period of the psychosis. Take note that it's only via his delusion that we know anything about it, since we weren't there either and the medical certificates on this first period are not rich. Schreber certainly recalled it well enough at the time he started to give testimony to be able to draw distinctions here, and in particular to be able to pick out a displacement of the center of interest onto his personal relations with what he calls souls.

Souls aren't human beings, nor are they these shadows he has dealings with. They are dead human beings with whom he has special relations, connected with all sorts of feelings of bodily transformation, of being enclosed, 123 of intrusion, and of exchanges of bodies. This is a delusion in which an element of pain plays a very important role. I'm not speaking of hypochondria, which is in any case too vague a term in our vocabulary, I'm sketching the outline.

From the phenomenological point of view, and remaining cautious, we can admit that there is a state here that can be described as the twilight of the world. He is no longer amongst real beings – this being no longer amongst is typical, for he is amongst other much more burdensome elements. Suffering is the dominant strain in his relations with them, which involve the loss of his autonomy. This profound, intolerable disturbance of his existence motivates in him all sorts of behaviour of which he can only give us a hazy indication, but of which we get an indication by the way he is treated – he is placed under surveillance, at night he is placed in a cell, and he is deprived of all implements. At this moment he appears to be a patient in a very seriously acute state.

There is a moment of transformation, he tells us, around February–March 1894.[7] The so-called posterior realms of God take the place of the souls with which he has had dealings of the order of intrusions or somatic fragmentations. There is a metaphorical intuition here of what lies behind appearances.

[7] Mem, 44 & chap. 7, 81ff.

These realms appear in two forms, Ormuzd and Ahriman. The pure rays also appear, behaving quite differently from the so-called tested souls, which are impure rays. Schreber refers to the profound perplexity he is left in by the effects of this apparent purity, which can only be attributed to a divine intention. They are constantly disturbed by elements arising from the tested souls, which play all sorts of tricks on the pure rays and place themselves between Schreber and their beneficial action. The tactics of the majority of these souls, motivated by very evil intentions indeed, are very precisely described – and notably those of the ringleader, Flechsig, who fragments his soul in order to redistribute the pieces in the hyperspace located between Schreber and the distant God in question.[8] I am he who is distant, we find this formula which has a Biblical echo in a footnote in which Schreber tells us what God has confided in him. God for Schreber isn't he who is, but he who is . . . a long way away.[9]

The pure rays speak, they are essentially speaking rays. There is an equivalence between the speaking rays, the nerves of God, plus all the particular forms they are capable of adopting, including their variously miracled forms, such as the scissors. This corresponds to a period during which what Schre-124 ber calls the Grundsprache dominates, a sort of extremely vigorous High German with a tendency to express itself in euphemisms and antiphrases – a punishment for example is called a reward, and in fact punishment is a reward in its own way.[10] We shall have to return to the style of this fundamental language, so as to address again the problem of the opposite meaning of primitive words.

On this subject there remains a gross misunderstanding over what was said by Freud, who simply made the mistake of taking as his reference a linguist who was regarded as a bit advanced, but had put his finger on something correct, namely Abel. Last year M. Benveniste gave us a very valuable contribution on this, namely that it is out of the question that in a signifying system any word should designate two contradictory things at the same time. Words are made precisely for distinguishing between things. Where words exist, they are necessarily made from pairs of contraries, they are unable in themselves to join two extremes together. When we move on to meaning, it's a different matter. There is nothing astonishing in calling a deep well altus because, he says, from the mental starting point of Latin this starts from the bottom of the well. We only have to reflect that in German the Last Judgment is called das Jüngste Gericht, that is, the youngest judgment, which is not the image employed in France. And yet we do say, votre petit dernier, your little last one, to refer to the youngest. But the Last Judgment rather suggests old age for us.

[9] Mem, 252 & n.101.
[10] Mem, 12–13.

In 1894 Schreber was transported to Dr. Pierson's mental home in Coswig, where he stayed for a fortnight. This was a private mental home, and the description he gives of it shows it to be, if I may say, extremely amusing. You will recognize, from the patient's point of view, features that will not fail to delight those who have retained something of their sense of humor. It's not that it's bad, it's agreeable enough and has that aspect of the good public face of the private mental home with its character of profound neglect, about which we are spared nothing. Schreber didn't stay there long, and he was sent to the asylum in Pirna, the oldest, in the venerable sense of the word, in Germany.

Before his first illness he had been at Chemnitz, he was appointed to Leipzig, then in Dresden he was appointed President of the Court of Appeal just before his relapse. From Dresden he went to Leipzig for treatment. Coswig is located somewhere on the other side of the Elbe from Leipzig, but the place in which he spent ten years of his life is upstream on the Elbe.

When he was admitted at Pirna he was still very ill, and he only began writing his Memoirs in 1897–98. Given that he was in a public asylum, and that it's not unknown for decisions to be a bit slow there, from 1896 to 1898 125
he was still being placed at night in a so-called cell for dements, taking with him a pencil and some pieces of paper in a little tin-plate container, and he started to write down a few notes which he called his little studies.[11] There are in fact, over and above the work he has left us, fifty-odd small studies he refers to from time to time, which are notes he took at the time and used as his material. It's obvious that this text, which was not started before 1898 and not completed before 1903, when Schreber was released, since it includes his court case, bears witness in a more certain, more assured, manner to the terminal state of his illness. As for the rest, we don't even know when Schreber died, but only that he had a relapse in 1907 and that he was again admitted to a mental home – which is very important.[12]

We shall start at the date at which he wrote his Memoirs. What he is able to give evidence of at that date is already quite problematic enough to be of interest to us. Even if we don't resolve the problem of the economic function of what I called just now the phenomena of verbal alienation – let's provisionally call them verbal hallucinations – we are interested in what is distinctive about the analytic viewpoint in the analysis of a psychosis.

We are all disillusioned with the prevailing psychiatric point of view.

As far as a real understanding of the economy of the psychoses is concerned, we can now read a report on catatonia written around 1903 – carry out this experiment yourselves, naturally take a good study – not one step forward in the analysis of the phenomena has been made. If there is something that is distinctive about the analyst's point of view, is it to wonder, on the subject of a verbal hallucination, whether the subject hears a little bit, or a great deal, or whether it's very loud, or whether it explodes, or whether he really does hear it with his ear, or whether it comes from within, from the heart, or from the stomach?

These extremely interesting questions arise from the fact, fairly infantile in the final analysis, that we are flabbergasted that a subject should hear things that we don't. As if we don't, all of us, all of the time, have visions, as if we are never in the grip of phrases that just pop into our heads, sometimes 126 brilliant, illuminating phrases that orientate us. Obviously, we don't put them to the same use as the psychotic does.

These things take place in the verbal order, and the subject experiences them as being received by him. If, as we were taught to be at school, we are interested above all else in the question of whether it's a sensation, a perception, an apperception, or an interpretation, if in short we cleave to the elementary relation to reality in the scholarly academic register, by putting our faith in a clearly incomplete theory of knowledge, we shall lose all its value. Besides, contrary to a theory that moves from the level of sensation through that of perception to that of causation and the organization of the real, philosophy has for some time now, at least since Kant, been attempting in no uncertain terms to bring to our attention that there are different fields of reality and that the problems are expressed, organized, and raised in registers that are equally different. Consequently, the most interesting question perhaps isn't whether the speech is heard or not.

This still leaves us up in the air. What do our subjects give us three-quarters of the time? Nothing other than what we are getting them to do in suggesting to them that they reply to us. We introduce distinctions and categories which interest us, not them, into what they experience. The imposed, external character of the verbal hallucination needs to be taken into consideration on the basis of the way the patient reacts. It's not what he hears the best – as one says, in the sense in which one thinks that hearing is hearing with one's ears – that strikes him the most. Extremely vivid hallucinations remain hallucinations, recognized as such, while others that are on the contrary no less vivid endophasically are of the most decisive character for the subject and give him certainty.

The distinction I introduced at the beginning of our course between certainty and reality is what counts. It introduces us to differences which, to our mind, as analysts, are not superstructural but structural. It's a fact that this can be the case for us alone, because contrary to all other clinicians we know that speech is always there, whether articulated or not, present in an articulated state, already historicized, already caught in the network of symbolic couples and oppositions.

Some imagine that we have to totally restore the undifferentiated lived experience of the subject, the succession of images projected onto the screen of his lived experience, in order to grasp it qua duration, à la Bergson. What we apprehend clinically is never like this. The continuity in everything a subject has lived through since birth tends never to emerge and doesn't interest us in the slightest. What interests us are the decisive moments of symbolic 127 articulation, of history, but in the sense in which we say the History of France.

One day Mlle de Montpensier was at the barricades. She was there perhaps by chance, and perhaps this was of no importance from a certain point of view, but what is certain is that this is all that remains in History. She was there, and a meaning, whether true or not, has been given to her presence there.[13] Besides, the meaning is always a bit more true at the time, but it's what has become true in history that counts and operates. Either this comes about through a later reworking, or else it has already begun to be articulated at the time itself.

Well then, what we call the sense of reality [le sentiment de réalité] where the restoration of memories is concerned is something ambiguous, which consists essentially in the fact that a recollection – that is, a resurgence of an impression – is organized in historical continuity. Neither provides the mark of reality, both of them are required, a certain way of combining the two registers. I shall go even further – it's equally a certain mode of combining these two registers that gives the sense of unreality. Within this field whatever is a sense of reality is a sense of unreality. The sense of unreality is present only as a signal that being in reality is at issue and that one is a hair's breadth from some little thing that is still lacking. We could describe the sense of déjà vu, which has been such a problem for psychologists, as a homonym – it's always a symbolic key that half-opens the mainspring. Déjà vu occurs when a situation is lived through with a full symbolic meaning which reproduces a homologous symbolic situation that has been previously lived through but forgotten, and which is lived through again without the subject's understanding it in all its detail. This is what gives the subject the impression that he has already seen the context, the scene, of the present moment. Déjà vu is a phenomenon extremely close to what analytic experience offers to us as the déjà raconté, the already recounted – except that it is its inverse. This is not situated in the order of the already recounted, but in that of the never recounted. But it's the same register.

If we admit the existence of the unconscious as Freud elaborates it, we have to suppose that this sentence, this symbolic construction, covers all human lived experience like a web, that it's always there, more or less latent, and that it's one of the necessary elements of human adaptation. The fact that this may happen without one's knowledge might have been described as outlandish for a long time, but for us this isn't so – the very idea of an unconscious thought, this great practical paradox that Freud gave, means nothing 128 else. When Freud formulated the term unconscious thought, adding sit venia verbo in his Traumdeutung, he was saying nothing other than that thought means the thing articulated in language.[14] At the level of the Traumdeutung there is no other interpretation of the term than this.

We could call this language internal, but this adjective already falsifies everything. This so-called internal monologue is entirely continuous with the external dialogue, and indeed this is why we can say that the unconscious is also the discourse of the Other. While there is indeed something of the order of continuity, it's not present at every instant. Here, too, one must begin to say what one means, move in the direction in which one is moving, and at the same time know how to correct it. There are properly symbolic laws of intervals, of suspension, and of resolution, there are suspensions and scansions that mark the structure of every calculation, the effect of which is that it's precisely not in a continuous manner that this internal sentence, let's say, gets registered. This structure, which is already attached to ordinary possibilities, is the very structure, or inertia, of language.

For man it is precisely a question of knowing how to get by in the face of this continuous modulation without becoming too preoccupied by it. This is why things work out in such a way that his consciousness shies away from it. However, to admit the existence of the unconscious is to say that even if consciousness shies away from it, the modulation I'm talking about, the sentence in all its complexity, continues regardless. There is no other sense than this to give to the Freudian unconscious. If this is not what it is, then it's a six-legged, absolutely incomprehensible monster – incomprehensible in any case from the perspective of analysis.

Since we are looking for the functions of the ego as such, let me say that one of its tasks is precisely not to become poisoned by this sentence that always continues circulating and seeks only to re-emerge in a thousand more or less camouflaged and disturbing forms. In other words, the sentence of the Gospels, They have ears so as not to hear, is to be taken literally. It's a function of the ego that we do not have to perpetually listen to this articulation that organizes our actions like spoken actions. This isn't drawn from the analysis of psychosis, it's only making evident, once again, the postulates of the Freudian notion of the unconscious.

In these phenomena – let's provisionally call them teratological – of the psychoses, this is out in the open. I'm not making this the essential characteristic, any more than a while ago I was making the imaginary element the essential characteristic, but it's too often ignored that in cases of psychosis we see this sentence, this monologue, this internal discourse I was speaking to you about, reveal itself in the most highly articulated manner. We are the first to be able to grasp this because, to a certain extent, we are already prepared to hear it.

Henceforth, we have no reason to refuse to recognize his voices when the 129 subject testifies that they are something that forms a part of the very text of his lived experience.

Reading of the Memoirs, pp. 308–12.

This is what the subject tells us in a retrospective addition to his Memoirs. He metaphorically refers the slowing down of sentences over the years to the vast distance to which the rays of God have withdrawn. Not only is there a slowing down but also a delay, a suspension, an adjournment. It's highly significant for us that the very phenomenology under which the seamless web of the accompanying discourse presents itself changes and evolves over the years, and that the very full sense at the beginning subsequently empties itself of its sense. Moreover, the voices also make extremely curious commentaries, like this for instance – All nonsense cancels itself out.[15]

The structure of what happens is worth noting. Let me give you an example. He hears – Lacking now is . . . and then the sentence is interrupted, he hears nothing more. We only have his word for it, but for him this sentence has the implicit meaning of – Lacking now is the leading thought.[16] In an interrupted sentence, as such always subtly articulated grammatically, meaning is present in two ways – as anticipated on the one hand, since it's a question of its suspension, and as repeated on the other, since he invariably refers it to an impression of having already heard it.

When one enters into the analysis of language, it's important also to take some interest in the history of language. Language isn't as natural a thing as all that, and the expressions that appear to us to be self-evident can be ranked according to whether they are more or less grounded.

The voices that preoccupy Schreber with their continuous discourse are psychologists. A major part of what they recount concerns the conception of souls, the psychology of the human being. They contribute catalogues of registers of thought, the thoughts of all thoughts, of assertion, of reflection, of fear, they point them out, articulate them as such, and say which are regular. They also have their conception of patterns,[17] they are at the forefront of behaviorism. Just as on the other side of the Atlantic people are attempting 130 to explain the normal way to offer a bunch of flowers to a young girl, so too they have precise ideas on the manner in which man and woman should make advances to one another and, even, go to bed together. Schreber is nonplussed by it – This is how it is, he says, though I have never seen it myself. The text itself is reduced to rote learning or refrains that sometimes strike us as just a little embarrassing.

Concerning the interrupted sentence, Lacking now is . . ., I remember something that had struck me when I was reading M. Somaize, who around 1660–1670 wrote a Dictionnaire des précieuses.[18] To be sure, the Précieuses are ridiculous, but the so-called movement of the Précieuses is an element at least as important for the history of the language, of thought, of mores, as our dear surrealism which, as we know, doesn't amount to nothing – surely if a movement of people who handled symbols and signs in a strange way around 1920 had not occurred, we would not have the same style of poster. The movement of the Précieuses is much more important than one thinks from the point of view of language. Obviously, there is everything that this genius of a character called Molière recounted, but on this subject he has probably been made to say a bit more than he wanted to.[19] You have no idea how many locutions that seem perfectly natural to us today date from then. Somaize notes for example that it's the poet Saint-Amant who was the first to say Le mot me manque.[20] If today no one calls an armchair les commodités de la conversation, it's by pure chance – there are things that succeed and others that don't. These expressions that have passed into the language thus have originated in a form of conversation in salons where people were trying to introduce a more refined language.

The state of a language can be characterized as much by what is absent as by what is present. In the dialogue with the famous miracled birds you find funny things like this – they are told something like breathlessness and they hear twilight.[21] It's all pretty interesting – who among you has not heard amnesty and armistice commonly confused in language that is not especially uneducated? If I asked each of you in turn what you understand by superstition, for example, I'm sure that we would get a fair idea of the confusion that is possible in your minds on the subject of a word in current usage – after a while superstructure would end up appearing. Similarly, epiphenomena has a quite special meaning in medicine – Laënnec calls epiphenomena phenomena such as fever that are common to all illnesses.

rum, which you would do well to read.[22] You can for example judge how far we are from, and also how close we are to, the problems that the classical authors raised about the nature of the gods. The superstitiosi were people who would pray and make sacrifices all day long so that their descendants would survive them. Superstition was the monopolizing of devotion by people in the pursuit of a goal that they regarded as essential. This tells us a great deal about the conception these people had of the notion, so important in all primitive cultures, of the continuity of one's line of descent. This reference could, perhaps, also give us the best hold on the true definition to give of superstition, which consists in extracting one part of the text of conduct at the expense of others. This tells us how it's related to everything that is compartmentalized, methodically displaced, in the mechanism of neurosis.

What is important is to understand what one is saying. And in order to understand what one is saying it's important to see its lining, its other side, its resonances, its significant superimpositions. Whatever they may be – and we can include every misconstrual – there is no element of chance. Whoever reflects upon the organism of language must know as much as possible and construct as complete a catalogue as possible, not only concerning a word but also a turn of phrase or a locution. Language entirely operates within ambiguity, and most of the time you know absolutely nothing about what you are saying. In your most ordinary conversations language has a purely fictional character, you give the other the feeling that you are always there, that is to say, that you are capable of producing the expected response, which bears no relation to anything whatsoever that is susceptible to being pursued any further. Nine-tenths of discourses that have effectively taken place are completely fictional in this respect.

This primordial fact is necessary to whoever wants to penetrate the economy of President Schreber and understand what this nonsense means that he himself locates within his relations with his imaginary interlocutors. This is why I invite you to make a closer examination of the evolution of the verbal phenomena in President Schreber's history, so as to be able later to link them to the libidinal displacements.

PRINCIPLES OF THE ANALYSIS OF DELUSION
DELUSIONAL INTERLOCUTION
BEING FORSAKEN
DIALOGUE AND VOLUPTUOUSNESS
GOD'S POLITICS

Regarding an expression Schreber uses, namely that voices tell him that they lack something, I remarked that such expressions don't appear out of the blue,[1] that they are born over the course of a language's history, and at a level of creation sufficiently elevated for this to have taken place within a circle interested in questions of language. These expressions appear to flow quite naturally from the given arrangement of signifiers, but their appearance at a given moment is historically verifiable.

I was saying, then, that le mot me manque, the word escapes me, an expression that seems so natural to us, is recorded in Somaize as having issued from the coteries of the précieuses. It was considered so remarkable at the time that he recorded its appearance, attributing it to Saint-Amant. I've collected nearly a hundred of these expressions – C'est la plus naturelle des femmes, She's the most natural of women; Il est brouillé avec Untel, He's fallen out with So-and-so; Il a le sens droit, He is a good judge; Tour de visage, The outline of the face; Tour d'esprit, Turn of mind, personal style; Je me connais un peu en gens, I'm quite a good judge of people; Jouer à coup sûr, To play with no chance of losing; Il agit sans façons, He acts without ceremony or in an offhand way; Il m'a fait mille amitiés, He was effusively friendly; Cela est assez de mon goût, That is quite to my taste; Il n'entre dans aucun détail, He doesn't go into details; Il s'est embarqué en une mauvaise affaire, He has embarked upon a bit of bad business; Il pousse les gens à bout, He drives people mad; Sacrifier ses amis, To sacrifice one's friends; Cela est fort, That is a bit much; Faire des avances, To make approaches or advances to someone; Faire figure dans le monde, To cut a figure in the world. These expressions, which seem quite natural to us and have become standard, are recorded in Somaize and also in Berry's rhetoric of 1663 as having been created in the circle of the Précieuses. This tells you to what extent one must avoid the illusion that language is modeled on a simple and direct apprehension of the real. They all presuppose a lengthy elaboration, the implications, the reductions, of the real, what we 134 might call metaphysical progress. That people act in a certain way with certain signifiers involves all sorts of presuppositions. Le mot me manque, for example, presupposes first of all that the word exists.

Today we shall take up our subject again according to the methodic principles we have laid down. To press on a little bit further into President Schreber's delusion we shall proceed by taking up his document again. Besides, we haven't got anything else.

I pointed out that the document was composed by Schreber at a period sufficiently late in his psychosis for him to be able to put his delusion into words. In this respect I have some reservations, legitimate ones, since something that we may suppose is more primitive, prior, originary, escapes us – the lived experience, the famous ineffable and incommunicable lived experience of psychosis in its primary or fertile period.

We are at liberty to be fascinated by this and to think that we have lost the best part. To deplore the fact that one has lost the best part is in general a way of neglecting what one has at hand, which is perhaps worth taking into consideration.

Why should a terminal state be any less instructive than an initial state? It's not certain that this terminal state represents a drop in value if we accept the principle that in unconscious matters the relation of the subject to the symbolic is fundamental.

This principle requires that we abandon the idea, implicit in many systems, that what the subject puts into words is an improper and always distorted enunciation of a lived experience that would be some irreducible reality. This is the hypothesis at the bottom of Blondel's La Conscience morbide, a good reference point I occasionally use with you. There is, according to Blondel, something so original and irreducible in the lived experience of the delusional subject that when he expresses himself he gives us something that can only be misleading. All we can do is renounce any idea of ever penetrating this impenetrable lived experience. The same psychological presupposition, implicit in what might be called the thought of our times, is indicated in the customary, and incorrect, use of the word intellectualization. There is, for an entire species of modern intellectual, something irreducible that intelligence is by definition bound to miss. Bergson did much to establish this dangerous prejudice.

135 One of two things has to be true. Either a delusion is in no way part of our own personal domain as analysts and has nothing to do with the unconscious, or it's dependent upon the unconscious such as we – we've been through this together – have thought we could elaborate it over recent years.

The unconscious is fundamentally structured, woven, chained, meshed, by language. And not only does the signifier play as big a role there as the signified does, but it plays the fundamental role. In fact, what characterizes language is the system of signifiers as such. The complex play between signifier and signified raises questions that we are skirting since we aren't doing a course in linguistics here, but you have a good enough idea of it now to know that the relationship between signifier and signified is far from being, as they say in set theory, one-to-one.

The signified is not the things in their raw state, already there, given in an order open to meaning. Meaning is human discourse insofar as it always refers to another meaning. M. Saussure in his famous courses on linguistics produces a diagram with one flux that is the meaning and another that is the discourse, what we hear. This diagram illustrates that the cutting up of a sentence into its different elements already involves a certain degree of arbitrariness. These units called words undoubtedly exist, but when one looks at them closely they are not so unitary. This is of no concern here. Well then, M. de Saussure thinks that what enables the signifier to be cut up is a certain correlation between the signifier and the signified. Obviously, for it to be possible to cut the two of them up together there must be a pause.

This diagram is questionable. It's in fact clear that in the diachronic sense, across time, shifts occurs, and that at any given moment the evolving system of human meanings is being displaced and modifies the content of the signifiers, which adopt different usages. I hope I have made you feel this with the examples I gave you before. Underneath the same signifiers there have been over the course of time these shifts which prove that no one-to-one correspondence between the two systems can be established.

A system of signifiers, a language, has certain characteristics that specify the syllables, the usage of words, the locutions into which they are grouped, and this conditions what happens in the unconscious, down to its most original fabric. If the unconscious is as Freud depicts it, a pun can in itself be the linchpin that supports a symptom, a pun that doesn't exist in a related language. This is not to say that symptoms are always based on puns, but that they are always based on the existence of signifiers as such, on a complex 136 relationship of totality to totality, or more exactly of entire system to entire system, of universe of signifiers to universe of signifiers.

This is so clearly Freud's doctrine that there is no other meaning to give to his term overdetermination, or to his necessary requirement that for a symptom to occur there must be at least a duality, at least two conflicts at work, one current and one old. Without this fundamental duality of signifier and signified no psychoanalytic determinism is conceivable. The material linked to the old conflict is preserved in the unconscious as a potential signifier, as a virtual signifier, and then captured in the signified of the current conflict and used by it as language, that is, as a symptom.

Henceforth, when we explore delusions with the idea that they can be understood in the register of psychoanalysis, in the order of the Freudian discovery, according to the mode of thought that regarding symptoms it makes possible, you readily see that there is no reason to reject the explanation Schreber gives of his world system as being the effect of a purely verbal compromise, as a secondary elaboration of the terminal state, even if the testimony he provides is, undoubtedly, not always beyond criticism.

We are well aware that as he progresses the paranoiac retroactively rethinks his past and discovers, even in his very early years, the origin of the persecutions of which he has been the object. He can have the greatest difficulty in situating an event, and one clearly senses his tendency through a play of mirrors to project it into a past that itself becomes rather indeterminate – a past of eternal recurrence, as Schreber writes. But this isn't what is essential. A document as extensive as President Schreber's retains all its value provided we suppose a continuous and profound solidarity between the signifying elements from the beginning to the end of the delusion. In short, the final organization of the delusion enables us to grasp the primary elements that were at work – in any case it is legitimate to look for them.

It's in this respect that analysis of the delusion provides us with the subject's fundamental relationship to the register in which all the manifestations of the unconscious are organized and unfold. Perhaps it will even explain to us, if not the ultimate mechanism of psychosis, at least the subjective relationship to the symbolic order it contains. Perhaps we shall be able to understand how over the course of the evolution of the psychosis, from the time of its origin to its final stage, assuming that there is a final stage in psychosis, the subject is situated in relation to the whole symbolic, original order – an environment distinct from the real environment and from the imaginary 137 dimension, with which man is always involved, and which is constitutive of human reality.

We must not, under the pretext that the subject is deluded, proceed from the idea that his system is in conflict. There is no doubt that it is without application, that's one of the distinctive signs of delusion. In what is communicated within society it's absurd, as they say, and even extremely disturbing. A psychiatrist's first reaction to a subject who starts raving at him is to find it unpleasant. He's disturbed at hearing a gentleman make statements that are both peremptory and contrary to what one is accustomed to regarding as the normal order of causality, and his first concern in the interview is to get the little pegs back into the little holes, as Péguy would say in his late works when speaking of the experience he had taken upon himself, about these people who, when the great catastrophe declares itself, want to retain the same relationship with things as beforehand. Proceed in an orderly manner, Sir! they say to the patient, and the chapters are already done.

Like all discourse a delusion is to be judged first of all as a field of meaning that has organized a certain signifier, so that the first rules of a good interview, and of a good investigation of the psychoses, might be to let him speak for as long as possible. One forms an opinion afterwards. I'm not suggesting that in an observation it should always be like this, and clinicians have on the whole approached things fairly well. But the notion of an elementary phenomenon, the distinctions between hallucinations, between disorders of attention, perception, and the various levels within the order of faculties, have certainly contributed to obscuring our relationship to the delusional.

As for Schreber, he was free to speak for the good reason that no one ever said anything to him, and he had all the time in the world to write his big book for us.

We saw last time that Schreber introduces distinctions into his concert of voices in that they are the work of these various entities he calls the realms of God.

This plurality of agents of discourse alone raises a serious problem, since the subject nevertheless doesn't think of it as being autonomous. There are some quite beautiful bits in this text that describe these voices and give us a sense of their relationship with the divine essence. We shouldn't allow ourselves to slide from there into saying that they emanate from it, because then we would be making the construction. We must follow the subject's own language, and he doesn't mention emanation. 138

In the copy I had in my possession there were traces in the margin of annotations by a person who must have considered himself very erudite, because he had written down a number of explanations opposite Schreber's term emanation. This person had no doubt heard of Plotinus, but this is one of those cases of hasty understanding one has to guard against. I don't think anything like a Plotinian emanation is involved here.[2]

In the passage I read out,[3] the noise the discourse makes – the subject insists upon this – is spoken so softly that he calls it whispering. But this discourse is always present, uninterrupted. The subject can, as he says, drown it out with his actions and his own words, but it's always ready to recommence at the same noise level.

As a working hypothesis, as they say these days, we can accept that it's not impossible that this discourse is verbalized by the subject. This is accepting a lot, perhaps too much, but let's leave that to one side for the moment. In any case, this discourse is related to what we suppose is the continuous discourse which memorizes each subject's conduct for him at every moment and is a sort of understudy to his life. Not only are we obliged to accept this hypothesis because of what we have just been taking to be the structure and fabric of the unconscious, but it's what immediate experience allows us to grasp.

Someone recounted to me, not very long ago, that they had had the following experience. The threat of being about to be run over by a car had suddenly surprised this person who, as everything indicates, possessed the necessary movements for getting out of the way. The phrase brain damage leapt into his head, uttered mentally, as it were. No one can say that this verbalization is an operation that forms part of the chain of reflexes for avoiding a shock that might lead to the said brain damage. On the contrary it's slightly removed from the situation, quite apart from the fact that it presupposes all sorts of determinants in the subject that make brain damage something particularly significant for him. Here you can see this latent discourse appear which is always ready to emerge and which intervenes at a level of its own, to a different score from the music of the subject's total conduct.

This discourse which is presented to the subject Schreber at the period of the illness he's describing has a dominant characteristic of Unsinn. But this Unsinn is not entirely simple. The subject who is writing and confiding in us 139 depicts himself as undergoing this discourse, but the subject who speaks – and the two are not unrelated, otherwise we wouldn't be characterizing him as mad – says some things very clearly, such as what I've already quoted to you, Aller Unsinn hebt sich auf! All nonsense is annulled, rises, is transposed![4] This is what President Schreber tells us he has heard in the register of the allocution made to him by his permanent interlocutor.

This Aufheben is a very rich word indeed. It's the sign of implication, of a search, of a recourse proper to this Unsinn, which is far from being, as Kant says in his analysis of negative magnitudes,[5] a pure and simple absence, a privation of sense. This Unsinn is very positive and organized, it consists of interlocking contradictions, and, of course, the entire sense of our subject's delusion is located here, which makes his novel so enthralling. This Unsinn is what is an obstacle, is composite, continues, and is articulated in the delusion. Negation here is not a privation, and we shall see what it has value in relation to.

What is the connection in this discourse between the subject who speaks in these voices and the subject who reports these things to us as meaningful? This is extremely complex.

I began this demonstration last time by insisting on the significant nature of the suspension of sense produced by the fact that the voices never complete their sentences.

There is here a specific procedure by which meaning is evoked, which undoubtedly reserves for us the possibility of conceiving this meaning as a structure, the one I stressed with respect to that patient who, when she heard someone say, Sow! to her, whispered between her teeth, I've just been to the butcher's – namely the allusive voice, the subject's indirect aim. We have already managed to get a bit of an idea here of a structure that is very close to the schema we give for the relationships between the subject who speaks concretely, who sustains the discourse, and the unconscious subject who is literally present, in this hallucinatory discourse. He's present, alluded to – one can't say in a beyond, since the Other is lacking in delusion – but on this side, in a sort of internal beyond.

It would not be impossible to pursue this demonstration further. But this would be to introduce schemas too quickly, perhaps, which, if we want to proceed rigorously, might appear preconceived in relation to the data. In the content of a delusion there are sufficient data that are of easier access so that we can proceed differently and take our time.

As a matter of fact, taking one's time is a part of that attitude of good faith which I maintain is necessary if we are to make any progress on the structure of delusion. Bracketing it at the outset as psychiatric is the source of the state 140 of incomprehension in which people have always remained until now. It's assumed at the outset to be an abnormal phenomenon that is involved and, as such, one is condemned not to understand it. One defends oneself against it, one defends oneself thus against its seduction, so tangible in President Schreber, who naively asks the psychiatrist, Aren't you sometimes afraid of going mad? But the fact is that this is absolutely true. One of the better masters I have known had a good sense of where listening to these characters who rave on at you all day with such odd things might lead him.

Don't we analysts know that the normal subject is essentially someone who is placed in the position of not taking the greater part of his internal discourse seriously? Observe the number of things in normal subjects, including yourselves, that it's truly your fundamental occupation not to take seriously. The principal difference between you and the insane is perhaps nothing other than this. And this is why for many, even without their acknowledging it, the insane embody what we would be led to if we began to take things seriously.

So let us, without too great a fear, take our subject seriously, our President Schreber, and since we are unable at the outset to penetrate into either the aim, articulations, or ends of this singular Unsinn, let's try to use certain questions to explore as much of it as we can, where we aren't rudderless.

First, is there an interlocutor?

Yes, there is, and he's fundamentally unique. This Einheit [oneness] is very amusing when you think about, if we think of this text on "Logos" by Heidegger I have translated, which is going to be published in the first issue of our new journal, La Psychanalyse, and which identifies the logos with Heraclitus's En [One].[6] And in fact we shall see that Schreber's delusion is in its own way a mode of relationship between the subject and language as a whole.

What Schreber expresses shows us both the unity he feels there is in him who maintains this continuous discourse before which he feels himself to be alienated, and a plurality in the modes and in the secondary agents that he attributes to the various parts. But the unity is very fundamental, dominating, and he calls it God. We are at home here. If he says it's God, the man has his reasons. Why deny him the use of a term whose universal importance 141 we are aware of? For some this has even been one of the proofs of his existence. We well know how difficult it is to grasp what the precise content of this is for the majority of our contemporaries, so why should we more especially withhold belief from a delusional when he speaks of God?

What's striking is that Schreber is a disciple of the Aufklärung, he's even one of its last representatives, he spent his childhood in a family where religion was not an issue. He lists his reading – all this is valid proof for him of the seriousness of what he experiences.[7] After all, he doesn't enter into a discussion of whether he has made a mistake or not. He says, This is how it is. It's a fact of which I have the most direct proofs, this can only be God, if the word is to have any meaning. I had never taken this word seriously before, and at the moment at which I experienced these things, I experienced God. The experience is not the guarantee of God, it's God who is the guarantee of my experience. I am speaking to you of God. I must have got it from somewhere, and as I didn't get if from the baggage of my childhood prejudices, my experience is true.[8] He's very clever here. Not only is he on the whole a good witness, but he commits no theological mistakes. Moreover, he's well informed, I would even say he's a good classical psychiatrist.

[8] See Mem, 78–80.

In his text one finds a quotation from the sixth edition of Kraepelin that he has plucked out by his own devices, which causes him to laugh at what Kraepelin marks as being a strange thing, that the delusional's experience carries a great capacity to convince.

Beware, says Schreber, this isn't right at all. Here it's obvious that I am not the delusional the doctors say I am, because I am quite capable of reducing things not only to what people say, but even to common sense. Thus I happen to hear the noise of a train or chain-steamer, which makes a great deal of noise, and the things I think register themselves in the regular intervals between these monotonous noises, just as one modulates the thoughts that churn over inside one's head upon these noises that we are familiar with from being in a railway carriage. But I can discriminate things very well, and the voices I hear are something different again – you fail to give sufficient weight and meaning to this.[9]

This Schreberian analysis provides us with an opportunity to criticize from within certain genetic theories about interpretation or hallucination. And there are many other examples in the text.

What is this God, then, who has revealed himself to him? First, he is presence. And his mode of presence is the speaking mode.

First, a remark. I don't need to go very far to find testimony that will show 142 the importance of the providential function for the idea subjects have of the Divinity. I'm not saying that this is the best way of approaching the thing from the theological point of view, but nevertheless, opening half by chance a book that attempts to speak of the gods of Epicurus, I read these very nicely written lines – Ever since people have believed in gods, they have been convinced that they control human affairs, that these two aspects of faith are connected. Faith . . . is born of the many-times repeated observation that the majority of our actions do not achieve their aim, there necessarily remains a margin between our best conceived plans and their accomplishment, and thus we remain in uncertainty, the mother of hope and fear.[10]

The text is by Father Festugière, a very fine author and extremely knowledgeable about Ancient Greece. Doubtless the slightly apologetic style of this introduction dedicated to the persistence of belief in gods is a bit distorted by its subject matter, that is, by the fact that Epicurianism was constructed around the issue of the presence of the gods in human affairs, since one can't but be astonished by the partiality of reducing the divine hypothesis to a providential function, that is, to the requirement that we be recompensed for our good intentions – when they're nice good things happen to them. But anyway, it's significant.

All the more so because there is no trace of it in Schreber, whose delusion is in large part theological and whose partner is divine. To be sure, noting an absence is less decisive than noting a presence, and the fact that something isn't there is always, in the analysis of phenomena, subject to caution. If we had more details on President Schreber's delusion, perhaps this would be contradicted. On the other hand, taking note of an absence is extraordinarily important for localizing a structure. I therefore point out to you that, whether theologically valid or not, the notion of providence, of an agency that rewards, so essential to the functioning of the unconscious, and which protrudes into consciousness, leaves no trace in Schreber. And consequently, let's say, to be brief, that it isn't certain that this divine erotomania is to be immediately inscribed in the register of the superego.

So, here is this God, then. We already know it's he who is always talking, who is forever talking without saying anything. This is so much so that Schreber dedicates many pages to considering what it might mean, that there is this God who talks without saying anything and who nevertheless never stops talking.

143 This troublesome function can't for one second be separated from the mode of presence that is God's. But Schreber's relationships with him are far from being limited to this, and I would now like to emphasize the fundamental and ambiguous relation Schreber has with his God, and which is situated in the same dimension as the one in which he is there, chattering away incessantly.

In a way, this relation is present from the beginning, even before God has unveiled himself, at a time when the delusion is borne by characters like Flechsig, and initially by Flechsig himself, his first therapist. The German expression that, following Freud, I shall emphasize expresses for the subject his essential mode of relationship with his fundamental interlocutor. It establishes a continuity between the initial and the final interlocutors of the delusion, in which we can recognize that there is something in common between Flechsig, the tested souls, the realms of God with their various meanings, posterior and anterior, upper and lower, and, finally, the ultimate god to whom everything appears to be reduced at the end, when Schreber has placed himself in a position of megalomania. Whether it be at the beginning of the delusion, when, as Freud emphasizes, his imminent rape, a threat to his virility, is at issue, or whether it be at the end, when an effusion of voluptuousness is established in which God is supposed to find even greater satisfaction than our subject, it's a matter of this, the greatest of atrocities, that he's going to be forsaken.

The translation of this liegen lassen, laisser en plan, is not too bad, because it has connotations of feminine sentiments. In German it's much less emphatic and it's also much broader, it's to let lie. Throughout the entire Schreberian delusion the threat of this being forsaken returns like a musical theme, like the unbroken thread one finds running through a literary or historical theme.

Right at the outset this forms part of the sinister intentions of the persecuting violators and has to be avoided at all cost. One cannot escape the impression that the subject's global relationship with the whole of the phenomena to which he is prey consists in this essentially ambivalent relation – whatever the painful, weighty, troublesome, unbearable, character of these phenomena, maintaining his relationship with them constitutes a necessity the rupture of which would have been absolutely intolerable to him. When this rupture is realized, that is, whenever he loses contact with God – whom he has relations with on two levels, an auditory one and another, more mysterious one, that of his presence, which is linked to what he calls the blessedness of the partners, and his partner's blessedness even more than his own – whenever the relationship is interrupted, whenever the withdrawal of the divine presence occurs, all sorts of variously intolerable internal phenomena 144 of tearing apart, of pain, break out.

This character with whom Schreber is involved in a twofold relation, a dialogue and an erotic relationship which are distinct and yet never disjoined, is also characterized by the fact that he has absolutely no understanding of anything that is specifically human. This feature is often quite touching in Schreber's hands. Of the questions that God asks him so as to incite him to give the response implied by the questioning itself, which Schreber never allows himself to give, he says – These really are stupid traps that I am offered. Schreber even elaborates all sorts of quite agreeably rationalized remarks about the dimensions of certainty, and offers an explanation. How can one successfully conceive of a God such that he understands absolutely nothing about human needs? How can one be so stupid as to believe, for example, that if I cease for an instant to think of anything, I will have become a complete idiot, have even fallen into nothingness? Yet this is what God does, taking advantage of this to withdraw. Whenever this occurs, I apply myself to some intelligent occupation and manifest my presence. For God, despite his thousand-fold experiences, to be capable of believing this, he really must be ineducable.

Schreber elaborates on this point in ways that are far from being stupid. He hypothesizes and argues in ways that wouldn't be out of place in a properly theological discussion. God being perfect and imperfectible, the very notion of progress through acquired experience is altogether unthinkable. Schreber does find this argument a bit sophistical nevertheless, since this irreducible perfection is completely cut off from things human. Contrary to the god who probes loins and hearts, Schreber's god knows things only on their surface, he sees only what he sees.[11] As to what is inside he doesn't understand a thing, but since everything is written down somewhere, on little cards, by what is called the writing-down system, he will ultimately, at the end of this totalization, nevertheless be totally informed.

Moreover, Schreber explains very well how it stands to reason that God cannot have access to things as contingent and childish as the existence of steam engines and locomotives. But all this having been recorded in the form of discourse by the souls ascending towards blessedness, God collects it together and thereby still has some idea of what happens on Earth in terms of minor inventions, from the game of diabolo to the atomic bomb. This is a very nice system, and one gets the impression that it was discovered through an extraordinarily innocent development, through the working out of significant consequences, in a harmonious and continuous unfolding through its various 145 phases, whose motor is the subject's disturbed relationship to something that affects the total functioning of language, the symbolic order, and discourse.

I can't discuss all the richness there is here. There is for example a discussion, which is extraordinarily brilliant, of God's relationship to games of chance.[12] Can God foresee what number will get drawn in a lottery? It's not a silly question, and it would be good if the people here who have a strong belief in God asked themselves the same question. The order of omniscience that is presupposed by being able to guess which little piece of paper gets drawn from a huge ball presents considerable difficulties. From the point of view of the real, the only difference between the pieces of paper in this balanced mass is a symbolic difference. It therefore has to be supposed that God enters the discourse. It's an extension of the theory of the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real.

There is one thing that this implies, which is that God's intentions are unclear. There is nothing more fascinating than to see how the delusional voice that has emerged from an indisputably original experience involves in this subject a sort of burning of language that manifests itself in the respect with which he upholds omniscience and good intentions as being essential to the Divinity. But he can't fail to see, particularly at the beginning of his delusion when these painful phenomena come at him from all sorts of harmful characters, that God has despite everything allowed it all to happen. This God practices the absolutely inadmissible politics of half-measures, of half-tormenting, in respect of which Schreber lets slip the word perfidie.[13] In the end one has to suppose that there is a fundamental disturbance in the universal order. As the voices say – Remember that all that is worldizing implies a self contradiction.[14] There is beauty here that I don't need to highlight for you.

We shall stop for today on this analysis of the structure of the divine person.

The next move will consist in analyzing the relation between the entire fantasmagoria and the real itself. With the symbolic register, the imaginary register, and the real register, we shall break new ground which will enable us to uncover, I hope, the nature of what is at issue in the delusional interlocution.

On the signifier in the real and the bellowing-miracle

PSYCHIATRY'S MAIN FACT
THE DISCOURSE OF FREEDOM
THE PEACE OF THE EVENING SUBJECTIVE TOPOLOGY

Some thought I went a bit swiftly last time in mentioning President Schreber's reflections on divine omnipotence and omniscience and appearing to endorse their appropriateness.

I was simply observing that this man, for whom the entire experience of God is discourse, was wondering about what there is to be found at the junction of the symbol and the real, that is, about what introduces the symbolic opposition into the real. Perhaps I ought to have gone on to add how remarkable it is that this was precisely what caught the patient's attention – that within the register of his experience it seemed to him difficult to see how God could foresee what numbers would be drawn in a lottery.

This remark doesn't of course exclude the criticisms that such an objection might lead to for anyone who should find himself inclined to respond. Someone pointed out to me for example that numbers are distinguishable by their spatial coordinates and that, when the problem of the principle of individuation is raised, distinguishing between individuals is based on nothing different.

As far as I was concerned, I took notice of the subject's sensitivity, in his reasoning part, to the difference there is between language as symbolic and his own permanent internal dialogue – or more exactly this oscillation in which a discourse that the subject experiences as foreign and as revealing a presence to him itself asks the questions and itself gives the answers.

It was a belief in God for which he was totally unprepared that engendered in him the experience he conveys. It was for him a question of discerning 148 what order of reality could account for this presence extending over a part of the universe – not all of it, since the divine power has no knowledge of man. Nothing of his interior, of his feeling for life, of his life itself, is comprehensible to God, who only gathers it up once everything has been transformed into infinite note-taking.[1]

[1] I.e., the writing-down-system.

Now, a deeply reasoning character like Schreber, confronted by an experience which for him has all the characteristics of a reality and in which he can discern the full weight of the undeniable presence of a god of language, pauses, to evoke the limits of his power, before an example that concerns a human, artificial handling of language. It concerns a future contingent, in relation to which there is a real issue of human freedom and, by the same token, of what God can't foresee.

What is of interest to us is that Schreber distinguishes between two spheres of language use, which are extremely different for him. This distinction can only have value for us within the perspective that admits the radically primary nature of the symbolic opposition between plus and minus, insofar as these are distinguished by nothing other than their opposition, though they must have material support. They nevertheless evade all real coordinates apart from the law of their equiprobability.

As soon as we introduce a game of symbolic alternation, we must effectively assume that nothing differentiates the real efficiency of one element from that of another. It isn't the result of a law of experience but of an a priori law that we have to have equal chances of selecting a plus or a minus. The game will not be considered correct unless it meets the criterion that the likelihood of outcomes be equal. In this sphere we can say that, at least at the nosological level of apprehending the term, here the symbolic yields an a priori law and introduces a type of operation that lies outside anything we could arrive at by inference from facts in the real.

We must constantly ask ourselves why we're so attached to the question of delusion.

To understand why, one need only recall the formula that is sometimes used, carelessly, regarding the way analysis works, namely that our leverage point is the healthy part of the ego. Is there no clearer example of the contrast in existence between a healthy part and an insane part of the ego than the delusions classically referred to as partial? Is there no more striking example 149 of this than the work of this President Schreber who offers us such a sensitive, engaging, tolerant exposition of his conception of the world and experiences, and who doesn't exhibit any less assertively the inadmissible mode of his hallucinatory experiences? Now, who is not aware – this is I would say psychiatry's main fact – that no amount of leverage on the healthy part of the ego would enable us to gain an inch of ground over the manifestly insane part?

Psychiatry's main fact, by means of which the beginner is initiated into the very existence of madness as such, leads to the abandonment of all hope of a cure by such an approach. Moreover, this is how things had always been before the arrival of psychoanalysis, whatever more or less mysterious force had been appealed to – affectivity, imagination, coenaesthesia – to explain this resistance to reducing through reason a delusion that nevertheless presents itself as fully articulated and in appearance accessible to the laws of coherent discourse. Psychoanalysis, on the other hand, gives a curious endorsement to the psychotic's delusion because it legitimates it in the same sphere as the one in which analytic experience normally operates and because it rediscovers in his discourse what it usually discovers as the discourse of the unconscious. But it still doesn't contribute any success to the experience. This discourse, which has emerged in the ego, shows itself – as articulated as it may be, and it could even be said to be in large part inverted, bracketed by Verneinung – to be irreducible, unmanageable, incurable.

In short, it could be said that the psychotic is a martyr of the unconscious, giving this term martyr its meaning, which is to be a witness. It's an open testimony. The neurotic is also a witness to the existence of the unconscious, he gives a closed testimony that has to be deciphered. The psychotic, in the sense in which he is in a first approximation an open witness, seems arrested, immobilized, in a position that leaves him incapable of authentically restoring the sense of what he witnesses and sharing it in the discourse of others.

I shall try to get you to sense the difference there is between open and closed discourse on the basis of a homology, and you will see that in the normal world of discourse there is a certain dissymmetry that already adumbrates the dissymmetry at issue in the opposition between neurosis and psychosis.

We live in a society in which slavery isn't recognized. It's nevertheless clear to any sociologist or philosopher that it has in no way been abolished. This 150 has even become the object of some fairly well-known claims. It's also clear that while bondage hasn't been abolished, one might say it has been generalized. The relationship of those known as the exploiters, in relation to the economy as a whole, is no less a relationship of bondage than that of the average man. Thus the master-slave duality is generalized within each participant in our society.

The deep-seated bondage of consciousness in this unhappy state of affairs is to be attributed to the discourse that provoked this profound social transformation. We can call this discourse the message of brotherhood. It concerns something new which didn't just appear in the world with Christianity, since Stoicism, for instance, had already laid the ground for it. In short, behind this generalized bondage there is a secret discourse, a message of liberation, which in a way subsists in a state of repression.

Does the same thing hold for what we can call the patent discourse of freedom? No, it doesn't. Some time ago an imbalance was observed between the pure and simple fact of revolt and the capacity of social action to transform. I would even say that the entire modern revolution was founded on this distinction and on the notion that the discourse of freedom was, by definition, not only ineffectual but also profoundly alienated from its aim and object, that everything probative that is linked to it is properly speaking the enemy of all progress towards freedom, to the extent that freedom can have a tendency to animate any continual movement in society. Nonetheless, this discourse of freedom is articulated deep within us all as representing a certain right of the individual to autonomy.

A certain mental breathing space seems indispensable to modern man, one in which his independence not only of any master but also of any god is affirmed, a space for his irreducible autonomy as individual, as individual existence. Here there is indeed something that merits a point-by-point comparison with a delusional discourse. It's one itself. It plays a part in the modern individual's presence in the world and in his relations with his counterparts. Surely, if I asked you to put this autonomy into words, to calculate the exact share of indefeasible freedom in the current state of affairs, and even should you answer, the rights of man, or the right to happiness, or a thousand other things, we wouldn't get very far before realizing that for each of us this is an intimate, personal discourse which is a long way from coinciding with the discourse of one's neighbor on any point whatsoever. In a word, the existence of a permanent discourse of freedom in the modern individual seems to me indisputable.

Now, how can this discourse be matched up not only with the other's 151 discourse but with his conduct as well, assuming that he tends to base it on this discourse at all? There is a truly discouraging problem here. And the facts show that there is invariably not just a coming to terms with what everyone effectively contributes, but actually resigned abandonment to reality. In the same way, our delusional Schreber, after having believed himself the sole survivor of the twilight of the world, resigns himself to acknowledging the permanent existence of external reality. He can barely explain why this reality is there, but he has to recognize that the real is indeed still there, that nothing has perceptibly altered. This for him is the strangest thing of all, since there is here an order of certainty inferior to what his delusional experience gives him, but he resigns himself to it.

To be sure, we ourselves place much less confidence in the discourse of freedom, but as soon as it's a matter of acting, in the name of freedom in particular, our attitude towards what in reality we have to endure, or towards the impossibility of our acting together to further this freedom, has entirely the character of resigned abandonment, of a renunciation of what is nevertheless an essential part of our internal discourse, namely that we have not only certain indefeasible rights but that these rights are founded on certain primary freedoms, which can be demanded for any human being in our culture.

There is something ridiculous in the effort of psychologists to reduce thought to an incipient action, or to an elided or represented action, and to seek its origins in what would put man permanently at the level of the experience of an elementary real, of a real of objects that would be his own. It's far too obvious that for each of us thought is a thing of little value which we could call vain mental rumination – but why belittle it?

We are constantly raising problems closely related to these notions of internal freedom and of the manifestation of something enclosed within oneself. This point of view comes to a dead end very quickly, given that every type of living reality immersed in the spirit of the modern world's cultural arena is essentially going round in circles. This is why one always comes back to the restricted, hesitant character of one's personal actions, and one only begins to think the problem is confused when one actually takes things in hand qua thinker, which is not everyone's fate. We all remain at the level of an insoluble contradiction between a discourse that is at a certain level always necessary and a reality to which, both in principle and in a way proved by experience, we fail to adjust.

152 Moreover, don't we see that analytic experience is deeply bound up with this discursive double of the subject, his discordant and ridiculous ego? The ego of every modern man?

Isn't it clear that analytic experience began with the fact that ultimately nobody feels at ease in the current state of interhuman relations in our culture? Nobody who has had to face even the smallest request for advice, however elementary, that encroaches on principles feels he is being honest. It's not simply because we are too ignorant of the subjects' lives that we are unable to tell them whether they would do better to marry or not in such and such circumstances and will, if we're honest, tend to be reticent – it's because the very meaning of marriage is for each of us a question that remains open, and open in such a way that, as to its application in a particular case, we don't feel ourselves to be in a position to give the answer when called upon to become directors of conscience. This attitude, the pertinence of which can be experienced by anyone who doesn't abandon himself for the sake of becoming a somebody and who doesn't set himself up as a moralist or as omniscient, is also the first condition to be demanded of what can be called a psychotherapist – psychotherapeutics will have taught him the risks of taking such perilous initiatives.

Analysis began precisely by refusing to take sides within the sphere of common discourse, with its profound rifts as to the essence of mores and the status of the individual in our society, precisely by avoiding this sphere. It limits itself to a different discourse, one that is inscribed in the very suffering of the being we have before us and is already articulated in something – his symptoms and his structure – that escapes him, in so far as obsessional neurosis, for instance, doesn't simply consist of symptoms but is also a structure.

Psychoanalysis never places itself at the level of the discourse of freedom, even though this discourse may always be present, constant within each of us, with our contradictions and dissonances, this discourse that is personal and yet common, and always, whether imperceptibly or not, delusional. Psychoanalysis is otherwise directed at the effect of discourse within the subject.

Henceforth, isn't the experience of a case like Schreber – or of any other patient who could give us as extensive an account of discursive structure – of such a nature as to enable us to get a bit closer to the problem of what the ego really signifies? The ego isn't reducible to a function of synthesis. It's indissolubly linked to this sort of mortmain, of a necessary and unbearable enigmatic element, that is partially constituted by the discourse of the real man we are dealing with in our experience, this foreign discourse within 153 everyone's heart in so far as one thinks of oneself as an autonomous individual.

Schreber's discourse has a different structure, to be sure. Schreber notes at the beginning of one of his chapters, very amusingly – They say I'm paranoid. As it happens, people at that time were still sufficiently bound to Kraepelin's first classification to describe him as paranoid, whereas his symptoms went much further than this. But in calling him paraphrenic Freud went further still, since paraphrenia was the name he suggested for dementia praecox, Bleuler's schizophrenia.[2]

Coming back to Schreber, They say I'm paranoid, and they say that paranoiacs are people who refer everything to themselves. In this case they're mistaken, it's not I who refer everything to myself, it's he who refers everything to me, it's this God who speaks non-stop inside me, through his various agents and extensions. It's he who has the unfortunate habit, whatever I experience, of immediately pointing out to me that something is meant for me, or even that something comes from me. I can't play an aria from The Magic Flute – Schreber is a musician – without having him who speaks immediately attribute the corresponding feelings to me, but I don't have them myself.[3] You can also see President Schreber become highly indignant at the fact that the voice should intervene to tell him that what he is in the process of saying concerns him. Of course, we are in a play of mirages, but this is no ordinary mirage, this Other considered as radically foreign, as errant, who intervenes so as to cause a convergence to the second degree upon the subject, an intentionalization of the external world, which the subject himself, insofar as he asserts himself as I, vigorously repels.

[3] See Mem, 262–63.

We talk about hallucinations. Do we absolutely have the right to do so? They are not presented to us as such when we hear them recounted. According to the commonly received notion, which treats them as a false perception, we're dealing with something that emerges in the external world and forces itself on one as a perception, a disorder, a rupture in the text of the real. In other words, the hallucination is located in the real. The prior question is whether a verbal hallucination doesn't require a certain preliminary analysis that questions the very legitimacy of this definition.

Here I have to take the same path I've already somewhat bored you with, 154 by reminding you of the very foundations of the order of discourse and by rejecting its status as superstructure, its relationship of pure and simple reference to reality, its having the character of signs, and the equivalence that is supposed to exist between naming and the world of objects. Let's try to re-examine the question from an angle that is a bit closer to experience.

Nothing is as ambiguous as verbal hallucination. The classical analyses already give us some indication, at least for a portion of the cases, of the subject's role in their creation. This is what has been called the psychomotor verbal hallucination, and the observed adumbrations of utterances have been gleefully recorded because they offer the hope of a satisfactory rational explanation of the phenomenon of hallucination. If this problem warrants investigation, the starting point is the relationship between the mouth and the ear. This doesn't only exist between subjects, but also exists for each subject himself, who when he speaks hears himself. Having got this far, one thinks that one has already taken a step forward and gained insight into a whole lot of things. In fact, though, the remarkable sterility of the analysis of the problem of verbal hallucination is due to the inadequacy of this observation. That the subject hears what he says is precisely the point at which it's appropriate not to stop but to return to the experience of what is going on when he hears someone else.

What happens if you pay attention solely to the saying of what you hear, to the accent, or even to the regional expressions, to whatever is literal, in registering your interlocutor's discourse? You have to bring a little imagination to this, since it can perhaps never be carried out entirely, but it's very clear when a foreign language is involved – what you understand in a discourse is different from what is registered acoustically. It's even simpler if we think of deaf-mutes, who are able to receive a discourse through visual signs given by means of the fingers, according to the deaf-mute alphabet. If a deaf-mute is fascinated by the pretty hands of his interlocutor, he will fail to register the discourse the hands convey. I would add this – can it be said that properly speaking he sees what he registers, namely the sequence of signs, their opposition without which there is no sequence?

Even so, we can't stop there. As it happens, a deaf-mute, even as he registers the sequence put to him, may well understand nothing if addressed in a language he doesn't know. Like someone who hears a discourse in a foreign language, he will have seen the said sentence perfectly well, but it will be a dead sentence. The sentence becomes alive only when it conveys a meaning.

What does this mean? Even if we are quite convinced that the meaning 155 always relates to something, that it has value only to the extent that it refers to another meaning, it's clear that the life of a sentence is very deeply bound up with the fact that the subject is listening in, that he intends this meaning for himself. What makes the sentence as understood different from the sentence as not understood, which doesn't prevent it from being heard, is precisely what the phenomenology of delusion highlights so well, namely the anticipation of meaning.

It's of the nature of meaning, insofar as it takes shape, continually to tend to close itself off for the listener. In other words the contribution of the listener of the discourse to the listener who is uttering it is constant and there is a link between listening and speaking which isn't external, in the sense in which one hears oneself speak, but which is located at the level of the language phenomenon itself. It's at the level at which the signifier conveys meaning, and not at the sensory level of the phenomenon, that listening and speaking are like front and back. To listen to words, to give them one's hearing, is already more or less to obey them. To obey is nothing else, it's to be on the look-out, in listening.

Let me sum this up. The sense is always moving towards something, towards another meaning, towards the closure of meaning. It always refers to something that is out ahead or that turns back upon itself, but there is a direction. Does this mean that we have no endpoint? I'm sure that this point still remains uncertain in your mind given the insistence with which I state that meaning always refers to meaning. You are wondering whether the aim of discourse, which is not simply to cover over or even conceal the world of things, but to find a foothold there from time to time, would not in the end be an irremediable failure.

Now, in no way can we consider that the fundamental endpoint is to point to a thing. There is an absolute non-equivalence between discourse and pointing. Whatever you take the ultimate element of discourse to be reduced to, you will never be able to replace it with your index finger – recall the quite correct remark by Saint Augustine. If I designate something by pointing to it, no one will ever know whether my finger is designating the object's color or its matter, or whether it's designating a stain or a crack, etc. You need words, discourse, to discern this. Discourse has an original property in comparison with pointing. But that's not where we shall find the fundamental reference of discourse. Are we looking for where it stops? Well then, it's always at the level of this problematical term called being.

156 I don't want to give an overly philosophical discourse here but want to show you for example what I mean when I tell you that discourse is essentially directed at something for which we have no other term than being.

I ask you, then, to think about this for a moment. You are at the close of a stormy and tiring day, you regard the darkness that is beginning to fall upon your surroundings, and something comes to mind, embodied in the expression, the peace of the evening.

I don't think anybody who has a normal affective life is unaware that this is something that exists and has a completely different value from the phenomenal apprehension of the close of the clamor of the day, of an attenuation of contours and passions. There is in the peace of the evening both a presence and a choice from everything that surrounds you.

What link is there between the expression the peace of the evening and what you experience? It's not absurd to ask oneself whether beings who didn't give this peace of the evening a distinct existence, who didn't formulate it verbally, could distinguish it from any of the other registers under which temporal reality may be apprehended. This might be a panic feeling, for example, over the presence of the world, an agitation that you observe at that moment in the behavior of your cat which appears to be searching left and right for the presence of a ghost, or this anxiety which, although unknown to us, we attribute to primitive peoples over the setting of the sun, when we think they are perhaps afraid that the sun will not return – which, moreover, isn't unthinkable. In short, a feeling of disquiet, of a quest. There's something here – isn't there? – that leaves intact the question of what the relationship is between this order of being, which has its existence equivalent to all sorts of other existences in our lived experience, and which is called the peace of the evening, and its verbal expression.

We can now observe that something quite different happens according to whether we, who have called up this peace of the evening ourselves, have formulated this expression before uttering it, or whether it takes us by surprise or interrupts us, calming the movement of agitation that dwelled within us. It's precisely when we are not listening for it, when it's outside our field and suddenly hits us from behind, that it assumes its full value, surprised as we are by this more or less endophasic, more or less inspired, expression that comes to us like a murmur from without, a manifestation of discourse insofar as it barely belongs to us, which comes as an echo of what it is that is all of a sudden significant for us in this presence, an utterance such that we don't know whether it comes from without or from within – the peace of the evening.

Without going to the heart of the issue of the relationship between the 157 signifier, qua signifier of language, and something that without it would never be named, it's noticeable that the less we express it, the less we speak, the more it speaks to us. The more foreign we are to what is at issue in this being, the more it has a tendency to present itself to us, accompanied by this pacifying expression that presents itself as indeterminate, lying on the border between the field of our motor autonomy and this something that is said to us from outside, this something through which the world borders on speaking to us.

What does this being, or not, of language, this the peace of the evening, mean? To the extent that we're not expecting it, or wishing for it, or haven't even thought about it for a long time, it's essentially as a signifier that it presents itself to us. No experimentalist construction can justify its existence, there is a datum here, a certain way to take this time of the evening as a signifier, and we can be open to it or closed to it. And it's precisely insofar as we have been closed to it that we receive it through this peculiar echo phenomenon, or at least the start of it, which consists in the appearance, at the limit of the phenomenon's grip on us of what will most commonly be expressed for us by these words, the peace of the evening. We have now come to the limit at which discourse, if it opens onto anything beyond meaning, opens onto the signifier in the real. We shall never know, in the perfect ambiguity in which it dwells, what it owes to this marriage with discourse.

You can see how the more this signifier takes us by surprise, that is, in principle escapes us, the more it's already presented to us with a more or less appropriate fringe of discourse phenomena. Well then, the issue for us – this is the working hypothesis I propose – is to look for what there is at the center of President Schreber's experience, what he senses without knowing it at the edge of the field of his experience, at the fringe, carried away as he is in the froth created by this signifier he fails to perceive as one but which, at its limit, organizes all these phenomena.

I said last time that the continuity of this perpetual discourse is not only felt by the subject as a test of his capacities for discourse, but also as a challenge and a requirement in the absence of which he suddenly feels he is at the mercy of a rupture with the sole presence in the world that still exists at the time of his delusion, that of this absolute Other, this interlocutor who has 158 emptied the universe of any authentic presence. Where does the ineffable voluptuousness – a fundamental feature of the subject's life – which is attached to this discourse, stem from?

In this particularly true-to-life observation, and with an infrangible attachment to the truth, Schreber notes what happens when this discourse upon which he is painfully dependent ceases. Different phenomena from those of the continuous internal discourse arise – things slow down, there are interruptions, discontinuities, which the subject is forced to complement.

The withdrawal of the ambiguous and double god in question, who habitually presents himself in his so-called lower form, is accompanied by sensations that are very painful for the subject, but above all by four connotations of a linguistic order.[4]

In the first place, there is what he calls the bellowing-miracle. He is unable to contain a prolonged shout, which grips him so brutally that, as he himself notes, if at that instant he had had anything in his mouth it would have forced him to spit it out. He has to restrain himself if this is not to occur in public, and he is a long way from always being able to do so – quite a striking phenomenon if we see in this shouting the mouth's motor participation in speech reduced to its most extreme aspect. If there is anything by means of which speech comes to be combined with an absolutely a-signifying vocal function, and which nevertheless contains all possible signifiers, it must surely be what it is that makes us shiver in a dog's baying at the moon.

Secondly, there is the call for help, supposedly heard coming from the divine nerves that have become separated from God but that trail a sort of comet's tail behind them. In the first period, at the time of the tying-to-celestial-bodies, Schreber could not enter into effusive communion with the divine rays without having one or more tested souls leap into his mouth. But following a certain stabilization of his imaginary world, this no longer occurred. In contrast, anxiety-making phenomena recur when some of these animated entities that he is living in the midst of are, on God's withdrawal, left trailing and call out for help.

This phenomenon of the call for help is different from the bellowing. The bellowing is a pure signifier only, whereas the call for aid has a meaning, however elementary.

This isn't all. Thirdly, there are all sorts of noises from without, whatever they might be – something that happens in the corridor of the mental home, or a noise outside, a bark or a neigh which, he says, has been miracled, done expressly for him. It's always something that has a human meaning.

159 Between the vanishing meaning of the bellowing and the emission obtained from the call for help – which is not even his according to him, since it surprises him from without – we can observe a whole range of phenomena that are characterized by the outbreak of meaning. Schreber is well aware that these are real noises that he is accustomed to hearing in his surroundings, nevertheless he is convinced that they do not occur by chance just at that moment, but for his sake, on their return to abandonment in the external world, and in a way that corresponds to the intermediate periods of absorption in the delusional world.

The other miracles, for which he constructs an entire theory of divine creation, consist in the call of a number of living beings which in general are singing birds – as distinct from the speaking birds that form part of the divine entourage – that he sees in the garden. There are also known species of insects – the subject had an entomologist great grandfather – created quite intentionally for him by the omnipotence of divine speech. Thus between these two poles, the bellowing-miracle and the call for help, a transition occurs in which can be seen traces of the passage of the subject absorbed in an undeniably erotized link. The connotations are there – this is a male-female relationship.

The fundamental phenomenon of Schreber's delusion stabilized into an Unsinnig, nonsensical, field of erotized meanings. With time the subject managed to neutralize to its utmost the task he set himself, which consisted in completing the interrupted sentences. Any other way of responding, by questioning them or by insulting them, would not have been playing the game. It is necessary, he says, for me to be linked to the activity of God himself who speaks to me in his fundamental language, however absurd or humiliating the character of his questioning. Well then, whenever the subject leaves this enigmatic field, whenever a state occurs whose arrival one would think he must be wishing for as a respite, an illumination occurs on the fringe of the external world and goes through him with all the component elements of language in a dissociated form. On the one hand there is vocal activity in its most elementary form, even accompanied by a sort of feeling of disarray linked in the subject to a certain sense of shame. On the other hand there is a meaning that has the connotation of being a call for help, correlated at that moment with his abandonment and, subsequently, with this something which on our analysis ultimately appears much more hallucinatory than these language phenomena that on the whole remain entirely mysterious. Furthermore, he never calls them anything but internal speech.

induction of the divine words – transformed into threads of which he has a certain visual, or at least spatial, apprehension, they come towards him from the horizon, spin around inside his head, and finally stab into him from behind. All this leads us to think that this phenomenon, which is a prelude to the coming into play of the divine discourse as such, unfolds in what could be called a trans-space linked to the structure of the signifier and of meaning, a spatialization prior to any possible dualization of the phenomenon of language.

What happens when this phenomenon ceases is different. Reality becomes the support of other phenomena, those that are classically reduced to belief. If the term hallucination must be attributed to a transformation of reality, this is the only level at which we have the right to maintain it, if we are to preserve any coherence for our language. What indicates a hallucination is this unusual sense the subject has at the border between the sense of reality and the sense of unreality, a sense of proximate birth, of novelty – and not just of any novelty but of novelty over its use breaking through into the external world. This is not of the same order as what appears with respect to meaning or meaningfulness. It is a created reality, one that manifests itself well and truly within reality as something new. Hallucination, as the invention of reality, here constitutes the support for what the subject is experiencing.

I think today I've got you to grasp the schema I have tried to present, with all the problems it comprises.

We are inquiring into the sense to give the term hallucination. In order to be able to classify hallucinations in the appropriate way, it's best to observe them in the reciprocal contrasts, the complementary oppositions, that the subject himself points out. As a matter of fact, these oppositions form part of the one same subjective organization and, having been given by the subject, they have greater value than if they were provided by the observer. Moreover, one has to follow their progress over time.

I have tried to give you an idea of how in Schreber there is something that is always liable to surprise him, that never unveils itself, but is located in the order of his relations with language, of these language phenomena that the subject remains attached to by a very special compulsion and that constitute the center in which the resolution of his delusion finally results.

There is a subjective topology here based entirely upon the fact, given to us by analysis, that there may be an unconscious signifier. We need to know 161 how this unconscious signifier is situated in psychosis. It appears to be external to the subject, but it's another exteriority than the one that is evoked when hallucination and delusion are presented to us as a disturbance of reality, since the subject remains attached to it through an erotic fixation. Here we have to conceive of space speaking as such, so that the subject can't do without it without a dramatic transition in which hallucinatory phenomena appear, that is, in which reality itself is presented as affected and also as signifying.

This topographical notion tends in the same direction as the question already raised about the difference between Verwerfung and Verdrängung as to their subjective localization. What I've tried to get you to understand today constitutes a first approach to this opposition.

On the rejection of a primordial signifier

A TWIN THAT IS BIG WITH DELUSION DAY AND NIGHT
VERWERFUNG LETTER 52

We've been approaching the problem of the psychoses via the question of Freudian structures. This approach is a modest one, and it isn't actually going in the direction in which our investigations are pointing, namely that of the economy of the psychoses, which we are investigating through an analysis of the structure.

The structure appears in what can be called the phenomenon, in the strict sense of the term. It would be surprising if nothing of the structure were to appear in the way that, for example, the delusion presented itself. But our confidence in the analysis of the phenomenon is quite distinct from that of the phenomenological point of view, which strives to discover what it contains of reality in itself. From the point of view that guides us we don't have this a priori confidence in the phenomenon, for the simple reason that our way of proceeding is scientific and that it's the starting point of modern science not to trust the phenomena and to look for something more subsistent behind them that explains them.

One must not retreat from this word. If some time ago psychiatry took a backward step that consisted in distrusting explanation so as to extol understanding, it was because the explanatory path had led to dead ends. But we ourselves have evidence of the explanatory efficacity of analytic investigation, and it's on the assumption that here, too, an appropriate analysis of the phenomenon will lead us to the structure and the economy that we shall make advances in the domain of the psychoses.

It is not for the simple pleasures of the nosographer that we're grappling with the distinction between the neuroses and the psychoses. This distinction is only too evident. It's by comparing the two that relationships, symmetries, 164 and contrasts will appear that will enable us to erect an admissible structure for psychosis.

Our starting point is this – the unconscious is present but not functioning. Contrary to what has been thought, the fact that it's present doesn't imply a solution but, on the contrary, a very special inertia. Furthermore, psychoanalysis doesn't consist in making thought conscious or in making the ego's defenses less paradoxical, so as to obtain what is rashly called its strengthening. This rejection of the two paths psychoanalysis took, first at its emergence and then in its present, deviated state, is almost self-evident when one explores the psychoses.

In the forthcoming journal of our Society, in its first number on language and speech, you will find this statement in the foreword – If psychoanalysis inhabits language, in its discourse it cannot misrecognize it with impunity. This is the whole sense of what I have been teaching you for a number of years, and this is where we are with respect to the psychoses. The emphasis on, the importance given to, language phenomena in psychosis is for us the most fruitful lesson of all.

The question of the ego is obviously primordial in the psychoses since the ego in its function of relating to the external world is what breaks down. It's therefore not free of paradox to want to give it the power to handle the relationship with reality and transform it for the aims of what is defined as defense.

Defense, in the cursory form in which it's currently understood, is said to be at the origin of paranoia. The ego, which is gaining in strength in the modern conception of analysis, in effect having the power to bring the external world into play in various ways, is in the case of psychosis said to cause a signal, intended as a warning, to appear in the external world in the form of a hallucination. Here we rediscover this archaic idea that a pressure [poussée] emerges which is perceived by the ego as dangerous.

165 I should like to remind you here of the sense of what I say regarding the ego and to phrase it in another way.

Whatever the appropriate role to attribute to it in psychical economy is, the ego is never alone. It always implies a strange twin, the ideal ego, which I spoke of in my seminar two years ago.[1] The most apparent phenomenology of psychosis tells us that this ideal ego speaks. It's a fantasm [fantaisie], but unlike the fantasm, or fantasy [fantasme], that we highlight in the phenomena of neurosis it's a fantasm that speaks, or more exactly, it's a spoken fantasm. This is where this character who echoes the subject's thoughts, who intervenes, spies upon him, names his actions in the sequence in which they occur, and commands them is not adequately explained by the theory of the imaginary and the specular ego.

I tried last time to show you that the ego, whatever we make of its function, and I shall go no further than to give it the function of a discourse of reality, always implies as a correlate a discourse that has nothing to do with reality. With the impertinence that, as everyone knows, is characteristic of me I designated this the discourse of freedom, essential to modern man insofar as he is structured by a certain conception of his own autonomy. I pointed out its fundamentally biased and incomplete [partiel et partial], inexpressible, fragmentary, differentiated, and profoundly delusional nature. I set out from this general parallel to point out to you what, in relation to the ego, is apt, in the subject fallen prey to psychosis, to proliferate into a delusion. I'm not saying it's the same thing. I'm saying it's in the same place.

There is, then, no ego without this twin that is, let's say, big with delusion. Our patient, who provides us with valuable images from time to time, says at one stage that he is a leprous corpse leading another leprous corpse along behind him.[2] A nice image indeed of the ego, since there is in the ego something that is fundamentally dead and always lined with this twin discourse. The question we are asking ourselves is this – how does it happen that this double, which only ever makes the ego half of the subject, becomes a speaking double? Who is speaking?

Is it the other whose function of reflection in the dialectic of narcissism I have expounded, the other of the imaginary part of the master-slave dialectic which we have sought in the transitivism of children, in the games of prestige in which the integration of the socius is put into effect, the other whom the captivating action of the total image in the counterpart encapsulates so well? Is it really this reflected other, this imaginary other, this other that for us is every counterpart in so far as he gives us our own image, captivates us by an 166 appearance, and provides the projection of our totality – is it he who is speaking?

The question is worth raising. One implicitly resolves it each time one mentions the mechanism of projection.

Projection doesn't always have the same sense, but for our part we restrict it to this imaginary transitivism by means of which when a child hits his counterpart he can say without lying – He hit me, because for him it's exactly the same thing. This defines an imaginary order of relations that is constantly found in all sorts of mechanisms. In this sense there is a type of jealousy by projection, one that projects onto the other the subject's unfaithful tendencies, or the accusations of unfaithfulness that he himself has to bear.

It's a rudimentary observation that delusional projection has nothing in common with this. One may well say that it, too, is a mechanism of projection in the sense that something whose source is within the subject appears without, but it's certainly not the same as the one I have just presented to you as the transitivism of evil intentions, which is much closer to so-called common or normal jealousy. One need only examine the phenomena to see this, and the distinction is fully drawn in Freud's own writings on jealousy. The mechanisms at work in psychosis are not limited to the imaginary register.

Where shall we look for them, given that they escape libidinal investment? Is it sufficient to appeal to libidinal reinvestment of the body? This mechanism, commonly held to be that of narcissism, is explicitly invoked by Freud himself to explain the phenomenon of psychosis. Briefly put, in order to mobilize the delusional relationship, it's supposed to be a matter of nothing other than enabling him, as one so quickly says, to become an object again.

From one angle this coincides with a number of the phenomena involved, but it doesn't exhaust the problem. Each and every one of us knows, provided he's a psychiatrist, that in a fully developed paranoiac there is no question of mobilizing this investment, while in schizophrenics the properly psychotic disturbance is as a rule much more extensive than in the paranoiac.

Wouldn't this be because in the imaginary order there is no way of giving a precise meaning to the term narcissism? Alienation is constitutive of the imaginary order. Alienation is the imaginary as such. Nothing is to be expected from the way psychosis is explored at the level of the imaginary, since the 167 imaginary mechanism is what gives psychotic alienation its form but not its dynamics.

This is the point we always get to together, and if we don't get there unarmed, if we don't give in, it's precisely because in our exploration of analytic technique, and then of beyond the pleasure principle with the structural definition of the ego that it implies, we have the idea that beyond the little other of the imaginary we have to admit the existence of another Other.

It's not only because we give it a capital letter that we are satisfied with it, but because we locate it as the necessary correlate of speech.

These premises alone cast doubt on a theory of analytic treatment that with ever-increasing insistence is reduced to a relation of two. It's henceforth captivated in the relationship between the subject's ego and the ideal ego, between the ego and the other, an other whose qualities may no doubt vary, but who will always be – experience proves it – the one unique other of the imaginary relation.

As for the supposed object relation that is to be rehabilitated, the subject is reduced to a curious experience that could be called the Kleinian substructure of the imaginary, namely, the oral complex. Of course, in a subject who isn't inclined towards alienation of his own accord this can only persist on the basis of a misunderstanding constituted by a sort of imaginary incorporation or devouring which, given that the analytic relation is a relation of speech, can only be an incorporation of the analyst's discourse. On this deviant conception analysis can't be anything other than the incorporation of the suggested, even supposed, discourse of the analyst – that is, the exact contrary of analysis.

I'm lighting my lantern and I shall therefore tell you my thesis. I'm going to tell it to you the wrong way round – that is, by situating it on this genetic level that seems to be so necessary for you to feel at ease. I shall tell you afterwards that this isn't it, but still, let's begin by saying that if this were it then it would be as I'm about to say it is.

It's a question of a thesis involving the entire psychical economy, which is important for an understanding of the confused debates still going on over the Kleinian fantasmatic, for the refutation of certain objections made against 168 it, and also for better situating what it can truly or fruitfully contribute to an understanding of the precocity of the repressions it implies. As a matter of fact, contrary to what Freud says, that there is no repression properly so-called before the decline of the Oedipus complex, the Kleinian theory on the other hand entails the claim that repression exists right from the earliest pre-oedipal stages.

My thesis may equally throw light on a contradiction concerning autoerotism that appears insoluble in Freud himself. On the one hand he talks about the primitive object of the first mother-child relation. On the other he formulates the notion of primordial autoerotism, that is to say, of a stage, however short we suppose it to be, in which there is no external world for the child.[3]

The question is that of the human being's primordial access to his reality insofar as we assume that there is a reality correlative to him – an assumption always implied at the outset of this theme, but which we also know that we shall have in part to abandon, because there would be no question about this reality were it itself not constantly being called into question. Is there anything in man that has this both enveloping and coapted character which causes us to invent the notion of Umwelt for animals?

I point out to you in passing that we make use of this hypothesis concerning animals to the extent that an animal is for us an object and that there are conditions that are in fact strictly indispensable to its existence. We're happy to investigate how an animal functions so as always to be in harmony with these primordial conditions, and this is what we call an instinct, an instinctual cycle or instinctual behavior – if there are things that aren't in there, one has to assume that we can't see them, and since we can't see them we're happy, and in fact why shouldn't we be?

It's very clear that this is inadequate where man is concerned. The open and proliferating nature of his world prevents us from making it into his biological correlate. This is where I try, because it seems coherent and useful for me to do so, to differentiate for you between the three orders of the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real. It's abundantly clear that everything that our analytic experience shows us can be satisfactorily classified into these three orders of relationships, the question being at what moment each of these relationships is established.

My thesis, and perhaps it will give the answer to the enigma that for some of you my purple passage of last time on the peace of the evening seems to have consisted in, is as follows – reality is at the outset marked by symbolic nihilation [néantisation].

169 Although all of last year's work prepared us for it, I'm nevertheless going to illustrate it once again, even if only so as to come back to this peace of the evening that got such a mixed reception.

This is not a detour that, as Plato says, is discordant or lacking in analytic tone. I don't think I'm being at all innovative. If you read Freud's text on President Schreber you will see that, as a clinical argument for understanding the said President, he explores the function that Nietzsche's saga in his Zarathustra, called Before the dawn, played for another patient of his.[4] If you refer to this moment – it was precisely so as not to read it out to you that I indulged in this invocation of the peace of the evening – you will see the same thing represented I wanted to bring to your attention a week ago, which I'm going to put to you again now in speaking to you about daytime.

The day is a being distinct from all the objects it contains and manifests, it's probably even more weighty and more present than any of them, and it's impossible to think of it, even in the most primitive human experience, as the simple return of an experience.

It suffices to mention the prevalence of a rhythm of sleep in the first few months of human life for us to have all sorts of reasons to believe that it isn't due to any empirical apprehension that at a given moment – this is how I illustrate the initial symbolic nihilations – the human being detaches itself from the day. The human being is not, as everything leads us to think is the case for the animal, simply immersed in a phenomenon such as that of the alternation of day and night. The human being poses the day as such, and the day thereby becomes presence of the day – against a background that is not a background of concrete nighttime, but of possible absence of daytime, where the night dwells, and vice versa moreover. Very early on, day and night are signifying codes, not experiences. They are connotations, and the empirical and concrete day only comes forth as an imaginary correlative, originally, very early on.

That's my supposition, and seeing that I speak from the genetic point of view, I don't otherwise have to justify it in experience. It's structurally necessary to admit a primitive stage in which the world of signifiers as such appears.

Since this level leaves you somewhat confused, I will put things to you dogmatically, which I detest doing – you know my style is dialectical.

Before a child can learn to articulate language, we have to assume that signifiers, which are already of the symbolic order, have appeared. When I speak of a primitive appearance of the signifier, this is something that already 170 implies language. All this does is link up with the emergence of this being that is nowhere, the day. The day qua day is not a phenomenon, the day qua day implies symbolic connotation, the fundamental alternation of the vocal connoting presence and absence, on which Freud hinges his whole notion of beyond the pleasure principle.

It's exactly this field of symbolic articulation that I'm currently aiming at in my discourse, and it's here that Verwerfung occurs.

I'm delighted by the fact that some of you are bothered by this subject of Verwerfung. After all, Freud doesn't mention it very often, and I have gone and dug it out of the two or three crannies where the tip of an ear is showing, and even sometimes those where nothing at all is showing, but where the comprehension of the text demands that one assume it is there.

On the subject of Verwerfung, Freud says that the subject did not want to know anything about castration, even in the sense of repression.[5] As a matter of fact, in the sense of repression one still knows something about the very thing one doesn't want, in some sense, to know anything about, and the whole of analysis consists in showing us that one knows it very well indeed. If there are things the patient wants to know nothing about, even in the sense of repression, another mechanism is implied. And as the word Verwerfung appears in direct connection with this sentence as well as several pages before, I grab it. I set no great store by the term, I set store by what it means, and this is what I believe Freud meant.

It has been objected to me, most pertinently I must say, that the closer one gets to the text the less one manages to understand it. This is indeed why a text has to be brought to life by what follows and by what precedes. It's always by means of what follows that a text has to be understood.

Those who make the most objections to me suggest, incidentally, that I look in some of Freud's other texts at something that might not be Verwerfung but, for instance, Verleugnung – it's strange to see the proliferation of this Ver in Freud. I have never given you any purely semantic lesson on Freud's vocabulary, but I assure you that I could serve up a good dozen of them straightaway. I would begin by talking about the banking connotations of all these terms, conversion, displacement,[6] etc., and this would take us a long way, right into the major implications of this direct approach Freud had to the phenomena of neurosis. But we can't spend forever on these different approaches. Trust me a bit concerning this work on the sense. I have chosen Verwerfung to make myself understood because it's the fruit of long reflection, my work leads me to it. At least for a while, take my honey such as I offer it to you and try to put it to some use.

171 This Verwerfung is implicated in the text Die Verneinung, which M. Jean Hyppolite presented here two years ago, and this is why I have chosen to publish his presentation in the first number of the review La Psychanalyse.[7] There you will be able to see, with text in hand, whether or not we were right, Hyppolite and I, to set off down the path of Verneinung.

Freud's text, undeniably brilliant, is far from being satisfactory. It mixes everything up. This has nothing to do with a Verdrängung.

What is at issue when I speak of Verwerfung? At issue is the rejection of a primordial signifier into the outer shadows, a signifier that will henceforth be missing at this level. Here you have the fundamental mechanism that I posit as being at the basis of paranoia. It's a matter of a primordial process of exclusion of an original within, which is not a bodily within but that of an initial body of signifiers.

It's inside this primordial body that Freud posits the constitution of a world of reality, which is already punctuated, already structured, in terms of signifiers. Freud then describes the entire operation by which representation and these already constituted objects are brought together. The subject's initial apprehension of reality is the judgment of existence, which consists in saying – This is not my dream or my hallucination or my representation but an object.

It's a matter of testing the external by the internal – it's Freud saying this, not me–, a matter of the constitution of the subject's reality in a refinding of the object. The object is refound in a quest, and moreover the object one refinds is never the same. This constitution of reality, essential to the explanation of all mechanisms of repetition is registered on the basis of an initial bipartition, one that curiously coincides with certain primitive myths that evoke something primordially crippled that has been introduced into the subject's access to human reality. Here you have what is presupposed by this unusual priority that in Die Verneinung Freud attributes to what he explains analogically as a judgment of attribution, as distinct from a judgment of existence. There is in Freud's dialectic an initial division into the good and the bad that can only be understood if we interpret it as the rejection of a primordial signifier.

[7] See above, chap. 1, p. 12 n.9.

What does primordial signifier mean? It's clear that it quite precisely means nothing.

What I'm explaining to you here has all the characteristics of the myth that I was tempted to mention on that occasion and that M. Marcel Griaule recounted to you last year – namely, the division into four of the primeval placenta. The first was the fox who, tearing out his portion of the placenta, introduced an imbalance from which there stemmed the cycle that would involve the division of the fields, the bonds of kinship, etc.[8] What I'm 172 recounting to you is also a myth, for I in no way believe that there is anywhere at all a moment, a stage, at which the subject first acquires the primitive signifier, that subsequently the play of meanings is introduced, and that after that, signifier and signified having linked arms, we then enter the domain of discourse.

All the same, there is a representation here that is so indispensable that I feel comfortable about giving it to you, so as to satisfy your demands, but also because Freud himself tends in this direction – we shall have to wait and see how.

In his Letter 52 to Fliess, Freud returns to the circuit of the psychical apparatus.[9]

You are, I hope, familiar with the Fliess correspondence, which has been delivered to us by certain testamentary or testimonial hands with a series of cuts and expurgations that, whatever their justification, the reader cannot fail to feel is scandalous. Nothing can justify the cutting of a text at the point at which the remainder, even if it were regarded as outdated and weaker, might enlighten us on Freud's thought.

The psychical apparatus that preoccupies Freud isn't the psychical apparatus as conceived by a professor behind a table and in front of a blackboard, who modestly gives you a model which, all things considered, looks like it might work – whether it works well or poorly, it doesn't much matter, what is important is to have said something that seems in some simple way to resemble what is known as reality. For Freud, it's a matter of the psychical apparatus of his patients, not of the ideal individual, and it's this that introduces him to this really astounding productiveness that we see here, even more than anywhere else, in this famous Letter 52. What he is seeking to explain is not just any old psychical state, but that from which he set out, because it alone is accessible and proves to be fruitful in the experience of the treatment – the phenomena of memory. The schema of the psychical apparatus in Freud is invented to explain phenomena of memory, that is, what isn't going well.

[8] This is no doubt the lecture Griaule gave on 15 March 1955 to the Société Française de Psychanalyse entitled "Symbolization of the World and the Conditions of Communication in the Sudanese." See Sem II:161.

[9] Letter of 6 December 1896, Freud-Fliess, 207–15; Letter 52, Origins, 173–81.

You must not think that the general theories of memory that have been proposed are particularly satisfactory. Because you're psychoanalysts you're not excused from reading the works of psychologists, some have done some 173 sensible things, have discovered some remarkable discrepancies in valuable experiments – you will see their difficulty, the twists and turns they perform, in trying to explain the phenomenon of reminiscence.[10] However, Freudian experience shows that the memory which interests psychoanalysis is quite distinct from what psychologists speak of when they display its mechanism to us in an animate being in an experiment.

I shall illustrate what I mean.

The octopus. It's the most beautiful animal there is. It has played a fundamental role in Mediterranean civilizations. Nowadays it's very easy to catch. You put it into a little jar, insert electrodes, and watch. The octopus extends its limbs and, suddenly, it retracts them. And one observes that it's very soon wary of our electrodes. So we dissect it and we discover, in what serves as its head, a large nerve, large not only in size but also in the diameter of the neurons, visible under the microscope. This is what serves as its memory, that is, if you sever it in the live octopus, the apprehension of experience works much less well, a deterioration is produced in the registrations of memory, which is why it's thought this is the seat of its memory. And nowadays people tell themselves that perhaps the octopus's memory functions like a little machine, in that it's something that goes round in circles.

I'm not in the process here of distinguishing man from the animal, since what I teach you is that in man, too, memory is something that goes round in circles. However, it's made up of messages, it's a succession of little signs of plus or minus, which file in one after the other and go round and round like the little electric lights on the Place de l'Opéra that go on and off.

This is what human memory is. However, the primary process, the plea-

[10] In psychology "réminiscence" has the meaning of an image that comes to mind without being recognized as a memory.

sure principle, means that the psychoanalytic memory Freud talks about is, contrary to that of the octopus, something completely inaccessible to experience. What else would it mean to say that desires in the unconscious are never extinguished, because those that do become extinguished are by definition never spoken of again? There are some that are never extinguished and continue to circulate in memory. In the name of the pleasure principle, they cause the human being to recommence the same painful experiences, in cases in which things are connected to one another in memory in such a way as to persist in the unconscious. What I'm saying here is only the simple expression of what you already know in principle, but which of course is what you know as if you didn't know it. I'm not only trying to make you know it, but 174 also to get you to recognize that you know it.

Freudian memory is not located along a sort of continuum from reaction to reality considered as a source of excitation. It's striking that we have to go to all this trouble whereas this is all Freud ever speaks of – disorder, restriction, registration – this is not only the vocabulary of this letter, this is the very thing at issue. What is essentially new in my theory, says Freud, is the claim that memory is not simple, it's registered in various ways.[11]

So what are these different registers? It's here above all that this letter brings grist to my mill, which I regret, because you're going to jump on it and you're going to say to yourselves – Yes, it's like this in this letter, but in the next one it's not like this. It's in all the letters. It's the very soul of the development of Freud's thought. Otherwise a mass of things would be inexplicable. He would have become Jungian, for example.

So what are these registers? You're going to see something appear that you've never seen before, because until now there have been for you the unconscious, the preconscious, and the conscious. It's been known for a long time that the phenomenon of consciousness and the phenomenon of memory exclude one another. Freud stated it not only in this letter, but also in the system of the psychical apparatus he gives at the end of The Interpretation of Dreams.[12] It's for him a truth that absolutely cannot be called experimental, it's a necessity that imposes itself on him from the point of view of handling the system as a whole, and at the same time one feels that there is here an initial signifying a priori in his thought.

At the beginning of the circuit of psychical apprehension there is perception. This perception implies consciousness. This must be something like what he shows us in his famous metaphor of the magic writing pad.[13]

The magic writing pad is made of a sort of bluish-grey substance on which [11] Freud-Fliess, 207; Origins, 173.

[12] See SE 5:536ff.
[13] See "A Note upon the 'Mystic Writing-Pad.' "

there sits a strip of transparent paper. You write on the strip of paper and when you lift it up there is nothing there anymore, it remains blank. On the other hand, everything you have written down reappears on the surface of the slightly adhesive substance, which enables what you write to be recorded by virtue of the fact that the tip of your pencil makes the paper adhere to this surface which, becoming darkened slightly, becomes momentarily visible. There you have, as you know, the basic metaphor by which Freud explains what he understands by the workings of perception in connection with memory.

What memory? The memory he is interested in. There are two zones in 175 this memory, that of the unconscious and that of the preconscious, and after the preconscious one sees a complete consciousness emerge which cannot but be articulated.

The requirements of his own conception of things are manifest in the fact that between the essentially ephemeral Wahrnehmungen [perceptions], which disappear as soon as they appear, and the constitution of the system of consciousness and, even at this stage, of the ego – he calls it the official ego, and official in German means the same as officiel in French, in the dictionary it's not even translated – there are the Niederschriften [registrations], of which there are three. Here we witness Freud's development of an initial apprehension of what memory might be in its analytic functioning.

Freud gives a number of chronological divisions – that there are systems formed for example between birth and one and a half, then between one and a half and four years of age, then between four and eight, etc. But despite his saying this, we aren't required to believe, any more than we did before, that these registers are constituted successively.

Why distinguish them from one another and how do they become apparent? They become apparent in the defense system, which consists in the fact that things that don't give us pleasure don't reappear in any of the registers. Thus here we are in the official economy, and this is where we don't recall what doesn't give us pleasure. This is absolutely normal. Call it defense, but it isn't pathological for all that. It's even what one has to do – if we forget things that are disagreeable to us we can only come out ahead. A notion of defense that doesn't start from this falsifies the entire question. What gives defense its pathological character is the fact that, around the famous affective regression, topographical regression takes place. A pathological defense, when produced in an uncontrolled fashion, provokes unjustifiable reverberations, because what goes for one system doesn't go for another. The disturbance stems from this confusion between mechanisms, and it's from this point on that we speak of a system of pathological defense.

To understand it properly we shall begin with the best known phenomenon, from which Freud always started, the one that explains the existence of the system Unbewusstsein.

The mechanism of topographical regression here is perfectly clear at the level of finished discourse, which is that of the official ego. Here one finds agreements and coherences between discourse, signifier, and signified superimposed upon one another, forming the intentions, the plaints, the obscurity, the confusion, in which we live and due to which, whenever we spell something out, we always have this feeling of discordance, of never being completely up to what we want to say. This is the reality of discourse. We are nevertheless well aware that the signified is sufficiently captured by our discourse for everyday purposes. It's when we want to do a bit better, to get to the truth, that we are in total disarray, and rightly so. It is, moreover, why most of the time we give up the game. 176

There is indeed a relationship between meaning and the signifier, it is what the structure of discourse supplies. Discourse, which is what you hear when you listen to me, and it does exist – the proof is that sometimes you don't understand it –, is a signifying temporal chain. But at the level of neurosis, which brought about the discovery of the realm of the Freudian unconscious qua register of memory, our good fellow, instead of using words, uses everything at his disposal – he empties his pockets, he turns his trousers inside out, he puts his functions, his inhibitions inside, he gets completely inside himself, with the signifier, it's he who becomes the signifier. His real, or his imaginary, enters into the discourse.

If this isn't what a neurosis is, if this isn't what Freud taught, then I give up.

In the problematic field of the phenomena of Verneinung, phenomena occur that must originate in a fall in level, in the passage from one register to another, and that curiously manifest themselves with the characteristic of the negated and the disavowed – it's as if they are not existent. This is a very early property of language, since the symbol is as such the connotation of presence and absence.

This doesn't exhaust the question of the function of negation within language. There is an illusion of privation that stems from the ordinary usage of negation. Moreover, all languages possess a whole range of negations, each worthy of separate study – negation in French, negation in Chinese, etc.

What's important is this. What appears to be a simplification in discourse harbors dynamics which escape us, are secret. There is an illusion in thinking that a Verneinung is observable simply in the fact that apropos of a dream the subject stresses, It's not my father. Everyone's familiar with this, the subject is noticeably affected by the interpretation and ends up saying that it's his father, and as we're happy with this, we don't go any further. The subject says to you – I don't want to tell you something that is unpleasant. Here it's quite different. He says it nicely, but through dynamics whose immediacy is perceptible, he is in effect engaged in saying something unpleasant. It's because 177 we experience this that we are alert to the mystery that this illusion of privation can represent. Think of what Kant calls a negative value in its function, not only of privation, but of subtraction, in its true positivity.

The question of Verneinung remains entirely unresolved. What's important is to notice that Freud was only able to understand it by relating it to something more primitive. He expressly acknowledges in his Letter 52 that the primordial Verneinung comprises an initial putting into signs, Wahrnehmungszeichen. He admits the existence of this field I am calling that of the primordial signifier. Everything he subsequently says in this letter about the dynamics of the three great neuropsychoses that he applies himself to – hysteria, obsessional neurosis, paranoia – presupposes the existence of this primordial stage, which is the chosen locus of what for you I am calling Verwerfung.

In order to understand this, consider something that Freud is constantly pointing out, namely that one has to assume a prior, and at least partial, organization of language in order for memory and historicization to work. The memory phenomena that Freud is interested in are always language phenomena. In other words, one already has to have the signifying material to make anything signify at all. In The Wolf Man the primitive impression of the famous primordial scene has remained over the years, serving no purpose, though already signifying, before having its word to say in the subject's history. The signifier is thus primitively given, but it remains nothing as long as the subject doesn't cause it to enter into his history, which becomes important between the ages of one and a half and four and a half. Sexual desire is effectively what man uses to historicize himself, insofar as it's at this level that the law is introduced for the first time.

You now see the general economy of what Freud gives us with his simple schema in this little letter. This is confirmed by a hundred other texts. One of you, whom I have praised for having contradicted what is being developed here, pointed out to me that the end of the text on "Fetishism" refers quite directly to what I'm now explaining to you. There Freud makes an essential revision to the distinction he had drawn between neurosis and psychosis, saying that in the psychoses reality is reworked, that a part of reality is suppressed, and that reality is never truly scotomized.[14] Ultimately, and you will see this from the context, it's to a deficiency, to a hole in the symbolic, that he is referring, even if in the German text it's the term reality that is used.

178 Haven't you seen what the primordial phenomenon is when I present concrete cases to you of people who have recently plunged into psychosis? I showed you a person who thought he had been receiving advances from a character who had become his friend and the essential point of attachment in his existence. This character withdrew, and then there he was in a state of perplexity linked to a correlate of certainty, which is how the approach to the prohibited field announces itself, access to which on its own constitutes the onset of psychosis.

How does one enter psychosis? How is the subject led, not into alienating himself in the little other, but into becoming this something which, from within the field in which nothing can be said, appeals to all the rest, to the field of everything that can be said? Isn't this something that evokes what you see displayed in the case of President Schreber – namely, these fringe phenomena at the level of reality which have become significant for the subject?

Psychotics love their delusion like they love themselves.[15] Having said this, Freud, who hadn't yet written his article on narcissism, added that the entire mystery lies here. This is true. What is the relationship between the subject and the signifier that is distinctive of the very phenomena of psychosis? How come the subject falls entirely into this problematic?

These are the issues that we are raising this year and I hope we are able to make some headway with them before the long vacation.

ON THE SIGNIFIER AND THE SIGNIFIED

XII

The hysteric's question

ON THE PREVERBAL WORLD
PRECONSCIOUS AND UNCONSCIOUS
SIGN, TRACE, SIGNIFIER
A TRAUMATIC HYSTERIA

We've got to the point where the analysis of Schreber's text has led us to emphasize the importance of language phenomena in the economy of psychosis. It is in this sense that one may speak of Freudian structures of the psychoses.

What function do these language phenomena have in the psychoses?

It would be surprising if psychoanalysis didn't offer us a new way of treating the economy of language in the psychoses, a way that differs through and through from the traditional approach, which refers to classical psychological theories. Our own point of reference is different – it is our schema of analytic communication.

Between S and O, the fundamental speech that analysis must uncover, we have the interference of the imaginary circuit, which resists its passage. The imaginary poles of the subject, o and o', coincide with the said specular relation, that of the mirror stage. The subject, in the corporeity and multiplicity of his organism, in his natural fragmentation, which is in o', refers to this imaginary unity that is the ego, o, where he knows himself and misrecognizes himself [se connaît et se méconnaît], and which is what he speaks about – he doesn't know to whom, since he doesn't know who speaks in him either.

I used to say schematically, in the archaic period of these seminars, that the subject begins by talking about himself, he doesn't talk to you – then, he 182 talks to you but he doesn't talk about himself – when he talks about himself, who will have noticeably changed in the interval, to you, we will have got to the end of the analysis.

If one wants to position the analyst within this schema of the subject's speech, one can say that he is somewhere in O. At least he should be. If he enters into the coupling of the resistance, which is just what he is taught not to do, then he speaks from o' and he will see himself in the subject. This occurs in the most natural of ways if he has not been analyzed – which does happen occasionally, and I'd even say that in a certain way the analyst is never fully an analyst, for the simple reason that he is a man, and that he, too, partakes of the imaginary mechanisms that are obstacles to the passage of speech. He must not identify with the subject, he must be dead enough not to be caught up in the imaginary relation, within which he is always solicited to intervene, and allow the progressive migration of the subject's image towards the S, the thing to be revealed, the thing that has no name, that can only find its name to the extent that the circuit from S to O has been completed directly. What the subject has to say through his false discourse will find a passage all the more easily when the economy of the imaginary relation has been progressively pared down.

I'm moving quickly, since I'm not here today to go over the whole theory of analytic dialogue for you. I simply want to indicate to you that the word – to be understood with the emphasis that this comprises, the solution to an enigma, a problematic function – is located in the Other, through the intermediary of which all full speech is realized, this you are in which the subject locates himself and recognizes himself.

Well then, through analyzing the structure of Schreber's delusion at the time it became stabilized into a system that links the subject's ego to this imaginary other, this strange god who understands nothing, who doesn't reply, who deceives the subject, we have been able to recognize that in psychosis the Other, where being is realized through the avowal of speech, is excluded.

The phenomena in question in verbal hallucination exhibit in their very structure the subject's relationship of internal echo to his own discourse. They ultimately become increasingly meaningless, as Schreber puts it, emptied of sense, purely verbal, learned by rote, pointless refrains. What, then, is this special relationship to speech? What does the subject lack for him to be able to get to the point where it is necessary for him to construct this entire imaginary world, for him to undergo within himself this automatism of the function of discourse? Not only does discourse invade him, not only is it a parasite in him, but he is dependent on its presence.

183 I've shown you in vivo in a case presentation that the subject is only able in psychosis to reconstitute himself in what I've called the imaginary allusion. This is precisely the point we have come to. The subject's constitution in imaginary allusion is the problem on which we need to make progress.

Until now people have been satisfied with this. The imaginary allusion has seemed to be very significant. People have rediscovered all the material, all the elements, of the unconscious in it. They seem never to have wondered what was significant from the economic point of view about the fact that by itself this allusion has no power to resolve anything. They were aware of this nevertheless, but as a mystery, and over time they strove to efface the radical differences between this structure and the structure of the neuroses.

I was asked the same questions in Strasbourg as in Vienna. People who seemed fairly open to certain views I was putting forward ended up saying to me – How do you work with psychotics? – as if stressing the ABC of technique wasn't enough, with an audience as unprepared as that one was. I replied – The question is still somewhat in progress. We have to try to locate some reference points before we can discuss technique, let alone any psychotherapeutic recipes. They persisted – Nevertheless, one can't just do nothing for them. – No, certainly not. Before we discuss this, let's wait until certain things have been made clear.

To take a further step forward here, we must, as is often the case, take a step back and return to the fascinating character offered by language phenomena in psychosis – as it happens, this is liable to reinforce what just now I called a misunderstanding.

I hear it said that I hold that everything the subject communicates he expresses in words and thus that I deny the existence, to which people are much attached, of the preverbal.

This extreme position doesn't fail to produce, in those who dwell on this, fairly lively recantations, which manifest themselves in two attitudes – the hand on the heart, related to what we shall call the authentic attestation through a displacement upwards, and the bowing of the head, supposed to be weighed in the balance, which I reputedly unload too much at the wishes of my interpellator.

People sometimes also say to me – Fortunately you're not alone in the Société de psychanalyse. There's also a woman of genius, Françoise Dolto, who shows us 184 the essential function of the image of the body and throws light on the way the subject leans on it in his relations with the world. We are delighted to rediscover a substantial relation here, which the language relation is undoubtedly tacked onto, but it is infinitely more concrete.

I'm not at all criticizing what Françoise Dolto teaches. She makes excellent use of her technique and her extraordinary apprehension of the subject's imaginary sensibility. She speaks of all this and she also teaches those who listen to her to speak of it. But making this remark doesn't resolve the question.

I'm not surprised that something of a misunderstanding remains to be dispelled, even in people who think they're following me. Don't think I'm expressing any disappointment here. That would be to be in disagreement with myself, since I teach you that misunderstanding is the very basis of interhuman discourse.

But that is not the only reason that I'm not surprised that my discourse may have created a certain margin of misunderstanding. This is because in addition, if one is to be consistent in practice with one's own ideas, if all valid discourse has to be judged precisely according to its own principles, I would say that it is with a deliberate, if not entirely deliberated, intention that I pursue this discourse in such a way as to offer you the opportunity to not quite understand. This margin enables you yourselves to say that you think you follow me, that is, that you remain in a problematic position, which always leaves the door open to a progressive rectification.

In other words, if I were to try to make myself very easily understood, so that you were completely certain that you followed, then according to my premises concerning interhuman discourse the misunderstanding would be irremediable. On the contrary, given the way I think that I have to approach problems, you always have the possibility of what is said being open to revision, in a way that is made all the easier by the fact that it will fall back upon me entirely if you haven't been following sooner – you can hold me responsible.

It is on this basis that today I shall take the liberty of going back over an essential point.

I'm not saying that what is communicated in the analytic relation passes through the subject's discourse. I am therefore absolutely not required to distinguish, in the very phenomenon of analytic communication, between the domains of verbal and preverbal communication. That this pre- or even 185 extraverbal communication is always present in analysis is not in doubt, but it is a question of seeing what it is that constitutes the properly analytic field.

What constitutes the analytic field is identical with what constitutes the analytic phenomenon, namely the symptom – and also a very large number of other phenomena that are called normal or subnormal, the sense of which wasn't elucidated before analysis, and that extend well beyond discourse and speech, since they involve things that happen to the subject in his daily life, like slips, memory disturbances, dreams, and the phenomenon of jokes, whose value to the Freudian discovery is essential because it enables the perfect coherence in Freud's work between the analytic phenomenon and language to be isolated.

Let's start by saying what the analytic phenomenon is not.

Analysis has thrown an immense amount of light on the preverbal. In analytic doctrine this is linked essentially to the preconscious. It is the sum of internal and external impressions, of information the subject receives from the world he lives in, of the natural relations he has with it – assuming that there are any relations in man that are entirely natural – some are, however perverted they may be. Everything of the order of this preverbal thus partakes of what we can call an intraworldly Gestalt, within which the subject is the infantile doll that he once was, he is an excremental object, a sewer, a leech. Analysis has called upon us to explore this imaginary world, which partakes of a sort of barbaric poetry – though it is in no way the first to make it felt, certain poetic works have been.

Here we're in the innumerable shimmering of the great affective meaning. The words to express it come to the subject in great abundance, they are at his disposal, as accessible and as inexhaustible in their combinations as the nature to which they are a response. This is the world of the child, in which you feel at ease, all the more because you are familiar with his fantasies – high is equivalent to low, the back is equivalent to the front, etc. Universal equivalence is the law of this world, and it is even this that leaves us sufficiently uncertain whether any structure in it can be pinned down.

This discourse of affective meaning attains the sources of confabulation straight away. On the other hand the discourse of passional demands, for instance, is poor by comparison and is already drivel. This is because of the impact of reason. The preverbal support of the imaginary relation therefore quite naturally expresses itself in discourse here. We find ourselves here in a familiar domain, one that has always been explored by empirical deduction as much as by a priori categorial deduction. The source and storehouse of this preconscious of what we call imaginary is not unfamiliar, it has already 186 been successfully explored in the philosophical tradition, and it may be said that Kant's schema-ideas are situated on the border of this domain – this at least is where they might find their most brilliant credentials.

The classical theory of the image and the imagination is obviously surprisingly inadequate. This is ultimately an unfathomable domain. While we've made remarkable progress into its phenomenology, we are a long way from having mastered it. While analysis has enabled the issue of the image's formative value – which tends to be confused with the problem of the origins or even of the essence of life – to be brought to light, it's unquestionably from biologists and ethologists that we must expect any progress. While the analytic inventory enables certain essential characteristics of the economy of the imaginary function to be displayed, the question is not thereby exhausted.

Therefore, I have never said of this preconscious world, which is always ready to emerge into the daylight of consciousness, and which is at the subject's disposal unless there are orders to the contrary, that in itself it has the structure of language. I'm saying, because it is obvious, that it is recorded there and that it is recast there. But it retains its own pathways, its characteristic ways of communication. And this is not the level at which analysis has made its essential discovery.

It is highly surprising to observe that an exclusive preponderance of the world of imaginary relations is responsible for the emphasis in analysis on the object relation, which has elided what is properly speaking the field of analytic discoveries. One can follow the increasing predominance of this perspective by reading what the analyst Kris has been producing in recent times. With respect to the economy of progress in an analysis, he emphasizes what he calls – since he has read Freud – the preconscious mental processes and the fruitful nature of ego regression, which amounts to placing the means of access to the unconscious entirely on the level of the imaginary. If we follow Freud it is on the contrary clear that no exploration of the preconscious, however profound or exhaustive it is, will ever lead to an unconscious phenomenon as such. The excessive prevalence of ego psychology in the new American school introduces an illusion similar to that of the mathematician – we can assume he is ideal – who having got a vague idea of the existence of negative magnitudes sets about indefinitely dividing a positive number by two in the hope of finally crossing over the zero line and entering the dreamt-of domain.

The error is all the more gross because there is nothing Freud places greater insistence upon than the radical difference between the unconscious and the preconscious. But one imagines that however much of a barrier there is, it's 187 like putting up a partition in a grain store – the rats get through in the end. The fundamental image that currently seems to regulate analytic practice is that there must be something connecting neurosis and psychosis, the preconscious and the unconscious. It is a matter of pushing, of nibbling away, and one will succeed in perforating the partition wall.

This idea leads authors who are even a little bit coherent to make altogether surprising theoretical additions, like the notion of a sphere that is, as they say, conflict-free – an extraordinary notion – that is not regressive but transgressive. The likes of this had never been heard before, even in the most neo-spiritualist psychology of faculties of the soul. No one had ever thought of making the will an agency located in a conflict-free empire. It's clear what leads them to it. For them the ego is the prevailing framework of phenomena, everything goes through the ego, ego regression is the sole means of access to the unconscious. Where, therefore, are we to locate the mediating element that is indispensable for understanding the action of analytic treatment, if it is not located in this type of ego that is really ideal, in the worst sense of the word, which is the conflict-free sphere, which thus becomes the mythical locus of the most incredible reaction entifications?

In comparison with the preconscious we have just been describing, what is the unconscious?

If I say that everything that belongs to analytic communication has the structure of language, this precisely does not mean that the unconscious is expressed in discourse. The Traumdeutung, The Psychopathology of Everyday Life, and Jokes make this transparent – nothing in Freud's detours is explicable unless it is because the analytic phenomenon as such, whatever it may be, isn't a language in the sense in which this would mean that it's a discourse – I've never said it was a discourse – but is structured like a language. This is the sense in which it may be called a phenomenal variety, and the most revealing one, of man's relations to the domain of language. Every analytic phenomenon, every phenomenon that comes from the analytic field, from the analytic discovery, from what we are dealing with in symptoms and neurosis, is structured like a language.

This means it's a phenomenon that always presents the essential duality of signifier and signified. This means that here the signifier has its own coherence and nature which distinguish it from every other species of sign. We are going to follow its trail in the imaginary preconscious domain.

Let's begin with the biological sign. In the very structure, in the morphology, of animals there is something that has this captivating value due to which its receiver, who sees the red of the robin redbreast for instance, and who is 188 made for receiving it, undertakes a series of actions or henceforth unitary behavior that links the bearer of this sign to its perceiver. Here you have what gives us a precise idea of what may be called natural meaning. Without otherwise seeking how this might take place in man, it is clear that by means of a series of transitions we can manage to purify, neutralize, the natural sign.

Then there is the trace, the footprint in the sand, the sign about which Robinson Crusoe makes no mistake. Here sign and object separate. The trace, in its negative aspect, draws the natural sign to a limit at which it becomes evanescent. The distinction between sign and object is quite clear here, since the trace is precisely what the object leaves behind once it has gone off somewhere else. Objectively there is no need for any subject to recognize a sign for it to be there – a trace exists even if there is nobody to look at it.

When have we passed over into the order of the signifier? The signifier may extend over many of the elements within the domain of the sign. But the signifier is a sign that doesn't refer to any object, not even to one in the form of a trace, even though the trace nevertheless heralds the signifier's essential feature. It, too, is the sign of an absence. But insofar as it forms part of language, the signifier is a sign which refers to another sign, which is as such structured to signify the absence of another sign, in other words, to be opposed to it in a couple.

I spoke about day and night. Day and night are in no way something that can be defined by experience. All experience is able to indicate is a series of modulations and transformations, even a pulsation, an alternation, of light and dark, with all its transitions. Language begins at the opposition – day and night. And once the day is there as a signifier, it lends itself to all the vicissitudes of an arrangement whereby it will come to signify things of great diversity.

This characteristic of the signifier essentially marks everything of the order of the unconscious. Freud's opus, with its huge philological framework at work deep in the heart of the phenomena, is absolutely unthinkable unless we place the signifier's dominance in analytic phenomena at centre stage.

I spoke to you of the Other of speech as being where the subject recognizes himself and gets himself recognized. This, and not the disturbance of some oral, anal or even genital relation, is the determining factor in a neurosis. We are only too well aware how much trouble the handling of the homosexual relation gives us, since we bring out its permanence in subjects who are diverse at the level of instinctual relations. The issue here is a question that arises for the subject at the level of the signifier, of the to be or not to be,[1] at the level of his being.

I want to illustrate this for you with an example, an old observation of traumatic hysteria—no trace of hallucinatory elements.

The reason I have chosen this one is that it brings into play, in the foreground, this fantasy of pregnancy and procreation which dominates the history of President Schreber, since this is where his delusion ends up, that a new humanity, Schreberian in spirit, has to be re-engendered by him.

It concerns an observation we owe to Joseph Eisler, a psychologist of the Budapest School, made at the end of the First World War, which recounts the story of a chap who was a tram conductor during the Hungarian revolution.[2]

He is thirty-three years of age, a Hungarian protestant – austerity, stability, peasant tradition. He left his family to move to the city at the end of his adolescence. His working life was marked by changes that were not without meaning – he started out as a baker, then he worked in a chemical laboratory, and finally he became a tram conductor. He used to ring the bell and punch the tickets, but he had also been a driver.

One day, alighting from his tram, he stumbled, fell, and was dragged a short distance. He had some swelling and his left side hurt. He was taken to hospital where they found that there was nothing wrong with him. He was given a few stitches in the scalp to close the wound. Everything was fine. He left after a thorough examination. They took a lot of x-rays, and they were quite certain that there was nothing wrong with him. He had been putting on a bit of a show.

And then, gradually, he fell victim to crises characterized by an increase in pain in his lower rib, a pain that spread out from this point and drove the subject into a state of increasing discomfort. He would stretch out, lie down on his left side, use a pillow to block it. And things stayed that way, getting worse as time went on. The crises would last several days, returning at reg- 190 ular intervals. They kept getting worse, reaching the point of actually causing the subject to lose consciousness.

[1] In English in the original.
[2] Michael Josef Eisler, "Analyse eines Zwangssymptoms."

Once again he was given a thorough examination. They found absolutely nothing. They suspected a traumatic hysteria and sent him to our author, who analyzes him.

This man belongs to the first generation of analysts, he sees the phenomena with a lot of freshness, investigates them from beginning to end. Nevertheless, this observation dates from 1921 and already belongs to this type of systematization that began to affect – correlatively, it would seem – observation and practice and that would produce this turning point from which the reversal that stressed the analysis of resistance emerged. Eisler is already extremely impressed by the new ego psychology. On the other hand, he knows the early things very well, Freud's early analyses of the anal character, he recalls the idea that the economic elements of the libido can play a decisive role in the formation of the ego. And one feels that he is deeply interested in his subject's ego, in his style of conduct, in the things that indicate regressive elements in him, insofar as they are inscribed not only in the symptoms but also in the structure..

His record of the subject's curious behavior is very pertinent. At the end of the first session the subject abruptly sits down on the couch and starts looking at him with eyes like lottery balls, mouth agape, as if he has discovered an unexpected and enigmatic monster. On other occasions the subject gives some fairly surprising expressions to the transference. On one occasion in particular he stands up abruptly and falls down again the other way round, but with his nose against the couch, offering his dangling legs to the analyst in a manner whose general meaning does not escape him.

This subject is adapted well enough. His relations with his friends are those of a militant unionist, he is something of a leader, and he is very interested in what binds him to them socially. He enjoys undeniable prestige there. Our author also particularly notes the way in which his being self-taught functions, his papers are all in order. You can see that Eisler is trying to find the features of an anal character, and not without some success. But the interpretation he finally gives the subject of his homosexualizing tendencies doesn't affect him either way – nothing changes. There is the same dead end that Freud encountered with the Wolf Man some years before, not all of the clues to which are given in this case study, because at the time the object of his research was something else.

Let's take a closer look at this study. The onset of the neurosis in its symp- 191

tomatic aspect, which made the analyst's intervention necessary, undoubtedly presupposes a trauma which must have aroused something. In the subject's childhood we find traumas by the bucketful. When he was very small, starting to crawl about the place, his mother had stood on his thumb. Eisler doesn't fail to point out that at this moment something decisive must have occurred, since according to the family tradition he is supposed to have started to suck his thumb after this incident. You see? – castration – regression. One can find others. However, there is one small difficulty, which is that it is noticed when the material is being produced that what was decisive in the decompensation of the neurosis wasn't the accident but the radiographic examinations.

The analyst doesn't see all the implications of what he gives us, and whatever preconceived idea he has tends in the opposite direction. It is at the time of the examinations which subject him to mysterious instruments that the subject's crises are triggered. And these crises, their sense, their regularity, their style, very obviously appear linked to a fantasy of pregnancy.

The manifestation of the subject's symptoms is dominated by those relational elements that in an imaginary way colour his relations with objects. One can recognize in them an anal relation, or a homosexual relation, or this or that, but these very elements are caught up in the question that arises – Am I or am I not someone capable of procreating? This question is obviously located at the level of the Other, insofar as integration into sexuality is tied to symbolic recognition.

If the recognition of the subject's sexual position is not tied to the symbolic apparatus, then nothing remains for analysis, Freudianism, but to disappear – it means absolutely nothing. The subject finds his place in a preformed symbolic apparatus that institutes the law in sexuality. And this law no longer allows the subject to realize his sexuality except on the symbolic plane. This is what the Oedipus complex means, and if analysis didn't know this, it would have discovered absolutely nothing.

What is at issue for our subject is the question – What am I?, or Am I?, a relation of being, a fundamental signifier. It is to the extent that this question was aroused as symbolic, and not reactivated as imaginary, that the decompensation of his neurosis was triggered and his symptoms became organized. Whatever their qualities, their nature, the material from which they are borrowed, his symptoms have the value of being a formulation, a reformulation, or even an insistence, of this question.

This key is not sufficient on its own. It is confirmed by elements of his past life which retain all their significance for the subject. One day he managed, 192 while hiding, to observe a woman from the neighborhood of his parents who was uttering these endless groans. He came upon her writhing about, her legs in the air. He knew what was going on, especially as she was unable to give birth and the doctor had to intervene and carry the infant off in a bag, in pieces, which was all that could be removed.

Moreover, the feminized character of the subject's discourse is so immediately noticeable that when our analyst acquaints the subject with its major elements, he obtains from him this remark which the doctor who examined him had made to his wife – I fail to see what's wrong with him. It seems that if he were a woman I should understand him much better. He perceived the significant aspect, but he didn't perceive – for the simple reason that he didn't have the analytic apparatus, which is only conceivable in the register of the structurations of language – that all this is only material, favorable material admittedly, that the subject uses for expressing his question. Any other could have been used just as easily, in order to express what is beyond any relation, current or not current, a Who am I? a man or a woman? and Am I capable of procreating?

Once one holds this clue, the subject's entire life is reorganized from its point of view. One mentions his anal preoccupations, for example. But what does the interest he brings to his excrement revolve around? Around the question of whether in his excrement there may be fruit seeds still capable of growing if they're buried in the ground.

The subject has one great ambition, which is to be involved in raising chickens and, more particularly, in the marketing of eggs. He is interested in all sorts of botanical questions, all centered on germination. One may even say that a whole series of accidents that happened to him during his job as tram conductor is tied to the dismembering of the child he witnessed. This is not the ultimate origin of the subject's question, but it is a particularly expressive one.

Let's finish where we began, with the last accident. He fell from the tram which for him had become a significant machine, he fell down, he delivered himself. The sole theme of a pregnancy fantasy dominates, but in what way? As a signifier – the context makes this clear – of the question of his integration into the virile function, into the function of the father. It may be noted that he contrived to marry a woman who already had a child and with whom he could only ever have inadequate relations.

The problematic nature of his symbolic identification underlies any possible understanding of the observation. Everything that's said, expressed, gestured, manifested, assumes its sense only as a function of a response that 193 has to be formulated concerning this fundamentally symbolic relation – Am I a man or am I a woman?

When I set things out for you like this, you can't fail to compare it with what I emphasized in the case of Dora. Where does she end up in fact, if not confronted by a fundamental question on the subject of her sex? Not on what sex she is, but What is it to be a woman? Dora's two dreams are absolutely transparent in this respect – one speaks of nothing else, What is it to be a woman? and specifically, What is a feminine organ? Notice that here we find ourselves before something odd – the woman wonders about what it is to be a woman, just as the male subject wonders about what it is to be a woman.

We shall take things up from there next time. We shall highlight the dissymmetries that Freud always stressed in the Oedipus complex, which confirm the distinction between the symbolic and the imaginary that I have taken up today.

For the woman, the realization of her sex is not accomplished in the Oedipus complex in a way symmetrical to that of the man's, not by identification with the mother, but on the contrary by identification with the paternal object, which assigns her an extra detour. Freud always stuck by this conception, whatever people, women particularly, have since tried to do to re-establish the symmetry. But the disadvantage the woman finds herself in with respect to access to her own sexual identity, with respect to her sexualization as a woman, is turned to her advantage in hysteria owing to her imaginary identification with the father, who is perfectly accessible to her, particularly by virtue of his position in the composition of the Oedipus complex.

For the man, on the other hand, the path is more complex.

The hysteric's question (II): What is a woman?

DORA AND THE FEMININE ORGAN
THE SIGNIFYING DISYMMETRY
THE SYMBOLIC AND PROCREATION
FREUD AND THE SIGNIFIER

What was the meaning of my lecture last night on the training of analysts? It was that it is essential to carefully distinguish between symbolism properly so-called, that is, symbolism as structured in language, that in which we understand one another here, and natural symbolism. I have summed this up in the expression, To read coffee grounds is not to read hieroglyphics.

For the audience that it was, it was necessary to bring the difference between signifier and signified to life a bit. I gave examples, some of them humorous, I gave the schema, and I went on to some applications. I reminded them that analysts' practice makes them fascinated by highly seductive imaginary forms, by the imaginary meaning of the subjective world, whereas what one needs to know – this is what interested Freud – is what organizes this world and enables it to be displaced. I pointed out that the dynamics of phenomena in the analytic field are linked to the duality that results from the distinction between the signifier and the signified.

It's no accident that it was a Jungian who brought in the term symbol. At the heart of the Jungian myth the symbol is effectively thought of as a flower that rises up from the depths, a blossoming of what lies in the depths of man qua typical. The question is whether this is what a symbol is, or whether on the contrary it's something that envelops and forms what my interlocutor nicely called creation.

The second part of my lecture concerned the consequences in analysis of forgetting the signifier-signified structuration. And there I was only able to give an indication of the way in which the theory of the ego currently being promoted in New York circles completely changes the perspective from which 196 the analytic phenomena have to be approached, and that it is party to the same effacement. This effectively ends up placing the ego-to-ego relation in the foreground. And a simple inspection of Freud's articles between 1922 and 1924 shows that the ego is nothing like what it's currently made out to be in analytic usage.

If what is called strengthening the ego exists, it can only be the accentuation of the fantasy relation that is always correlative of the ego, especially in the case of the neurotic with a typical structure. As far as the latter is concerned, the strengthening of the ego moves in exactly the opposite direction from that of the dissolution, not only of symptoms, which are strictly speaking within their own meaningfulness but may when the occasion arises be mobilized, but also of the structure itself.

What is the sense of what Freud contributed with his new topography when he stressed the imaginary nature of the ego's function? It's precisely the structure of neurosis.

Freud relates the ego to the object's fantasmatic character. When he writes that the ego has the privilege of reality using, of reality testing, that it's the ego that indicates reality for the subject, the context leaves no doubt – the ego is here as an illusion, what Freud called the ego ideal. Its function, which is not that of objectivity but that of illusion, is fundamentally narcissistic, and it's on the basis of this function that the subject gives something its connotation of reality.

From this topography there arises what in typical neuroses is the place of the ego. The ego in its imaginary structuration is for the subject like one of its elements. In the same way that Aristotle declared that one must not say, Man thinks, nor, The soul thinks, but, Man thinks with his soul, we shall say that the neurotic asks his neurotic question, his secret and muzzled question, with his ego.

The Freudian topography of the ego shows us how a hysteric, or an obsessional, uses his or her ego in order to raise the question, that is, precisely in order not to raise it. The structure of a neurosis is essentially a question, and indeed this is why for a long time it was for us purely and simply a question. The neurotic is in a position of symmetry, he is the question that we ask ourselves, and it's indeed because it affects us just as much as him that we have the greatest repugnance to formulating it more precisely.

This is illustrated by the way in which I have always spoken to you about 197 hysteria, to which Freud has given illumination of the highest kind in the case of Dora.

Who is Dora? She is someone who is trapped in a very clear symptomatic state, with the qualification that Freud, by his own admission, makes a mistake over the object of Dora's desire in that he himself is too centered on the question of the object, that is, in that he doesn't bring out the fundamental subjective duality implicated in it. He asks himself what Dora desires, before asking himself who desires in Dora. And in the end Freud realizes that in this quartet – Dora, her father, Herr and Frau K. – Frau K. is the object that really interests Dora, in so far as she is identified with Herr K. The question of where Dora's ego is located is thus resolved – Herr K. is Dora's ego. The function filled by the specular image in the schema of the mirror stage, where the subject situates his sense so as to recognize himself, where for the first time he situates his ego, this external point of imaginary identification, is, for Dora, placed in Herr K. It is insofar as she is Herr K. that all her symptoms adopt their definitive sense.

Dora's aphonia occurs during Herr K.'s absences, which Freud explains quite nicely – she no longer needs to talk since he is no longer present, only writing remains. This leaves us a bit perplexed, nevertheless. If she has dried up, it's in fact because the mode of objectification hasn't been raised anywhere else. The aphonia arises because Dora is left directly in the presence of Frau K. Everything she has heard about Frau K.'s relations with her father revolves around fellatio, and here there is something infinitely more significant for understanding the appearance of the oral symptoms.

Dora's identification with Herr K. is what holds this situation together up until the neurotic decompensation. While she may complain about the situation, this is still part of the situation, for it is insofar as she is identified with Herr K. that she complains.

What is Dora saying through her neurosis? What is the woman-hysteric saying? Her question is this – What is it to be a woman?

This leads us further into the dialectic of the imaginary and the symbolic in the Oedipus complex.

What in fact characterizes the Freudian understanding of the phenomena is that it always shows the structural planes of the symptom, despite the outburst of enthusiasm by psychoanalysts for the imaginary phenomena stirred up in analytic experience.

Concerning the Oedipus complex there has been no shortage of well-meaning people to stress the analogies and symmetries along the paths that the boy and girl have to follow – and Freud himself pointed out many common features. However, he never stopped insisting on the essential dissymmetry of Oedipus in the two sexes. 198

What is this dissymmetry due to? To the primary love relation with the mother, you will say, but Freud was a long way away from this point at the time he was beginning to put order into the facts that he was observing in experience. He mentions, among other things, the anatomical component, which means that for the woman the two sexes are identical. But is this the reason for the dissymmetry?

The detailed studies that Freud did on this subject are closely argued. I shall name some of them – "Some Psychical Consequences of the Anatomical Distinction between the Sexes," "Female Sexuality," "The Dissolution of the Oedipus Complex." What do they bring out, if it isn't that the reason for the dissymmetry is located essentially at the symbolic level, that it's due to the signifier?

I should say that strictly speaking there is no symbolization of woman's sex[1] as such. In any case, the symbolization isn't the same, it doesn't have the same source or the same mode of access as the symbolization of man's sex.[1] And this is because the imaginary only furnishes an absence where elsewhere there is a highly prevalent symbol.

It's the prevalence of the phallic Gestalt that in bringing about the oedipal complex forces the woman to take a detour via identification with the father and therefore for a while to follow the same paths as the boy. The woman's access to the oedipal complex, her imaginary identification, is accomplished via the father, exactly as in the boy's case, by virtue of the prevalence of the imaginary form of the phallus, but insofar as this form is itself taken as the symbolic element central to the Oedipus complex.

If for the girl as much as for the boy the castration complex assumes a pivotal value in bringing about the Oedipus complex, it does so precisely as a function of the father, because the phallus is a symbol to which there is no correspondent, no equivalent. It's a matter of a dissymmetry in the signifier. This signifying dissymmetry determines the paths down which the Oedipus complex will pass. The two paths make them both pass down the same trail – the trail of castration.

The experience of the Oedipus complex is evidence of the predominance of the signifier in the ways open to subjective realization, since the girl's assumption of her own situation is in no way unthinkable on the imaginary plane. All the ingredients are there for the girl to have direct experience of the feminine position, symmetrical to the realization of the masculine position. There would be no obstacle if this realization were to be brought about 199 in the order of lived experience, of ego sympathy, of sensations. And yet, experience shows a striking difference – one of the sexes is required to take the image of the other sex as the basis of its identification. That things are so can't be considered a pure quirk of nature. This fact can only be interpreted from the perspective in which it's the symbolic organization that regulates everything.

Where there is no symbolic material, there is an obstacle, a defect, in the way of bringing about the identification that is essential for the subject's sexuality to be realized. This defect comes from the fact that on one point the symbolic lacks the material – for it does require material. The female sex is characterized by an absence, a void, a hole, which means that it happens to be less desirable than is the male sex for what he has that is provocative, and that an essential dissymmetry appears. If all this could be grasped within the order of a dialectic of drives, we would not see why such a detour, such an anomaly, would be necessary.

This remark is nowhere near adequate for us concerning the matter at hand, namely the function of the ego in male and female hysterics. The question isn't simply linked to the material, to the trappings of the signifier, but to the subject's relationship with the signifier as a whole, with what the signifier is capable of answering to.

When I spoke about beings of language last night it was intended to have an impact upon my audience. Beings of language aren't organized beings, but there is no doubt that they are beings, that they stamp their form upon man. The comparison I made with fossils was therefore quite appropriate up to a point. It nevertheless remains true that they don't have any substantial existence in themselves.

Consider the paradox that results from certain functional interweavings between the two planes of the symbolic and the imaginary.

On the one hand, it seems that the symbolic is what yields us the entire world system. It's because man has words that he has knowledge of things. And the number of things he has knowledge of corresponds to the number of things he is able to name. This is not in doubt. On the other hand, there is no doubt either that the imaginary relation is linked to ethology, to animal psychology. The sexual relation implies capture by the other's image. In other words, one of these domains appears to be open to the neutrality of the order of human knowledge, the other seems to be the very domain of the erotization of the object. This is what initially manifests itself to us. 200

Now, the bringing about of the sexual position in the human being is linked, Freud tells us – and experience tells us – to the trial of traversing a fundamentally symbolized relationship, that of the Oedipus complex, which includes a position that alienates the subject, that makes him desire an other's object and possess it through the proxy of an other. We therefore find ourselves here in a position structured within the very duality of the signifier and the signified. It is insofar as the function of man and woman is symbolized, it is insofar as it's literally uprooted from the domain of the imaginary and situated in the domain of the symbolic, that any normal, completed sexual position is realized. Genital realization is submitted to symbolization as an essential requirement – that the man be virilized, that the woman truly accept her feminine function.

Conversely, no less paradoxically, it's in the order of the imaginary that we find the relation of identification on the basis of which the object is realized as an object of competition. The domain of knowledge is fundamentally inserted into the primitive paranoid dialectic of identification with the counterpart. The initial opening of identification with the other, that is, with an object, starts from here. An object is isolated, neutralized, and as such particularly erotized. This is what makes an infinitely greater number of objects enter the field of human desire than enter animal experience.

In this interweaving of the imaginary and the symbolic lies the source of the essential function that the ego plays in the structuring of neurosis.

When Dora finds herself wondering, What is a woman?, she is attempting to symbolize the female organ as such. Her identification with the man, bearer of the penis, is for her on this occasion a means of approaching this definition that escapes her. She literally uses the penis as an imaginary instrument for apprehending what she hasn't succeeded in symbolizing.

There are many more women hysterics than men hysterics – this is a fact of clinical experience – because the path to the woman's symbolic realization is more complicated. Becoming a woman and wondering what a woman is are two essentially different things. I would go even further – it's because one doesn't become one that one wonders and, up to a point, to wonder is the contrary of becoming one. The metaphysics of the woman's position is the detour imposed on her subjective realization. Her position is essentially 201 problematic, and up to a certain point it's unassimilable. But once the woman is locked into hysteria it must also be said that her position presents an unusual stability by virtue of its structural simplicity – the simpler a structure is, the fewer the points of rupture it displays. When her question takes shape in the form of hysteria it's very easy for the woman to raise it by taking the shortest path, namely identification with the father.

In masculine hysteria the situation is certainly much more complex. To the extent that in man the oedipal realization is better structured, the hysteric's question has less chance of arising. But if it's raised, what is it? Here there is the same dissymmetry as in the Oedipus complex – hysterics, whether men or women, ask themselves the same question. The question of the male hysteric also concerns the feminine position.

The question of the subject whom I mentioned last time revolved around a fantasy of pregnancy. Is this sufficient to exhaust the question? It has long been known that fantasmatic anatomical fragmentation is a hysterical phenomenon. This fantasmatic anatomy has a structural character – neither paralysis nor anesthesia occurs according to the pathways and topography of the nerve branches. Nothing in neural anatomy corresponds to anything whatsoever that occurs in hysterical symptoms. It's always a question of an imaginary anatomy.

Can we now spell out the factor common to the feminine position and the masculine question in hysteria – a factor that is no doubt situated at the symbolic level, but perhaps isn't entirely reducible to it? It concerns a question of procreation. Paternity, like maternity, has a problematic essence – these are terms that are not situated purely and simply at the level of experience.

Recently I was discussing problems, raised long ago, about the couvade with one of my students and he reminded me of the light ethnographers have recently managed to throw on this problem. Facts of experience obtained from an investigation carried out on some Central American tribe, because this is where it appears clearly, effectively enable the resolution of certain questions that have arisen over the meaning of this phenomenon. It is now possible to see here that the function of the father and of what he contributes to the creation of the new individual is called into question. The couvade is located at the level of a question concerning masculine procreation.

In this vein perhaps it won't strike you as artificial if I elaborate in the following way.

The symbolic provides a form into which the subject is inserted at the level 202 of his being. It's on the basis of the signifier that the subject recognizes himself as being this or that. The chain of signifiers has a fundamental explanatory value, and the very notion of causality is nothing else.

There is nevertheless one thing that evades the symbolic tapestry, it's procreation in its essential root – that one being is born from another. In the symbolic order procreation is covered by the order instituted by this succession between beings. But nothing in the symbolic explains the fact of their individuation, the fact that beings come from beings. The entire symbolism declares that creatures don't engender creatures, that a creature is unthinkable without a fundamental creation. In the symbolic nothing explains creation.

Nor does anything explain why some beings must die for others to be born. There is an essential relationship between sexual reproduction and the appearance of death, the biologists say, and if this is true then it shows that they, too, mull over the same question. The question of what links two beings in the appearance of life only arises for a subject when he or she is in the symbolic, realized as a man or as a woman, but so long as an accident has prevented him or her from acceding to it. This may just as easily occur to anyone by virtue of his or her biographical accidents.

Freud raises these same issues in the background of Beyond the Pleasure Principle. Just as life reproduces itself, so it's forced to repeat the same cycle, rejoining the common aim of death. For Freud this reflects his experience. Each neurosis reproduces a particular cycle in the order of the signifier on the basis of the question that man's relationship to the signifier as such raises.

There is, in effect, something radically unassimilable to the signifier. It's quite simply the subject's singular existence. Why is he here? Where has he come from? What is he doing here? Why is he going to disappear? The signifier is incapable of providing him with the answer, for the good reason that it places him beyond death. The signifier already considers him dead, by nature it immortalizes him.

As such, the question of death is another mode of the neurotic creation of the question – its obsessional mode. I indicated this last night, and I'll leave it to one side today because we are dealing with the psychoses this year and not with the obsessional neuroses. The considerations about structure I'm proposing to you here are still a prelude to the problem raised by the psychotic. If I'm particularly interested in the question raised in hysteria, it's because at issue is the way in which it's distinct from the mechanism of psy-
203 chosis, especially that of President Schreber, where the question of procreation, of feminine procreation in particular, is also sketched out.

I would like to finish by pointing out to you those texts by Freud that justify what I said to you last night.

My own work is to understand what Freud did. Consequently, to interpret even what is implicit in Freud is legitimate in my eyes. I say this to tell you that I'm not backing away from my responsibilities in asking you to refer to what certain texts have powerfully expressed.

Refer to those years, around 1896, when as Freud himself tells us he was assembling his doctrine – he took a long time to state what he had to say. He stresses the time of latency, which always lasted three to four years, between the composition of his major works and their publication. The Traumdeutung was written three or four years prior to its publication. The same goes for The Psychopathology of Everyday Life and the Dora case.

One can observe that the twofold structuring of the signifier and signified doesn't appear after the event. As early as Letter 46, for example, Freud states that he is beginning to see the stages of the subject's development appear in his experience, how to construct them, and also to show its relationship to the existence of the unconscious and its mechanisms. One is struck by seeing him employ the term Übersetzung to designate a given stage of the subject's experiences, according as it's translated or not. Translated – what does that mean? It's a question of what happens at levels defined by the subject's age – from one to four years of age, then from four to eight years of age, then the prepubertal period, and finally the period of maturity.[2]

[2] See letter of 30 May 1896, Freud-Fliess, 187–90; Letter 46, Origins, 163–67.

can't be translated as specifying the signifier in relation to the signified. Likewise, in Letter 52, I've already pointed out that he says this – I am working on the assumption that our psychic mechanism has come into being by a process of stratification: the material present in the form of memory traces being subjected from time to time to a rearrangement in accordance with fresh circumstances – to a retranscription. Thus what is essentially new about my theory is the thesis that memory is present not once but several times over, that it is laid down in various kinds of indications.[3]

I'm pointing out to you the kinship between what is said here and the 204 schema I gave a commentary on for you the other day. Freud emphasizes that these different stages are characterized by the plurality of mnemic inscriptions.

There is Wahrnehmung, perception, first of all. This is a primordial, primary position which remains hypothetical since in a way none of it comes to light in the subject. Then there is Bewusstsein, consciousness.

Consciousness and memory as such are mutually exclusive. This is a point on which Freud never varied. It always seemed to him that pure memory, qua inscription and acquisition by the subject of a new means of reacting, should remain completely immanent to the mechanism and bring no apprehension of the subject by himself into play.

The Wahrnehmung stage is there to show that something simple must be presupposed at the origin of memory, conceived as consisting of a plurality of registers. The first registration of perceptions, which is also inaccessible to consciousness, is arranged according to associations by simultaneity. Here we have the original requirement of a primitive installation of simultaneity.

This is what I showed you last year in our probative exercises concerning symbols.[4] Things became interesting, you'll remember, when we established the structure of groups of three. Putting these groups of three together effectively establishes a relationship of simultaneity between them. Simultaneity is the birth of the signifier and, equally, its existence is a synchronic coexistence. Saussure emphasizes this point.

Unbewusstsein is of the order of conceptual memories. The notion of causal relation as such appears here for the first time. This is the moment at which the signifier, once constituted, is secondarily arranged according to something else, which is the appearance of the signified.

It's only subsequently that the Vorbewusstsein, the third mode of rearrangement, comes into play. It's from this preconscious that investments will become conscious, according to certain precise rules. This second thought consciousness is in all likelihood linked to the hallucinatory experience of word representations,[5] the emission of words. The most radical example of this is verbal hallucination, connected with the paranoid mechanism by which we auditivate word representations. The appearance of consciousness which is linked to this would otherwise always be without any link to memory.

In everything that follows, Freud shows that the phenomenon of Verdrängung consists in the loss of something of the order of a signifying expression 205 at the moment of passage from one stage of development to another. The signifier recorded at one of these stages doesn't cross over into the next, with the mode of retroactive regrouping required by any new phase of signifier-meaning organization that the subject enters.

This is where any explanation of the existence of repression has to begin. The notion of inscription in a signifier that dominates the registration is essential to the theory of memory insofar as it's at the basis of Freud's first investigation of the phenomenon of the unconscious.

The signifier, as such, signifies nothing

THE NOTION OF STRUCTURE
SUBJECTIVITY IN THE REAL
HOW TO LOCATE THE BEGINNING OF A DELUSION
THE BETWEEN-I'S

Ad usum autem orationis, incredibile est, nisi diligenter attenderis, quanta opera machinata natura sit.

How many marvels there are concealed by the function of language, if you want to pay diligent attention to it! You know that this is what we are striving towards here. You won't be astonished, therefore, that I should offer you this sentence from Cicero as an epigraph, since it is on this theme that this term we are going to return to the study of the Freudian structures of the psychoses.

Effectively, it's a question of what Freud left behind concerning the structures of the psychoses, this being why we call them Freudian.

The notion of structure by itself deserves our attention. Given the manner in which we efficaciously apply it in analysis, it implies a number of coordinates, and the very notion of coordinate is part of it. A structure is in the first place a group of elements forming a covariant set.

I said a set, I didn't say a totality. As a matter of fact, the notion of structure is analytic. A structure is always established by referring something coherent to something else, which is complementary to it. But the notion of totality only comes into it if we are dealing with a closed relation with a correspondent, where the structures are interdependent. On the other hand it is possible to have an open relation, which we shall call a relation of supplementarity. 208
For those who have gone in for structural analyses the ideal has always appeared to be to find what links the two, the closed and the open, to discover circularity on the side of the open.

I think that you're well enough oriented to understand that the notion of structure is by itself already a manifestation of the signifier. The little I've just indicated about its dynamics, about what it implies, points you towards the notion of signifier. To be interested in structure is to be unable to neglect the signifier. In structural analysis, as in the analysis of the relationship between signifier and signified, we discover relations between groups founded on sets that, whether open or closed, essentially comprise reciprocal references. In the analysis of the relationship between signifier and signified we have learned to stress synchrony and diachrony, and this reappears in a structural analysis. In the end, if we observe them closely, the notion of structure and that of signifier appear inseparable. In fact, when we analyze a structure it's always at least ideally a question of the signifier. What satisfies us the most in a structural analysis is an uncovering, that is as radical as possible, of the signifier.

We situate ourselves in a field that is distinct from the field of the natural sciences and that, as you know, it isn't enough to call the field of the human sciences. Where are we to draw the dividing line? How closely do we have to approximate to the ideals of the sciences of nature such as they have developed for us – for instance, physics as we know it? To what extent are we unable to avoid differentiating ourselves from them? Well then, it's in relation to these definitions of the signifier and of structure that the appropriate boundary can be drawn.

In physics we have adopted the law that we proceed from the idea that in nature nobody uses the signifier to signify. This is what distinguishes our physics from mystical physics and even from the physics of antiquity, which had nothing mystical about it, but which didn't adopt this strict requirement. It has become a fundamental law for us, one required of every utterance within the order of the natural sciences, that there is nobody who uses the signifier.

The signifier is nevertheless there in nature, and if we weren't looking for the signifier, we shouldn't find anything there at all. To extract a natural law is to extract a meaningless formula. The less it signifies anything, the happier we are. This is why we're perfectly happy with the achievements of Einstei-
209 nian physics. You would be wrong to think that those little equations of Einstein's that express the relationship of inertial mass to a constant plus some exponents have the slightest meaning. They are pure signifiers. And this is why thanks to him we hold the world in the palm of our hand.

The idea that the signifier signifies something, that there is someone who uses this signifier to signify something, is called the Signatura rerum. This is the title of a work by Jakob Boehme.[1] It means that God is present in natural phenomena and speaks to us in his language.

You must nevertheless not think that our physics implies the elimination of all meaning. There is a meaning at the limit, but there is nobody to signify it. In physics the mere existence of a signifying system implies, at the very least, the meaning that there is an Umwelt. Physics implies the minimal conjunction of the two signifiers, one and all – that all things are one or that the one is all things.

You would be wrong to think that these signifiers belonging to science, however simple they are, are given or that any form of empiricism would enable one to abstract them. No empirical theory is able to account for the existence of even the first whole numbers. Despite Mr. Jung's best efforts to convince us of the contrary, history, observation, and ethnography show us that at a certain level of the signifier in a given culture, community, or tribe of people, it's an accomplishment to get access to the number five, for instance. One can clearly distinguish on the banks of the Orinoco between a tribe that has learned to signify the number four and not beyond, and one for which the number five opens up surprising possibilities, consistent moreover with the entire signifying system into which the tribe is inserted.

This isn't a joke. It's to be taken literally. The extraordinary effect the number three had when it arrived in a certain Amazon tribe has been recorded by people who knew what they were talking about. Uttering a series of whole numbers isn't self evident. It's altogether conceivable, and experience shows that this is so, that beyond a certain limit in this series things get mixed up and one no longer sees anything but a confused multitude. Experience also shows that since the number one necessarily implies its maximum effect, it's not the number one whose origin we are able, in acquiring the signifier, to understand clearly.

These considerations appear to contradict my remarks to you about the fact that any system of language includes, or covers, the totality of possible meanings. This isn't so, for that didn't mean that every system of language exhausts the possibilities of the signifier, which is quite different. The proof 210 of this is the fact that, for example, the language of an Australian tribe may express a given number by a crescent moon.

These remarks may appear to you to be way off the mark. It's essential however to take them up again at the beginning of our topic for this year. Our starting point, the point we keep coming back to, since we shall always be at the starting point, is that every real signifier is, as such, a signifier that signifies nothing.

Experience proves it – the more the signifier signifies nothing, the more indestructible it is.

They go off in a foolish direction, those who make fun of what one may call the power of words, by demonstrating, which is always easy, the contradictions into which one falls with the play of a given concept, those who mock nominalism, as it's called, in a given philosophy.

It's of course easy to criticize what may be arbitrary or fleeting in the use of a notion like that of society, for instance. It's not so very long ago that this word was invented, and it's amusing to see what dead ends result in the real from the notion that the society is responsible for what happens to the individual – a notion the requirement for which was ultimately expressed in socialist constructions. There is in effect something radically arbitrary in the emergence of the notion of society – I'm not saying of the city. Recall that for our friend Cicero in the above work the nation is, as it were, only the goddess of the population – it presides over births. As a matter of fact the modern idea of the nation is not even on the horizon of classical thought, and it is not merely the fortunes of a word that demonstrate this to us.

None of these things is self-evident. One is free to conclude from this that doubt can be cast on the notion of society. But it's precisely insofar as we are able to cast doubt upon it that it's a signifier. It's also for this reason that it has entered our social reality like the prow of a ship, like a ploughshare.

When one speaks of the subjective, and even when here we call it into question, the illusion always remains in our minds that the subjective is the opposite of the objective, that it's on the side of the speaker, and finds itself, by virtue of this very fact, on the side of illusions – it either distorts or restricts the objective. The dimension elided until now in the understanding 211 of Freudianism is that the subjective isn't on the side of the speaker. It's something we encounter in the real.

The real in question is no doubt not to be taken in the sense in which we normally understand it, which implies objectivity, a confusion constantly being made in analytic writings. The subjective appears in the real insofar as it implies that we have opposite us a subject capable of using the signifier, the play of signifiers. And capable of using it like us – not to signify something but precisely to deceive us over what there is to signify. This is to use the fact that the signifier is something other than meaning in order to present a deceptive signifier. This is so essential that it is strictly speaking the first step of modern physics. The Cartesian discussion of the deceptive god is a step that is impossible to avoid for any foundation of physics in the sense in which we understand the term.

The subjective is for us that which distinguishes the field of science in which psychoanalysis is grounded from the entire field of physics. It's the instance of subjectivity as present in the real that is the essential source of the fact that we are saying something new when we single out, for example, these series of apparently natural phenomena that we call neuroses or psychoses.

Do the psychoses form a series of natural phenomena? Do they fall within a field of natural explanation? What I'm calling natural is the field of science in which there is no one who uses the signifier to signify.

Please remember these definitions, because I'm only giving them to you after having carefully decanted them.

I think they are suited, in particular, to contributing the greatest clarity on the subject of final causes. The idea of final cause is repugnant to science in its present form, but science constantly makes use of it in a camouflaged way, in the notion of a return to a state of equilibrium, for instance. If by final cause one simply understands a cause that acts in advance, which tends towards something out ahead, it's absolutely ineliminable from scientific thought, and there is just as much final cause in Einstein's equations as in Aristotle. The difference is precisely this – there is no one who uses this signifier to signify anything – unless it's this, which is that there is a universe.

I was reading in Mr. [. . .] how amazed he was at the existence of the element water – how well this shows the care that the Creator has taken with order and with our pleasure, for if water were not this element that is so wonderfully fluid, heavy, and solid, we wouldn't see little boats sailing so 212 beautifully on the sea. This is written and it would be a mistake to think that the author is an idiot. It's just that he was still a captive of the atmosphere of a time when nature was made for speaking. We overlook this because of a kind of purification that has taken place in our causal requirements. But this alleged naivety was natural for people for whom everything that presents itself with a signifying nature is made for signifying something.

People are currently engaging in a very curious operation, which consists in overcoming certain difficulties presented by certain frontier domains into which the question of the use of the signifier as such has to be introduced, precisely by means of the notion of communication which we've discussed on occasion. And the reason I've placed the article by Tomkins in this issue of the journal you've all become somewhat familiar with is to give you an example of the naive way the notion of communication can be used.[2] You will see that this can be taken a very long way, which people haven't failed to do.

There are people who will claim that the various orders of internal secretion inside an organism send one another messages in the form, for instance, of hormones that notify the ovaries that everything's going well, or on the contrary that there's a bit of a problem somewhere. Is this a legitimate use of the notions of communication and message? Why not, if a message is simply of the order of what takes place when we project a light beam, whether invisible or not, onto a photoelectric cell? This can be taken a very long way. If, on sweeping the sky with the beam of a spotlight, we see something appear in the middle, it may be taken as the sky's response. This produces its own criticism. But this is still to take things too lightly.

When may one really speak of communication? You are going to tell me that it's obvious – there has to be a response. This is defensible, it's a question of definition. Shall we say that there is communication whenever a response is registered? But what's a response? There's only one way defining it, which is to say that it's when something returns to the starting point. This is the schema for feedback. Every return of something that, having been registered somewhere, thereby triggers an operation of regulation, constitutes a response. And this is where communication begins, with self-regulation.

But notwithstanding this, are we now at the level of the function of the signifier? I don't think so. In a thermoelectric machine supported by feedback the signifier is not employed. Why not? Isolating the signifier as such 213 requires something else which, like any dialectical distinction in the first instance presents itself in a paradoxical manner. There is appropriate use of the signifier whenever, at the level of the receiver, what is important is not the effect of the content of the message, nor the triggering in the organ of a given reaction due to the appearance of a hormone, but this – that at the message's point of arrival one makes a note of it.

Does this imply a subjectivity? Look at it very closely. It's not certain that it does. What is distinctive about the existence of the signifier as such, the signifier which I have just been trying one more time to give a precise formulation to, insofar as it's a correlated system of elements that derive their place synchronically and diachronically in relation to one another?

I'm at sea, the captain of a small ship. I see things moving about in the night, in a way that gives me cause to think that there may be a sign there. How shall I react? If I'm not yet a human being, I shall react with all sorts of displays, as they say – modeled, motor, and emotional. I satisfy the descriptions of psychologists, I understand something, in fact I do everything I'm telling you that you must know how not to do. If on the other hand I am a human being, I write in my log book – At such and such a time, at such and such a degree of latitude and longitude, we noticed this and that.

This is what is fundamental. I shelter my responsibility. What distinguishes the signifier is here. I make a note of the sign as such. It's the acknowledgment of receipt [l'accusé de réception] that is essential to communication insofar as it is not significant, but signifying. If you don't articulate this distinction clearly, you will keep falling back upon meanings that can only mask from you the original mainspring of the signifier insofar as it carries out its true function.

Let's keep the following in mind. Even when inside an organism, whether living or not, things are transmitted that are founded upon the effectiveness of all or nothing, even when, by virtue of the fact that, for example, a threshold exists, there is something which doesn't exist below a certain level and then all of a sudden has a certain effect – keep the example of the hormones in mind –, we still can't speak of communication if by communication we imply the originality of the order of the signifier. Indeed, it isn't as all or nothing that something is a signifier, it's to the extent that something constituting a whole, the sign, exists and signifies precisely nothing. This is where the order of the signifier, insofar as it differs from the order of meaning, begins.

If psychoanalysis teaches us anything, if psychoanalysis constitutes a novelty, it's precisely that the human being's development is in no way directly deducible from the construction of, from the interferences between, from the 214 composition of, meanings, that is, instincts. The human world, the world that we know and live in, in the midst of which we orientate ourselves, and without which we are absolutely unable to orientate ourselves, doesn't only imply the existence of meanings, but the order of the signifier as well.

If the Oedipus complex isn't the introduction of the signifier then I ask to be shown any conception of it whatever. The level of its elaboration is so essential to sexual normalization uniquely because it introduces the functioning of the signifier as such into the conquest of the said man or woman. It's not because the Oedipus complex is contemporary with the genital dimension or tendency that it's possible to imagine even for a single instant that it's essential to an actual human world, to a world that has its structure of human reality.

Think about it for a second – if there is something that is clearly unsuited to introducing articulation and differentiation into the world, it's the genital function. That which in its strict essence tends towards the most mysterious of effusions is that which is the most paradoxical in relation to any real structuring of the world. It's not the instinctual dimension that is operative in the stage to be passed through in the Oedipus complex. In this respect, it's on the contrary the so highly diverse material we are shown by the pregenital stages that enables us to imagine easily how, by analogy with meaning, the mode of matter, to call it by its name, is linked up to what man has in his immediate field. The bodily, excremental, pregenital, exchanges are quite adequate for structuring a world of objects, a world of complete human reality, that is, one in which there are subjectivities.

There's no other scientific definition of subjectivity than one that proceeds from the possibility of handling the signifier for purely signifying, not significant ends, that is, expressing no direct relation of the order of appetite.

Things are simple. But the subject still has to acquire, conquer, the order of the signifier, be given his place in a relationship of implication that attains his being, which results in the formation of what in our language we call the superego. One doesn't have to go very deeply into analytic literature to see that the use made of this concept is congenial to the definition of the signifier, which is that it signifies nothing and is therefore always capable of yielding various meanings. For us the superego raises the question of what is the order of entrance, of introduction, of present instance, of the signifier, which is indispensable to the functioning of a human organism that has to come to terms not only with a natural environment but with a signifying universe.

215 Here we return to the crossroads at which I left you last time on the subject of the neuroses. What do symptoms result from, if it's not from the human organism's being implicated in something that is structured like a language, whereby such and such an element of its functioning will come into play as a signifier? I went further on this topic last time, taking the example of hysteria. Hysteria is a question centered on a signifier that remains enigmatic as to its meaning. The question of death and the question of birth are as it happens the two ultimate questions that have precisely no solution in the signifier. This is what gives neurotics their existential value.

Now for the psychoses. What do they mean? What is the function of the subject's relationships to the signifier in the psychoses? We have already tried to spell this out on a number of occasions. The reason that we are always thus forced to investigate things in a roundabout way must lie in the question itself. We're obliged to acknowledge this for the moment. There is an obstacle here, a resistance, which will yield its meaning only to the extent that we have gone into things deeply enough to explain why things are like this.

Let's explore the problem again with the aim of taking a further step forward, as we've done on each occasion.

You remember the schema we arrived at. I pointed out to you that there must have been something there that had not materialized, at a certain moment, in the field of the signifier, that had been verworfen, thereby making the object of a Verwerfung reappear in the real. This mechanism is distinct from everything that in other ways we know from our experience, concerning the relationships between the imaginary, the symbolic, and the real.

Freud gave powerful expression, in the text on Schreber we're working on among others, to the radical distinction between passional conviction and delusional conviction. The former depends upon the projection of intentions. It is, for example, jealousy where I'm jealous of my own feelings in the other, where it's my own drives to be unfaithful that I impute to the other. As to the second, Freud formulates it thus, that what has been rejected from within what has been suppressed in the idea reappears in the real. But what does this mean, exactly?

216 reappears without, or again, as one tries to say in an expanded form, that

In neurosis, too, we see this action of the drive and its consequences. Doesn't this formulation leave something to be desired, something confused, defective, even absurd? Every author confines himself to this formulation, and in putting it to you in this form I wasn't wanting to contribute anything original. I think I can find someone among you to help me look more closely at the works in which Katan has tried to grasp the mechanism of psychotic neoformation. You will observe what an extraordinary dead-end he arrives at, from which he escapes only at the price of contradictory formulations. This testifies to the conceptual difficulties one is committed to if one confuses, however slightly, the notion of reality with that of objectivity, or even with that of meaning, if one moves away from a reality distinct from the test of the real, from a reality in the sentiment of the real.

An entire phenomenological supposition, which extends well beyond the field of psychoanalysis and holds sway there only insofar as it equally holds sway elsewhere, is based on confusing the realm of meaningfulness with the realm of meaning. Proceeding from works that are extremely rigorous elaborations upon the function of the signifier, supposedly psychological phenomenology slides into the realm of meaning. This is its basic point of confusion. It's led towards it like a dog on a scent, and, like the dog, this will never lead it to any kind of scientific result.

You know the would-be opposition between Erklären and Verstehen. Here we must maintain that the only scientific structure is where there is Erklären. Verstehen opens onto all kinds of confusion. Erklären doesn't at all imply mechanical meaning or anything else of that order. The nature of Erklären lies in the recourse to the signifier as the sole foundation of all conceivable scientific structuration.

At the beginning of the Schreber case we find a period of disorder, of fertile moment. It presents a whole set of symptoms which, because it has generally been hidden away or, more exactly, because it has slipped through our fingers, has been unable to be elucidated analytically and is most of the time only reconstructed. Now, in reconstructing it we can discover, with very few exceptions, what appear to be the meanings and mechanisms we see at work in neurosis. There is nothing that more closely resembles a neurotic symptomatology than a prepsychotic symptomatology. Once the diagnosis has been made, we are told that one finds that the unconscious is displayed on the outside, that everything belonging to the id has passed into the external world, 217 and that the meanings in play are so clear that we are precisely unable to intervene analytically.

This is the classical position, and it still has some value. The paradox it contains has escaped nobody, but all the reasons that have been advanced to explain it are of a tautological or contradictory character. They are superstructurations of totally absurd hypotheses. It suffices to take an interest in analytic literature as a symptom to realize this.

Where does it spring from? From the fact that the world of objects is in some way affected, captured, induced, by a meaning in relation with drives characteristic of the psychoses? Is the construction of an external world distinctive of the psychoses? However, if there is any way of equally defining neurosis, this is it. When do we decide that the subject has crossed over the limits, that he is delusional?

Take the prepsychotic period. Our President Schreber is living out something in the nature of perplexity. He gives us in living form this question that I was saying lies at the bottom of every form of neurosis. He is prey to strange forebodings – he indicates this to us after the event. He is abruptly invaded by this image which would seem to be the least likely to enter the mind of a man of his kind and his style, that it really must be rather pleasant to be a woman succumbing to intercourse. This is a period of confusion and panic. How are we to locate the border between this moment of confusion and the point at which his delusion ended with the construction that he was in actual fact a woman, and not just any woman, but the divine woman, or more exactly God's fiancée? Is there anything here that is sufficient for locating the onset of psychosis? Certainly not. Katan reports a case that he saw declare itself at a much earlier period than Schreber's, and about which he was able to form a direct idea, having come onto the scene at the turning point of the case.[3] It was the case of a youth at the age of puberty, whose whole prepsychotic period the author analyses very well, while conveying the idea that there was nothing in this subject of the order of accession to anything that would realize in him the virile type. Everything failed. And while he did try to conquer the typically virile attitude, it was by means of imitation, of a latching on, following the example of one of his friends. Like him and following him, he engaged in the first sexual maneuvers of puberty, namely masturbation, which he subsequently renounced under the injunction of the said friend, and he began to identify with him for a whole series of exercises that were called exercises of self-conquest. He behaved as if he were at the mercy of a severe father, which was the case with his friend. Like him, he became interested in a girl 218 who, as if by chance, was the same one his friend was interested in. And once this identification with his friend has gone quite a way, the young girl will readily fall into his arms.

Here we obviously find the as if mechanism that Mrs. Helene Deutsch has stressed as being a significant dimension in the symptomatology of the schi-zophrenias.[4] It's a mechanism of imaginary compensation – you can verify the usefulness of the distinction between the three registers – for the absent Oedipus complex, which would have given him virility in the form, not of the paternal image, but of the signifier, the name of the father.

[3] See "Structural Aspects of a Case of Schizophrenia."

Once the psychosis has broken out, the subject will conduct himself in the same way as before, as an unconscious homosexual. No meaning emerges that is fundamentally different from the prepsychotic period. All his conduct in relation to the friend, who was the pivotal element in his attempt at structuration at the time of puberty, can be rediscovered in his delusion. When did he start to delude? When he said that his father was pursuing him to kill him, to rob him, to castrate him. All the contents implied in neurotic meanings are there. But the essential point, which isn't highlighted, is that the delusion began the moment the initiative came from the Other, with a capital O, when the initiative was founded on a subjective activity. The Other wants this, and above all he wants this to be known, he wants to signify it.

As soon as there is a delusion, we enter at full tilt upon the domain of intersubjectivity, where the whole problem is to know why it's fantasized. But in the name of fantasy, omnipresent in neurosis, attached as we are to its meaning, we forget its structure, namely that it's a question of signifiers, of signifiers as such, handled by a subject for signifying aims, signifying so purely that the meaning very often remains problematic. What we have encountered in this symptomatology always implies what I indicated to you last year in relation to the dream of Irma's injection – the inmixing[5] of subjects.

It's characteristic of the intersubjective dimension that you have a subject in the real capable of using the signifier as such, that is, to speak, not so as to inform you, but precisely so as to lure you. This possibility is what is distinctive about the existence of the signifier. But this isn't all. As soon as there is a subject and use of the signifier, use of the between-I [l'entre-je] is possible, that is to say, of the interposed subject. This inmixing of subjects is one of the most obvious elements in the dream of Irma's injection. Recall the three practitioners called in one by one by Freud, who wants to know what it is that's in Irma's throat. And these three farcical characters operate, 219 defend theses, talk only nonsense. They are the between-I's, who play an essential role here.

They are marginal to Freud's inquiry, whose major preoccupation at this time is defense. In a letter to Fliess he says this – I am right in the middle of what is outside nature.[6] This is what defense is, in effect, insofar as it has an essential relationship to the signifier, not to the prevalence of meaning, but to idolatry of the signifier as such. This is merely a pointer.

[4] See "Some Forms of Emotional Disturbance and their Relationship to Schizophrenia."

[5] "immixtion;" term used by Damourette and Pichon for the semantically different ways the subject's participation in an event or action can be described by a verb alone or by one of the verbs "faire," "voir," or "laisser" plus an infinitive: e.g., "opérer," "faire opérer," "voir opérer," and "laisser opérer." See Essai de grammaire de la langue française 5:791–817.

Isn't it precisely the inmixing of subjects that appears in delusion? This is a characteristic that is so essential to any intersubjective relation that, it may be said, there is no language that doesn't include quite special grammatical expressions to indicate it.

I'll give you an example. It's all the difference there is between The head of department who had this patient operated on by his resident and The head of department who was to operate on this patient had him operated on by his resident.[7] You must be able to see that, although they lead to the same action, they mean two completely different things. It's this that is constantly involved in delusion. One makes them do this. This is where the problem lies, we are a long way from being able just simply to say that the id is quite abruptly present and reappears in the real.

At the heart of the psychoses there is a dead end, perplexity concerning the signifier. Everything takes place as if the subject were reacting to this by an attempt at restitution, at compensation. Fundamentally the crisis is undoubtedly unleashed by some question or other. Which is . . . ? I've got no idea. I suppose that the subject reacts to the signifier's absence by all the more emphatically affirming another one that as such is essentially enigmatic. I told you that the Other with a big O, qua bearer of the signifier, is excluded. The Other is thereby all the more powerfully affirmed between it and the subject, at the level of the little other, of the imaginary. This is where all the between-I phenomena that make up what is apparent in the symptomatology of psychosis take place – at the level of the other subject, of the one who holds the initiative in the delusion – in the case of Schreber, Professor Flechsig or God who is potentially so seductive that he places the world order in danger by virtue of the attraction.

It's at the level of the between-I, that is, of the little other, of the subject's double, who is both his ego and not his ego, that words appear that are a kind of running commentary on existence. We observe this phenomenon in mental automatism, but it's much more accentuated here, as there is a sort of teasing use of the signifier in the sentences that are begun then interrupted.
220 That level of the signifier which is that of the sentence comprises a middle, a beginning, and an end, and thus requires a conclusion. This is what enables

[6] This may be a reference to the remark, "All I was trying to do was to explain defense, but just try to explain something from the very core of nature!" Letter of August 16, 1895, Freud-Fliess, 136; Letter 27, Origins, 123.

[7] The two sentences are Le médecin-chef qui a fait opérer ce malade par son interne and Le médecin-chef qui devait opérer ce malade, il l'a fait opérer par son interne.

the play upon expectation, a slowing down that occurs at the imaginary level of the signifier, as if the solution to the enigma, for want of being able to be formulated in any really open manner other than through the primordial assertion of the other's initiative, is given by showing that it's a question of the signifier.

Just as the formula in bold letters that appears at the conclusion to the dream of Irma's injection shows the solution to what is at the end of Freud's desire – nothing more important in effect than a formula of organic chemistry – so we find, in the phenomenon of delusion, in the commentaries and in the buzzing of discourse in its pure form, the indication that it's a question of the signifier.

On primordial signifiers and the lack of one

A CROSSROADS
BASIC SIGNIFIERS
A NEW SIGNIFIER IN THE REAL APPROACHES TO THE HOLE
IDENTIFICATORY COMPENSATION

The distinction I have been insisting upon this year between the signifier and the signified turns out to be particularly justified by examination of the psychoses. Today I would like to make you feel this.

What are we looking for, we analysts, when we investigate a mental disturbance, whether it's confirmed in a patent manner or is latent, whether it masks itself or reveals itself in symptoms or conduct? We are always looking for meaning. This is what makes us different. The psychoanalyst is credited with not letting himself be deceived over the true meaning. When he uncovers the significance that an object has acquired for the subject, the register of meaning is always involved, that of a meaning which he regards as concerning the subject in some way. This is where I want you to pause, for there is a crossroads here.

The interest, the desire, the craving, which captures the subject in a meaning leads to a search for its type, mold, preformation, in the register of instinctual relations in which this subject appears correlated to an object – hence the construction of the theory of instincts, the foundations on which the analytic discovery rests. Here we have a relational world or, I should almost say, maze which comprises so many bifurcations, communications, 222 turnings back, as to leave us satisfied – that is to say, ultimately, that we lose ourselves in them. This is a tangible fact in our daily handling of these meanings.

Take homosexual attachment as an example, which is an essential component of the Oedipal drama. We say that the meaning of the homosexual relation tends to emerge in the inverted Oedipus complex. In the case of neurosis we say most of the time that the subject defends against this attachment that is more or less latent in his conduct, but still tends to appear. We speak of defense – it has several modes. We look for its cause, which we define as the fear of castration. We are never short of an explanation, moreover – if this one won't do, we shall find another one.

But whether it be this one here or another one, isn't it apparent, as the slightest familiarity with analytic literature will show, that the question of the order of coherence at work is never raised?

Why should we allow that the homosexual orientation of libidinal investment involves causal coherence for the subject from the outset? In what way does being captured by the homosexual imago entail for the subject that he lose his penis? What is the order of causality that implies what is known as the primary process? Up to what point is a causal relation to be admitted here? What are the modes of causality that the subject fears in imaginary capture? Is it sufficient that we observe this imaginary relation – with all its implications, which are themselves constructed since it's a question of the imaginary – for it to be given in the subject, whereas we see it from the outside? I'm not saying that we are wrong to think that the fear of castration, with all its consequences, enters into play automatically in a male subject caught in the pacifying capture of the homosexual relation. I'm saying that we never question it. And there would no doubt be different answers according to different cases. The causal coherence here is constructed, through an unwarranted extrapolation from things of the imaginary onto the real. When it is the pleasure principle, resolution and return to an equilibrium, a requirement of desire, that is at issue, we quite naturally slide into bringing the reality principle – or something else – into play.

This enables us to return to our crossroads. Desire is at first sight understood as an essentially imaginary relation. Setting out from here, we set about cataloguing instincts, their equivalences and interconnections. Let's instead stop and ask ourselves whether these are merely biological laws that render a number of meanings instinctually interesting for the human subject. What part does that which depends on the signifier play in all this?

In fact, the signifier, with its own action and insistence, intervenes in all 223 of the human being's interests – however profound, primitive, elementary we suppose them to be.

I have spent days and lessons trying by all available means to give you a glimpse of what we might provisionally call the autonomy of the signifier, that is, the fact that it has its own laws. Undoubtedly, they are extremely difficult to isolate, since we always set the signifier to work among meanings.

This is to state the interest of linguistic considerations on the problem. It's impossible to study how this phenomenon called language, which is the most fundamental of interhuman relations, functions unless one draws this distinction between the signifier and the signified from the outset. And the step I ask you to take in this seminar is to follow me when I say to you that the sense of the analytic discovery isn't simply to have found meanings but to have gone much further than anyone has ever gone in reading them, namely right to the signifier. That this fact is neglected explains the dead ends, the confusions, the circles and tautologies, that analytic research encounters.

The mainspring of the analytic discovery isn't to be found in the so-called libidinal or instinctual meanings relative to a whole range of behavior. These exist, it's true. But in the human being those meanings that are the closest to need, meanings that are relative to the most purely biological insertion into a nutritive and captivating environment, primordial meanings, are, in their sequence and in their very foundation, subject to laws that are the laws of the signifier.

If I spoke to you about day and night, it was to make you feel that the day, the very notion of the day, the word day, the notion of the coming of the day, is something that is properly speaking ungraspable in any reality. The opposition between day and night is a signifying opposition, which goes infinitely beyond all the meanings it may ultimately cover, indeed beyond every kind of meaning. If I took day and night as examples, it's of course because our subject is man and woman. The signifier man and the signifier woman are something other than a passive attitude and an active attitude, an aggressive attitude and a yielding attitude, something other than forms of behavior. There is undoubtedly a hidden signifier here which, of course, can nowhere 224 be incarnated absolutely, but which is nevertheless the closest to being incarnated in the existence of the word man and the word woman.

If these registers of being are anywhere, in the final analysis it's in words. It isn't obligatory that they be verbalized words. It may be a sign on a wall, it may be, for the so-called primitive, a painting or a stone, but it's elsewhere than in types of conduct or patterns.[1]

This is not new. When we say that the Oedipus complex is essential for the human being to be able to accede to a humanized structure of the real, it can't mean anything else.

Everything that abounds in our literature, the fundamental principles on which we agree, imply it – in order for there to be reality, adequate access to reality, in order for the sense of reality to be a reliable guide, in order for reality not to be what it is in psychosis, the Oedipus complex has to have been lived through. Now, we are only able to express this complex, its triangular crystallization, its various modalities and consequences, its terminal crisis, called a decline,[2] which is ratified by the subject's entry into a new dimension, insofar as the subject is at once himself and the other two partners. This is what is meant by the term identification that you are always using. Thus here we have intersubjectivity and dialectical organization. This would be unthinkable if the field we have localized under the name of the Oedipus complex didn't have a symbolic structure.

I don't believe that this analysis can be questioned. The fact that it isn't generally accepted alters nothing. It's enough that certain people take it to be certain for it to be raised, by this very fact alone, as an issue. Equilibrium, the right situation for the human subject in reality, depends, at one of its levels at the very least, on a purely symbolic experience, on an experience that implies the conquest of the symbolic relation as such.

On reflection, do we need psychoanalysis to tell us this? Aren't we astounded that philosophers didn't emphasize ages ago that human reality is irreducibly structured as signifying?

Day and night, man and woman, peace and war – I could enumerate more oppositions that don't emerge out of the real world but give it its framework, its axes, its structure, that organize it, that bring it about that there is in effect a reality for man, and that he can find his bearings therein. The notion of reality that we bring to bear in analysis presupposes this web, this mesh of signifiers. This isn't new. It's constantly being implied in analytic discourse, but is never isolated as such. This isn't necessarily a drawback, but it is one 225 in, for example, what has been written on the psychoses.

Concerning the psychoses, the same mechanisms of attraction, repulsion, conflict, and defense as in the neuroses have been invoked, whereas the results are phenomenologically and psychopathologically distinct from, if not opposed to, one another. One is content with the same effects of meaning. This is where the mistake is. Thus the need to pause over the existence of the structure of the signifier as such – in a word, such as it exists in psychosis.

I'll pick things up again from the beginning and I'll keep myself to the bare minimum – since we have distinguished between the signifier and the signified, we must allow for the possibility that psychosis not only depends on what appears at the level of meanings, of their proliferation, of their labyrinth, in which the subject is supposedly lost or, even, arrested at a fixation, but also that essentially it stems from something that is situated at the level of the subject's relations with the signifier.

The signifier is to be thought of initially as distinct from meaning. It's characterized by not in itself possessing a literal meaning [signification propre]. Try to imagine, then, what the appearance of a pure signifier might be like.

Of course, we can't imagine this, by definition. And yet, since we ask ourselves questions about origins, we must try to get closer to what this might represent.

Our experience makes us constantly feel that these basic signifiers without which the order of human meanings would be unable to establish itself exist. Isn't this what all mythologies explain to us, also? Magical thought is how modern scientific drivel puts this whenever it is confronted with something that goes beyond the little shrunken brains of those to whom it seems that the necessary condition for penetrating the cultural domain is that nothing should capture them in any desire that might humanize them. Magical thought – does this term strike you as sufficient for explaining why people who, in every likelihood, have had the same relationships to birth as we have should have interpreted day, night, earth, and sky as entities that combine and copulate in a family studded with murders, with incest, with extraordinary eclipses, with disappearances, metamorphoses, mutilations, with one or other of the terms? Do you believe that these people really take these things literally? This really is putting them at the mental level of the evolutionist of our day, who thinks he has explained it all.

I think that as far as the inadequacy of thought is concerned, we've got no reason to be envious of the ancients.

226 Isn't it on the contrary clear that these mythologies are aimed at installing man, at placing him upright, in the world – and that they tell him what the primordial signifiers are, how to conceive their relationships and their genealogy? There is no need here to inquire into Greek or Egyptian mythology, since M. Griaule came and explained African mythology to you.[3] This was about a placenta that had been cut into four, and one of the pieces, ripped out before the others, introduced into the four primitive elements the initial dissymmetry and the dialectic by which are explained not only the division of the fields but also the manner in which clothing is worn, what it is that clothing, weaving, such and such an art, etc., signify. This is the genealogy of signifiers insofar as it's essential if a human being is to find his bearings in them. They aren't just signposts, or external, stereotyped moulds, layered over forms of behavior, nor are they just patterns.[4] It makes possible for him free circulation in a world that henceforth has order in it. Modern man is perhaps less well off.

It's through these myths that the primitive finds his bearings in the order of meaningfulnesses. He possesses keys for all sorts of extraordinary situations. Should he be in breach of everything, signifiers still support him, which for example will tell him exactly the form of punishment entailed by the outburst that produced the disturbances. The rule imposes its fundamental rhythm upon him. As for us, we're reduced to very fearfully remaining conformist, we are afraid that we'll go a little bit mad as soon as we don't say exactly the same thing as everybody else. This is the situation of modern man.

Let's flesh out the signifier's presence in the real, insofar as this is possible. The emergence of a new signifier, with all the consequences, down to one's most personal conduct and thoughts, that this may entail, the appearance of a register such as that of a new religion, for example, isn't something that is easily manipulated – experience proves it. Meanings shift, common sentiments and socially conditioned relations change, but there are also all sorts of so-called revelatory phenomena that can appear in a sufficiently disturbing mode for the terms we use in the psychoses not to be entirely inappropriate for them. The appearance of a new structure in the relations between basic signifiers and the creation of a new term in the order of the signifier are devastating in character.

This is no concern of ours. We don't need to take any interest in the appearance of a signifier, since it's a phenomenon that we never encounter professionally. On the other hand, we do deal with subjects in whom we 227 apparently bring to light something, an irreducible kernel, that occurs at the level of the Oedipal relation. The further question I invite you to ask yourselves is this – can't one conceive of considering the consequences of the essential lack of a signifier in these immediately accessible subjects called psychotics?

Here again, I'm saying nothing new. I'm simply clearly articulating what is implied in our discourse when we speak of the Oedipus complex. A neurosis without Oedipus doesn't exist. This question has been raised, but there's no truth in it.[5] We readily acknowledge that in psychosis something hasn't functioned, is essentially incomplete, in the Oedipus complex. A certain analyst has had a paranoid-like case to study in vivo, homologous in certain respects to the case of President Schreber. He says a number of things that in the end come very close to what I've been telling you, except that obviously he gets confused because he's unable to formulate things as I'm suggesting they should be in saying that psychosis consists of a hole, a lack, at the level of the signifier.

This may strike you as vague, but it's adequate, even if we can't say straightaway what this signifier is. We shall nevertheless figure it out by approximation, beginning from the meanings connoted as we approach it. May one speak of approaching a hole? Why not? There is nothing more dangerous than approaching a void.

There is another form of defense that a forbidden tendency or meaning will provoke. It's the defense that consists in not approaching the place where there is no answer to the question.

One is more at ease this way and, after all, this is the characteristic of normal people. Don't ask us questions, we've been taught, and this is why we're here. But as psychoanalysts it's nevertheless our business to try to enlighten these poor unfortunates who have asked themselves questions. We're certain that neurotics have asked themselves a question. Psychotics, it's not so sure. The answer has perhaps come to them before the question – this is a hypothesis. Or else, the question has asked itself of its own accord – this isn't inconceivable.

There is no question for a subject without another to whom he has addressed it. Someone was saying to me recently, in analysis – In the final analysis, I have got nothing to ask of anyone. It was a sad avowal. I pointed out to him 228 that if in any case he had anything to ask he would necessarily have to ask it of someone. This is the other side of the same question. If we implant this relation firmly in our heads, it won't appear extravagant if I say that it's also possible that the question asks itself first, that it's not the subject who has asked it. As I've shown you in my case presentations, what happens at the beginning of a psychosis is of this order.

Recall this little subject who, to us, appeared evidently very lucid. Given the way he had grown up and prospered in existence, in the midst of the anarchy, which was merely a bit more patent than in other cases, of his family situation, he had attached himself to a friend who had become his point of implantation in existence, and all of a sudden something happened, he wasn't able to explain what. It became very clear to us that this was bound up with the appearance of his partner's daughter, and we can add that he experienced this fact as incestuous, hence defense.

We haven't been very stringent about the rigor of our remarks ever since we learned from Freud that the principle of contradiction doesn't work in the unconscious – a suggestive and interesting formulation but, if one doesn't go any further than this, a bit brief – when something fails to work in one sense it's explained by its contrary. And this is why analysis explains things so admirably. This simple little chap had understood a lot less than we had. He was knocking against something, and he didn't have any keys, he spent three months in bed in order to find his bearings again. He was in a state of perplexity.

A minimum of the sensitivity that our trade gives us clearly demonstrates something that can always be seen in what is known as prepsychosis, namely the feeling that the subject has come to the edge of a hole. This is to be taken literally. It's not a matter of understanding what is going on when we aren't present. It isn't a matter of phenomenology. It's a matter of understanding, not imagining, what happens for a subject when the question comes to him from where there is no signifier, when it's a hole, a lack, that makes itself felt as such.

I repeat, it's not a matter of phenomenology. It's not a matter of playing the madman – one does this enough ordinarily, in one's internal dialogue. It's a matter of determining what the consequences are of a situation that is determined thus.

Not every stool has four legs. There are some that stand upright on three. Here, though, there is no question of their lacking any, otherwise things go very badly indeed. Well then, let me tell you that the significant points of purchase that uphold the little world of the solitary little men in the modern 229 crowd are very few in number. It's possible that at the outset the stool doesn't have enough legs, but that up to a certain point it will nevertheless stand up, when the subject, at a certain crossroads of his biographical history, is confronted by this lack that has always existed. To designate it we've made do until now with the term Verwerfung.

This may lead to more than one conflict, but it isn't essentially a matter of conflicting constellations which in neurosis are explained by a significant decompensation. In psychosis it's the signifier that is in question, and as the signifier is never solitary, as it invariably forms something coherent – this is the very meaningfulness of the signifier – the lack of one signifier necessarily brings the subject to the point of calling the set of signifiers into question.

Here you have the fundamental key to the problems of the beginning of psychosis, the sequence of its stages, and its meaning.

In fact, the terms in which these questions are usually framed imply what I'm telling you. A Katan, for example, states that hallucination is a mode of defense like any other.[6] He's aware, however, that there are phenomena here which though very closely related are different – the certainty of meaning without content, which may simply be called interpretation, is, effectively, different from hallucination properly so-called. He explains the two by mechanisms designed to protect the subject according to another mode than the one in operation in the neuroses. In the neuroses it's meaning that temporarily disappears, is eclipsed, and goes and lodges itself somewhere else, whereas reality itself remains. Such defenses are inadequate in the case of psychosis, where what is to protect the subject appears in reality. The subject places outside what may stir up inside him the instinctual drive that he has to confront.

It's obvious that the term reality as it's used here is totally inadequate. Why not have the courage to say that the mechanism being appealed to is the id – since it's considered to have the power to modify and disturb what one may call the truth of the thing?

According to this explanation it's a matter of the subject's protecting himself against homosexual temptations. Nobody has ever gone on to say – Schreber less so than anyone else – that all of a sudden he could no longer see people, that the very face of his male counterparts was, by the hand of eternal God, covered with a cloak. He could always see them perfectly well. One simply believes that he couldn't see them for what they really were for him, namely attractive love objects. At issue is, therefore, not what one vaguely calls reality, as if this were the same thing as the reality of a wall we might bump into, but a meaningful reality, which doesn't present us simply with footholds and obstacles, but a truth that verifies itself and installs itself by itself as orienting this world and introducing beings, to call them by their name, into it.

Why not admit, then, that the id is capable of conjuring away the truth of the thing?

But we can also raise the question from the opposite direction, namely, What happens when the truth of the thing is lacking, when there is nothing left to represent it in its truth, when for example the register of the father defaults?

The father is not simply the generator. He's also the one who has rightful possession of the mother – and in peace, in principle. His function is central to the realization of the Oedipus complex and conditions the son's accession – which is also a function, correlative to the first – to the model of virility. What happens if a certain lack occurs in the formative function of the father?

The father may well have had a certain mode of relation such that the son does indeed adopt a feminine position, but it's not through fear of castration. We are all familiar with cases of these delinquent or psychotic sons who proliferate in the shadow of a paternal personality of exceptional character, one of these social monsters referred to as venerable. They are often characters strongly marked by a style of radiance and success, but in a unilateral manner, in the register of unbridled ambition or authoritarianism, sometimes of talent, of genius. They don't necessarily have to be a genius, have merit, or be mediocre or nasty, it's sufficient that this be unilateral and monstrous. It's certainly not by chance that a psychopathic personality subversion, in particular, is produced in such a situation.

Let's suppose that this situation entails for the subject the impossibility of assuming the realization of the signifier father at the symbolic level. What's he left with? He's left with the image the paternal function is reduced to. It's an image which isn't inscribed in any triangular dialectic, but whose function as model, as specular alienation, nevertheless gives the subject a fastening point and enables him to apprehend himself on the imaginary plane.

If the captivating image is without limits, if the character in question manifests himself simply in the order of strength and not in that of the pact, then a relation of rivalry, aggressiveness, fear, etc. appear. Insofar as the relationship remains on the imaginary, dual, and unlimited plane, it doesn't possess the meaning of reciprocal exclusion that is included in specular confrontation, but possesses instead the other function, that of imaginary capture. The image, on its own, initially adopts the sexualized function, without any need of an intermediary, an identification with the mother, or with anything else. The subject then adopts this intimidated position that we can observe in the fish or lizard. The imaginary relation alone is installed on a plane that has nothing typical about it and is dehumanizing because it doesn't leave any place for the relation of reciprocal exclusion that enables the ego's image to be founded on the orbit given by the model of the more complete other.

The alienation here is radical, it isn't bound to a nihilating signified, as in a certain type of rivalrous relation with the father, but to a nihilation of the signifier. The subject will have to bear the weight of this real, primitive dispossession of the signifier and adopt compensation for it, at length, over the course of his life, through a series of purely conformist identifications with characters who will give him the feeling for what one has to do to be a man.

The situation may be sustained for a long time this way, psychotics can live compensated lives with apparently ordinary behavior considered to be normally virile, and then all of a sudden, mysteriously, God only knows why, become decompensated. What is it that suddenly renders insufficient the imaginary crutches which have enabled the subject to compensate for the absence of the signifier? How does the signifier as such again lay down its requirements? How does what is missing intervene and question?

Before trying to resolve these problems, I would like you to notice how the appearance of the question raised by a lack of a signifier manifests itself. It manifests itself through fringe phenomena in which the set of signifiers is brought into play. A great disturbance of the internal discourse, in the phenomenological sense of the term, comes about and the masked Other that is always in us appears lit up all of a sudden, revealing itself in its own function, for this function is the only one that henceforth maintains the subject at the level of discourse which threatens to fail him entirely and disappear. Such is the sense of the twilight of reality that characterizes the beginning of psychoses.

We shall try to advance a bit further next time.

Secretaries to the insane

A READING SOUL MURDER
THE IMPLICATIONS OF THE SIGNIFIER
THE LITTLE MEN
THE THREE FUNCTIONS OF THE FATHER

That Schreber was exceptionally gifted, as he himself puts it, at observing phenomena of which he is the center and at searching for their truth, makes his testimony incomparably valuable.

Let's pause for a moment. I began with this reading in order to give you an indication of what I intend doing today, namely, take you through a number of passages that I have chosen as the best I could from the four or five hundred-odd pages of Schreber's book.

We are apparently willingly going to become secretaries to the insane. This expression is generally used to reproach alienists for their impotence. Well then, not only shall we be his secretaries, but we shall take what he recounts literally – which till now has always been considered as the thing to avoid doing.

Wasn't it because they didn't go far enough in listening to the insane that the great observers who drew up the first classifications impoverished the material they were given – to such an extent that it appeared problematic and fragmentary to them?

234 On Friday I presented a case of chronic hallucinatory psychosis. Weren't you struck, those of you who were there, by how much more alive what one obtains is if, instead of trying at all cost to establish whether the hallucination is verbal or sensory or nonsensory, one simply listens to the subject? That patient the other day brought forth, invented, as though by a sort of imaginative reproduction, questions that one really felt had been previously implied by her own situation, without having been, strictly speaking, formulated by her. Of course, one can't stop there if one wants to understand it entirely, for one has to know why things happen this way. But one has to begin by looking at things in a balanced way, and this is located at the level of the signifier-signified phenomenon.

This dimension is far from having been exhausted by psychology, or metapsychology, or traditional classical parapsychology, which make use of academic categories – hallucination, interpretation, sensation, perception. One does indeed feel that the problem doesn't arise at this level and that this is even a very bad beginning, one that leaves no hope of ever correctly raising the question of what delusion is, or of the level at which the displacement of the subject in relation to the sense phenomena occurs.

It can't be too often suggested to psychologists and doctors that they make use of what is nevertheless accessible to the experience of the common man. I propose an exercise for you. Reflect a bit on what reading is.

What is it that you call reading? What is the optimum moment for reading? When are you quite certain that you are reading? You will tell me that there is no room for doubt, and that one has a feeling of reading. There are many things that count against this. In dreams, for example, we are quite capable of having the feeling of reading something, whereas, obviously, we can't claim that there is any correspondence with a signifier. Consuming certain toxic substances may lead us to the same feeling. Doesn't this suggest the idea that we can't trust the apprehension of the thing by our feelings, and that the objectivity of the relation between the signifier and the signified has to be introduced? This is where the problem and its complications really begin.

There is for example the case of someone pretending to read. Long ago, when I was traveling in countries that had just gained their independence, I saw a gentleman, the attendant to a lord of the Atlas,[1] take a small document that was intended for him, and I noticed immediately that he didn't understand one word of it, for he was holding it upside down. But, with great seriousness, he uttered something – a story about not losing face before the 235 respectful circle. Was he reading or wasn't he? Undeniably he was reading the essential part, namely, that my credentials were sound.

The other extreme is when you already know what is in the text by heart. This happens more often than one thinks. Those texts of Freud's that are in common use in your psychological and medical training you can be said to know by heart already. You only read what you already know by heart. This is what makes it possible for what forms the basis of so-called scientific literature to be singularly relativized, at least in our domain. One often gets the impression that what orientates, fundamentally, the point of a discourse is perhaps nothing other than to stay exactly within the limits of what has already been said. It seems that the ultimate point of the discourse is to give a sign to its readers and to prove that the signatory is, if I can put it like this, a nonnobody, that he is capable of writing what everybody else writes.

Here one observes a flagrant lack of correspondence between the intellectual capacities of authors, which clearly range over very great limits indeed, and the remarkable uniformity of what they contribute to the discourse. The most ordinary scientific life presents us with this patent lack of correspondence. Why, then, stigmatize in advance, as null and void, what issues from a subject who is presumed to be in the order of the meaningless, but whose testimony is more unusual or, even, entirely original? However disturbed his relations with the external world may be, perhaps his testimony still remains valuable.

As a matter of fact, we notice, and not simply concerning a case as remarkable as President Schreber but concerning any one of these subjects, that if we know how to listen the delusion of the chronic hallucinatory psychoses reveals that the subject has a very specific relationship with respect to the entire system of language in its various orders. Only the patient is able to bear witness to this, and he bears witness most energetically.

We have no reason not to take down word for word what he says, under the pretext of something or other that is supposed to be ineffable, incommunicable, affective – you know, everything that is constructed around supposedly primitive phenomena. The subject effectively bears witness to a certain turning [virage] in the relationship to language, which may be called erotization or pacification. His way of falling under the phenomenon of discourse as a whole undoubtedly reveals to us, as soon as we give up looking for the lowest common denominator in mental life, a dimension that is constitutive of this phenomenon. This dimension is the distance between psychical lived experience and the half-external situation in which, in relation to all language 236 phenomena, not only the insane but all human subjects find themselves.

Methodologically we are therefore correct in accepting the testimony of the insane about their position with respect to language, and we should take it into account in the overall analysis of the subject's relationships to language. This is the major and enduring interest of the legacy that Schreber has left us in his Memoirs, an effectively memorable thing and one worthy of our meditation.

Schreber himself points out that something in him was at a certain moment profoundly disturbed. A fissure appeared in the order of his relations with the other, which he mysteriously calls soul murder.

This remains obscure, but our experience of analytic categories enables us to find our bearings here. It's a matter of something essentially related to the origins of the ego, to what for the subject is the ellipsis of his being, to this image in which he is reflected under the name of ego.

This problematic is inserted between the image of the ego and the image that is raised, elevated, in relation to the first, that of the big Other, the paternal imago, insofar as it founds the double perspective within the subject of the ego and the ego ideal – leaving the superego to one side on this occasion. We get the impression that it's insofar as he hasn't acquired or has lost this Other that he encounters the purely imaginary other, the fallen and meager other with whom he is not able to have any relations except relations of frustration – this other negates him, literally kills him. This other is that which is most radical in imaginary alienation.

Now, this capture by the double is correlative of the appearance of what can be called the permanent discourse that underlies the inscription of what takes place over the course of the subject's history and doubles all his acts. It isn't impossible, moreover, to see this discourse emerge in a normal subject.

I'll give you an example that almost lends itself to an extrapolation from lived experience, that of the solitary character on a desert island. Robinson Crusoe is effectively one of the themes of modern thought, appearing for the first time, to my knowledge, in Baltasar Gracián.[2] This is a psychological problem which is accessible, if not to the imagination, at least to experience – what happens when the human subject lives all alone? What becomes of 237 the latent discourse? At the end of two or three years of solitude what becomes of the order of vocalization, I'm going to sell some wood?

You may also wonder what becomes of vocalization for a person who gets lost in the mountains – and it's undoubtedly not without reason that the phenomenon is clearer in the mountains, since these places are perhaps less humanized. That which takes place, namely the perceptible mobilization of the external world concerning a meaning liable to emerge from any quarter, may give us an idea of this aspect, constantly liable to crop up, of a half-insane discourse. The continuous existence of this discourse may be considered analogous to what is going on in the insane – the verbalization phenomena in Schreber only accentuate it, on the whole. The question now is this – why does the phenomenon appear in the delusional subject? in the margin of what does it appear? in order to signify what? what is it mobilized by?

I shall take another passage, equally chosen at random, because all this is so insistent in Schreber that confirmation of the phenomena I'm indicating can be found everywhere.

Reading from the Memoirs, 308–10

Following this you'll find some thoughts on the slowing down of the tempo. This is where we have to push our analysis further.

It's essential to the phenomena of meaning that the signifier be indivisible. One can't section a piece of signifier like one can section the tape of a tape-recorder. If you cut the tape of a tape-recorder the sentence breaks off, but the effect of the sentence doesn't come to a halt at the same point. The signifier contains all kinds of implications, and it's not because you are listeners or decipherers by profession that in certain cases you are able to complete the sentence. The unit of meaning is constantly showing the signifier functioning according to certain laws. The fact that within a delusion voices play upon this property can't be taken to be a matter of indifference, and we can't exclude the hypothesis that it is fundamentally motivated by a precisely more radical, more global, relationship to the phenomenon of the signifier.

On this basis we shall ask ourselves why it's effectively in the relationship to the signifier that the subject invests all his capacities for interest. To explore the problem at this level is not at all to alter the function of energetics. It is in no way to reject the notion of libido. It's only to ask what, in psychosis, the elective interest in the relationship to the signifier means.

238 Here is a brief note concerning the relationship between divine intelligence and human intelligence.

However much it appears to have been worked over, the equivalence between nerves and presenced remarks is founded on the subject's primitive experience. The nerves are this verbiage and these refrains, this verbalized insistence that has become his universe. At the same time, on the other hand, the incidental presences in his surroundings are afflicted with unreality and become fleeting-improvised-men. The presences that count have become essentially verbal, and the sum of these verbal presences is for him identical with the divine presence, this sole and unique presence that is his correlative and his guarantor.

The notion that the divine intelligence is the sum of human intelligences is stated in formulas that are sufficiently rigorous and elegant for us to gain the impression that we have before us a small fragment of a philosophical system. If I had asked you who this was by, perhaps you may not have been far short of replying – Spinoza.

The question is what this testimony by the subject is worth. Well then, he is giving us his experience, which imposes itself as the very structure of reality for him.

The fifth chapter particularly concerns the so-called fundamental language which, as I've already taught you, is, on the subject's own testimony, made up of a species of particularly vigorous High German, crammed with archaic expressions drawn from the underlying etymologies of this language.

Reading of the Memoirs, 46–47

We are getting closer. One gets the sense that the subject has certainly meditated longer on the nature of the emergence of speech than perhaps we ourselves have done so far. He is well aware that speech is located at another level than that at which the organs capable of materializing it are put into use. You will notice that he introduces the dream as something that belongs essentially to the world of language. It isn't beside the point to observe the surprising illogicality that this represents on the part of an insane person who isn't supposed to be aware of the highly significant character that since Freud we give to dreams. It's certain that Schreber had no inkling of this.

The note on pages 49–50 is phenomenologically very rich concerning the ambient meanings in the context of a German bourgeoisie of quite a lengthy tradition, for we can map out the history of the Schrebers as far back as the eighteenth century.[3] They have been part of the intellectual life of their country in a fairly brilliant way – I shall return to the personality of Schreber's father later. The themes that emerge in a second early stage of his delusion are obviously tied to this complex of cultural encirclement which sadly blossomed into the renowned party that was to throw all Europe into war. The encirclement by the Slavs, by the Jews, all this is already there in this worthy fellow who doesn't at all seem to have participated in any passionate political tendency, except, at the time of his studies, in these student societies he speaks of.

We shall come back to the existence of the souls who are the support of the sentences that constantly include the subject in their turmoil. They waste away with time, down to these famous little men that have greatly attracted the attention of analysts. Katan, in particular, devotes an article to these little men who have been the occasion for all sorts of more or less ingenious interpretations, such as assimilating them to spermatozoa that the subject, having rejected masturbation at a certain point, refuses to lose.[4] There is no need to reject such an interpretation but, even if we allow it, it doesn't exhaust the problem.

[3] This appears to refer to the body of the text rather than to the footnote.
[4] See Katan, "Schreber's Hallucinations about the 'Little Men.' "

The important thing is that it involves regressive characters who have returned to their original procreative cell. Katan seems to have forgotten some very early works by Silberer, who was the first to speak of dreams in which there occur certain images of spermatozoa or of the primitive female cell of the ovum.[5] At that time, which may be regarded as archaic, Silberer had nevertheless observed perfectly well that it is above all a question of grasping what the function played by these images was, whether they were fantasized or oneiric. It's moreover curious to see someone, in 1908, take into consideration the notion of what these images signify. According to him, their appearance has a meaning of mortality. It's a question of a return to origins. It's equivalent to a manifestation of the death instinct. We can see this clearly in the present case since the little men occur in the context of the twilight of the world, a properly constitutive phase of the delusion's development.

240 Be that as it may, on this occasion we're unable to avoid wondering whether a certain incompleteness in the realization of the paternal function isn't involved in Schreber's case. Every author has in fact attempted to explain the onset of Schreber's delusion with reference to the father. Not that Schreber was in conflict with his father at the time – he had disappeared a long time previously. Not that he was at a time of setback in acceding to paternal functions, since on the contrary he was entering a brilliant stage of his career and had been placed in a position of authority that seems to have solicited him to truly adopt a paternal position, to have offered him a support for idealizing and referring himself to this position. President Schreber's delusion would therefore depend more on the giddiness of success than on a sense of failure. This is what the understanding generated by authors of the mechanism determining the psychosis revolves around, at least on the psychical level.

For my part, I would make three responses on the subject of the function of the father.

Normally, the conquest of the Oedipal realization, the integration and introjection of the Oedipal image, is carried out – Freud says this unambiguously – by way of an aggressive relationship. In other words, it's by way of an imaginary conflict that symbolic integration takes place.

There is another way, different in nature. Ethnological experience shows us the importance, however residual it may be, of the phenomenon of couvade – imaginary realization here takes place by the symbolic putting into play of conduct. Isn't it something of this order that we have been able to locate in neurosis? The hysterical pregnancy that Eisler describes, which occurred following a traumatic breakdown of his equilibrium, isn't imaginary but symbolic.[6]

[5] See Herbert Silberer, "Zur Frage der Spermatozoenträume," "Spermatozoenträume," and "Zum Thema: Spermatozoenträume."

Isn't there a third way, which is in some sense embodied in delusions? These little men are forms of reabsorption, but they're also the representation of what will take place in the future. The world will be repeopled by Schreber men, men of a Schreberian spirit, small, fantasmatic beings – procreation after the deluge. Such is the prospect.

In sum, in the normal form the emphasis is placed upon the symbolic realization of the father by way of imaginary conflict – in the neurotic or paraneurotic form, upon the imaginary realization of the father by way of a symbolic exercise of conduct. And here, what do we see if not the real function of generation?

There's something here that nobody's interested in, neither neurotics nor primitives. I'm not saying that the latter don't know the real function played by the father in generation, simply that they're not interested in it. What they're interested in is the begetting of the soul, the begetting of the mind by 241 the father, the father as either symbolic or imaginary. But, curiously, in delusion it's in fact the father's real function in generation that we see emerge in an imaginary form, at least if we accept the identification analysts make between the little men and spermatozoa. There's a movement of retreat here between the three functions that define the problematic of the paternal function.

We are now engaged in reading this text and in the task of actualizing it to the utmost in the dialectical register of signifier and signified.

To each and everyone of you here I shall say this – if you investigate, as is certainly legitimate, the question of being, don't be too arrogant about it. In the articulated phenomenal dialectic I've put to you, speech is indeed the central reference point.

Metaphor and metonymy (I): "His sheaf was neither miserly nor spiteful"[1]

THE TRUTH OF THE FATHER
THE INVASION BY THE SIGNIFIER
SYNTAX AND METAPHOR
WERNICKE'S APHASIA

Sie leben also den Wahn wie sich selbst. Das ist das Geheimnis. This sentence is taken from the correspondence with Fliess,[2] where the beginnings of the themes that will appear successively in Freud's work can be found with singular prominence.

Would we have Freud's style if we didn't have these letters? Yes, we still would, but they teach us that this style, which is nothing other than the expression of what orientates and animates his research, never deviated. Even in 1939, when he wrote Moses and Monotheism, one feels that his passionate questioning hasn't waned and that it's still with the same almost desperate tenacity that he strives to explain how it is that man, in the very position of his being, should be so dependent upon these things for which he is obviously not cut out. This is said and named – it's a question of the truth.

I reread Moses and Monotheism with the intention of preparing for the paper I have been asked to give in two weeks time on the person of Freud.[3] It seems to me that in this work we find confirmation yet again of what I'm here trying to make you feel, namely that analysis is absolutely inseparable from a fundamental question about the way truth enters into the life of man. The dimension of truth is mysterious, inexplicable, nothing decisively enables the necessity of it to be grasped, since man accommodates himself to non-truth perfectly well. I shall try to show you that this is indeed the question that is troubling Freud to the end in Moses and Monotheism.

In this little book one senses a gesture of renunciation and a hidden face.
244 Having accepted death, he continues. The renewed questioning over the person of Moses, over his hypothetical fear, has no other motive than to answer this question – by what path does the dimension of truth enter in a living way into life, into the economy of man? Freud's answer is that it's mediated by the ultimate meaning of the idea of the father.

The father belongs to a reality that is sacred in itself, more spiritual than any other, since ultimately nothing in lived reality strictly speaking points to his function, his presence, his dominance. How does the truth of the father, how does this truth that Freud himself calls spiritual,[4] come to be placed in the foreground? The thing is thinkable only by means of this ahistorical drama, inscribed in the very flesh of men at the origin of all history – the death, the murder of the father. A myth, obviously, a very mysterious myth, one impossible to avoid in the coherence of Freud's thought. There is something veiled here.

All the work we did last year meets at this point – one can't deny the inevitability of Freud's intuition. Ethnographic criticisms are beside the point. It's a question of an essential dramatization through which an internal movement going beyond the human being enters into life – the symbol of the father.

The nature of the symbol remains to be clarified. We have come close to its essence by locating its genesis at the same point as that of the death instinct. We are expressing one and the same thing. We are moving towards a point of convergence – what does the signifier essentially signify in its signifying role? What is the original and initiatory function, in human life, of the existence of the symbol qua pure signifier?

This question takes us back to our study of the psychoses.

The sentence I have written on the blackboard is typical of Freud's style and I give it to you so that we may continue to hear its resonances.

In this letter Freud speaks of the different types of defence. The word has been so overused in our usage that we cannot help but wonder – who is defending himself? What is being defended? What is one defending oneself against? In psychoanalysis defence is directed against a mirage, a nothingness, a void, and not against anything that exists and carries weight in life. This latter enigma is veiled by the phenomenon itself even as we apprehend it. This letter shows us for the first time, in an especially clear way, the 245 various mechanisms of the neuroses and the psychoses.

Nevertheless, when he comes to psychosis it's as if Freud has been struck by a more profound enigma. He says – As for those suffering from paranoia, delusions, psychosis, they love their delusion as they love themselves.

[4] See "The Advance in Intellectuality," section C, pt. 2, essay 3, Moses and Monotheism, SE 23:111–15. Freud's "geistigkeit," "intellectuality" in SE, is translated by Lacan as "spiritualité."

There is an echo here, which should be given full weight, of what is said in the commandment, Love thy neighbor as thyself.

A sense of mystery is never absent from Freud's thought. It's its beginning, middle, and end. I believe that if we allow it to vanish, we lose what's essential to the very procedure upon which every analysis has to be founded. If we lose the mystery for one single moment we get lost in a new type of mirage.

Freud had the profound impression that something in the psychotic's relationship to his delusion goes beyond the workings of the signified and meanings, the workings of what we would later call id drives. There is an affection here, an attachment, an essential bringing to presence, the mystery of which remains almost total for us, which is that the delusional, the psychotic, clings to his delusion as to something which is himself.

With this resonance in our ears we shall once again raise the question raised last time concerning the economic function that the relationship to language assumes in the form and development of psychosis.

Let us start by taking as our data the sentences that Schreber tells us he hears coming from those intermediate beings, diverse in their nature – the forecourts of Heaven, the deceased souls or the blessed souls, these shadows, these ambiguous forms of beings dispossessed of existence and carriers of voices.

The full part of the sentence, which contains the kernel-words, as the linguists say, which give the sentence its sense, is not experienced as hallucinatory. On the contrary, the voice stops, forcing the subject to utter the meaning in question in the sentence.

Now it's time . . . that he was subdued![5] Here it's the implied expression that carries the significant weight. Our subject signifies to us that he is not hallucinating. He is placed in the overhang [porte à faux], in what remains empty after the grammatical or syntactic part of the sentence, consisting of auxiliaries, connectives, conjunctions, or adverbs, which is suddenly verbalized, as coming from without, as a sentence by the other. It's a sentence by this subject, who is both empty and full, whom I have named the inter-I of delusion.

246 Now that is going too far according to the conception of the souls. The entire function of this conception of the souls resides in what, according to Schreber, is put into words by somewhat higher agencies than the subjects that convey the refrains, learned by rote, made up of words he considers empty. It alludes to functional notions that decompose his various thoughts. A psychology does indeed have a place within his delusion, a dogmatic psychology that is expounded to him by the voices that interpellate him, by explaining to him how his thoughts are formed.

In particular, that which is implied has assumed a hallucinatory form and is not expressed out loud in the hallucination. This is the principal thought. The subject's delusional lived experience presents its own essence in the phenomenon. It indicates that the hallucinatory phenomenon lived through, whether elementary or not, lacks the principal thought. We rays lack thought, that is, that which signifies something.

With respect to what we might call the chain of the delusion, the subject seems to be both agent and patient. He undergoes rather than organizes the delusion. To be sure, as a finished product this delusion can up to a point be described as reasoning madness, in the sense that in certain respects its articulation is logical, though from a secondary point of view. That madness should achieve a synthesis of this nature is no less a problem than its very existence. It takes place over the course of a genesis that starts from elements perhaps immanent to [gros de] this construction, but which in their original form present themselves as closed or even enigmatic.

First there were several months of prepsychotic incubation in which the subject was in a state of profound confusion. This is the period in which the phenomena of the twilight of the world occur, which are characteristic of the beginning of a delusional period. Towards the middle of March 1894 he was admitted to Flechsig's clinic. In mid-November '93 the hallucinatory phenomena began, the spoken communications which he attributes to different grades in this fantasmatic world, consisting of two levels of divine reality, the anterior and posterior realms of God, and of all sorts of entities that are in a more or less advanced stage of reabsorption into this divine reality.

These entities, the souls, move in an opposite direction to what he calls the world order, a fundamental notion in the structuring of his delusion. Instead of moving towards the reintegration of the absolute Other, they move on the contrary in the direction of attaching themselves onto him, Schreber, in forms that vary over the delusion's course of development. At the outset we see the phenomenon of introjection expressed openly, in his lived experience, when he says that Flechsig's soul enters him here and that it resembles the threads of a spider's web, that it's big enough to be unassimilable by him, and that it 247 comes out again through his mouth.[6] Here we have a sort of lived schema of introjection, which will become attenuated later on, be polished into a much more spiritualized form.

In fact Schreber will become increasingly integrated into this ambiguous speech with which he becomes as one, and to which, with all his being, he gives a response. He literally loves it like himself. This phenomenon can hardly be described as an internal dialogue since it's precisely around the existence of the other that the meaning of the preeminence of the signifying game revolves, increasingly emptied of meaning.

What is the meaning of this invasion by the signifier that tends to drain itself of signified as it occupies more and more place in the libidinal relation and invests all the moments, all the desires, of the subject?

I paused at a series of those repetitive texts, which it would be tedious to unfold for you here. Something struck me – even when the sentences may have a meaning, one never encounters anything that resembles a metaphor.

But what is a metaphor?

I am introducing you here to an order of inquiry never pointed out.

Metaphor is not the easiest thing in the world to speak about. Bossuet says it's an abridged simile [comparaison]. Everyone is aware that this is not entirely satisfactory, and I believe that in fact no poet would accept it. I say no poet because a definition of poetical style could be to say that it begins with metaphor, and that where metaphor ceases poetry ceases also.

His sheaf was neither miserly nor spiteful – Victor Hugo. That's a metaphor. It's certainly not a latent simile, it's not – just as the sheaf was willingly dispersed among the needy, so our character was neither miserly nor spiteful. There's not a comparison but an identification. The dimension of metaphor must be less difficult for us to enter than for anyone else, provided that we recognize that what we usually call it is identification. But that's not all – our 248 use of the term symbolic in fact leads us to restrict its sense, to designate only the metaphorical dimension of the symbol.

Metaphor presupposes that a meaning is the dominant datum and that it deflects, commands, the use of the signifier to such an extent that the entire species of preestablished, I should say lexical, connections comes undone. Nothing in any dictionary usage can suggest for one instant that a sheaf is capable of being miserly, and even less of being spiteful. And yet it's clear that the use of a language is only susceptible to meaning once it's possible to say, His sheaf was neither miserly nor spiteful, that is to say, once the meaning has ripped the signifier from its lexical connections.

Here we have the ambiguity of the signifier and the signified. Without the signifying structure, that is, without predicative articulation, without the distance maintained between the subject and its attributes, the sheaf cannot be qualified as miserly or spiteful. It's because there is a syntax, a primordial order of the signifier, that the subject is maintained as separate, as different from its qualities. It's completely out of the question that an animal could create a metaphor, even though we have no reason to think that it doesn't also have an intuition of what is generous and what can easily and abundantly grant it what it desires. But insofar as it doesn't possess the articulation, the discursive – which is not just meaning, with all that this entails about attraction and repulsion, but an alignment of signifiers – metaphor is unthinkable within the animal psychology of attraction, appetite, and desire.

This phase of symbolism that is expressed in metaphor presupposes similarity, which is exhibited uniquely by position. It's by virtue of being the subject of miserly and spiteful that the sheaf can be identified with Booz in his lack of avarice and in his generosity. It's by virtue of the similarity of position that the sheaf is literally identical to the subject Booz. This dimension of similarity is, surely, the most striking thing about the significant use of language, which so dominates the apprehension of the workings of symbolism as to mask from us the existence of the other dimension, the syntactic. However, this sentence would lose all sense if we disturbed the word order.

This is what gets neglected when symbolism is discussed – the dimension linked to the signifier's existence, its organization.

What, on this basis, cannot fail to occur to one, and which occurred to a linguist friend of mine, Roman Jakobson, is that the distribution of certain 249 disorders known as aphasias can be reconsidered in the light of the opposition between on the one hand the relations of similarity, or substitution, or choice, and also of selection or concurrence, in short, all that is of the order of synonymy, and on the other hand the relations of contiguity, alignment, signifying articulation, syntactic coordination.[7] From this perspective the classical opposition between sensory and motor aphasia, which has been criticized for a long time, becomes strikingly coordinated.

You are all familiar with Wernicke's aphasia. The aphasic links together a sequence of sentences of an extraordinarily developed grammatical nature. He will say – Yes, I understand. Yesterday, when I was up there, already he said, and I wanted, I said to him, that's not it, the date, not exactly, not that one . . .

The subject thereby demonstrates complete mastery of everything articulated, organized, subordinated, and structured in the sentence, but what he says is always wide of what he wants to say. Not for an instant can you be in any doubt that what he wants to say is present, but he never manages to give verbal incarnation to what he is aiming at in the sentence. He constructs around it an entire fringe of syntactic verbalization, the complexity and level of organization of which are far from indicating a loss of attention to language. But if you ask him for a definition, an equivalent term, even without wanting to go so far as a metaphor, if you confront him with the use of language that logic calls metalanguage, or language about language, he can't follow you.

There's no question of making the slightest comparison between a disorder of this type and what happens to our psychotics. But when Schreber hears Factum est, which then stops, a phenomenon certainly manifests itself here at the level of the relations of contiguity. The relations of contiguity dominate, following the absence or failure of the function of meaningful equivalence by means of similarity.

We, too, have to take account of this striking analogy by introducing an opposition under the two rubrics of similarity and contiguity into what happens in hallucinatory delusional subjects. One could not make the dominance of contiguity in hallucinatory phenomena more evident than by pointing out the effect of interrupted speech – and of interrupted speech precisely as it's given, that is, as invested and, let's say, libidinized. What imposes itself on the subject is the grammatical part of the sentence, the one that exists only by virtue of its signifying character and by being articulated. This is what becomes a phenomenon imposed within the external world.

The aphasic I was speaking of is incapable of coming to the point. Hence 250 an apparently empty discourse, which, curiously, even in the most experienced subjects, in neurologists, always sets off nervous laughter. Here you have this character who employs enormous, extraordinarily articulate bla-bla-bla, but who can never get to the heart of what he has to communicate. The imbalance in the phenomenon of contiguity that comes to the fore in the hallucinatory phenomenon, and around which the whole delusion is organized, is not unlike this.

Typically, it's always the signified that we draw attention to in our analyses, because it's undoubtedly what is the most seductive, and it's what at first sight appears to be the true dimension of symbolic investigation by psychoanalysis. But in misrecognizing the primordial mediating role of the signifier, in misrecognizing that it's the signifier that in reality is the guiding thread, not only do we throw the original understanding of neurotic phenomena, the interpretation of dreams itself, out of balance, but we make ourselves absolutely incapable of understanding what is happening in the psychoses.

While a later part of analytic investigation, one concerning identification and symbolism, is on the side of metaphor, let's not neglect the other side, that of articulation and contiguity, with what is here sketched out that is initial and structuring in the notion of causality. The rhetorical form that is the opposite of metaphor has a name – it's called metonymy. It involves substitution for something that has to be named – we are in fact at the level of the name. One thing is named by another that is its container, or its part, or that is connected to it.

If, using the technique of verbal association as it's practiced at the level of the laboratory, you give a subject a word like hut, he has more than one way to respond. Certain responses will be in the register of contiguity. Hut – Burn it. Also, the subject may say hovel or cabin to you – there we already have the synonymous equivalent, a little bit further on we move into metaphor, in saying – burrow, for example. But there is also another register. If for example the subject says thatch, no longer is it quite the same thing. It's a part of the hut that enables it to be designated as a whole – it's possible at a pinch to talk of a village composed of three thatches, to mean three little houses. Here it's a question of evoking. The subject may also say dirtiness or poverty. We no longer have metaphor, we have metonymy.

The opposition between metaphor and metonymy is fundamental, since what Freud originally drew attention to in the mechanisms of neurosis, as 251 well as in the mechanisms of the marginal phenomena of normal life or of dreams, is neither the metaphorical dimension nor identification. It's the contrary. In general what Freud calls condensation is what in rhetoric one calls metaphor, what he calls displacement is metonymy. The structuration, the lexical existence of the entire signifying apparatus, is determinant for the phenomena present in neurosis, since the signifier is the instrument by which the missing signified expresses itself. It's for this reason that in focusing attention back onto the signifier we are doing nothing other than returning to the starting point of the Freudian discovery.

Next week we shall return to this question by studying why in psychosis these workings of the signifier end up totally preoccupying the subject. The issue in this case is not the mechanism of aphasia — it's a certain relationship to the other as lacking, deficient. It's by proceeding from the subject's relation to the signifier and to the other, with the different levels of otherness, imaginary other and symbolic Other, that we can articulate this psychical intrusion, this invasion by the signifier, called psychosis.

Metaphor and metonymy (II): Signifying articulation and transference of the signified

SENSORY APHASIA AND MOTOR APHASIA

THE POSITIONAL LINK

ALL LANGUAGE IS METALANGUAGE

DETAIL AND DESIRE

In introducing the opposition between similarity and contiguity here, I'm not saying that I consider that psychosis is in any way comparable to aphasia.

I would say more than this. What I retain from the two levels of disorder that have been distinguished in aphasia is that there is the same opposition between them as the one that appears, no longer in a negative but in a positive way, in metaphor and metonymy.

I was told that this opposition had thrown some of you into great perplexity, and that you have been telling yourselves – Metaphor has indeed shown us the importance of opposition, disagreement, and confusion.

The opposition between signifier and signified isn't a simple substitute for the famous and no less inextricable opposition between idea, or thought, and word. Someone, an outstanding grammarian, has written a remarkable work in which there is only one fault, its unfortunate subtitle, Words for thought.[1] This way of putting it is, I hope, no longer sustainable for any of you.

We clearly show the constant life of metaphor in these transferences of signified, an example of which I gave you last time with His sheaf was neither miserly nor spiteful.

Here you have an example of metaphor. One may say, in a sense, that meaning dominates everything, that it's all of a sudden the meaning that imprints on the subject, his sheaf, this value that shows it generously dispers-254 ing itself, as if of its own accord. However, the signifier and the signified are always in a relationship that may be described as dialectical.

This isn't a rehash of the relation upon which the notion of expression rests, where the thing, that which one refers to, is expressed by a word regarded as a label. My discourse is intended precisely to destroy this idea.

You must have heard aphasics spoken about, and you are aware of their extraordinarily lively and rapid, apparently fluid speech, at least up to a point. They express themselves admirably on a theme without being able to utter the word, while using an entire, extremely subtle syntactic articulation to get at something whose name or precise indicator they have on the tip of their tongue, but they are only capable of going round it in circles.

What is enthralling here is the persistence of the subject's intentionality despite this localized verbal impotence.

People have claimed to have brought out a kind of intellectual deficit of a predemential order as its correlative. This is a step forward which nuances the initial massive notion according to which it's a question of an incapacity to passively grasp verbal images, a step that indicates that the disorder is much more complex than appears at first sight. But whatever deficits the subject may display if we set him a specific task, according to the modes that characterize the position of the tests, nothing will be solved as long as we are ignorant of their mechanism and their origin.

One can see the subject protest against a reading of an observation that conveys a given precise historical detail, concerning a date, an hour, a form of behavior. This is when the subject trots out his discourse, however disturbed and jargonaphasic its character. Should he make a mistake, it's still in relation to a definite historical detail he possessed just five minutes earlier that he begins to enter the dialogue. Here one can grasp the presence and intensity of the intentionality at the heart of the deployment of discourse, which never manages to catch up with it again.

From the phenomenological viewpoint the sensory aphasic's language is a language of paraphrases. His jargonaphasia – the word is a bit too strong – is characterized by an abundance and ease of articulation and expression of sentences, however segmented they may ultimately become.

Paraphrase is the direct opposite of metaphrase, if by this is meant everything of the order of literal translation. This means that if you ask him to translate, to give a synonym, to repeat the same sentence, the same one he has just uttered, he can't do it. He is able to hook onto your discourse or 255 onto his own, but he has the greatest difficulty in commenting on a discourse. You will get from him replies that are so lively, so pathetic in his desire to make himself heard, as to border on the comical. You have to be interested in the phenomenon itself if you are not to laugh.

Therefore, there is a similarity disorder here, which is that the subject is incapable of metaphrase, and what he has to say lies entirely within the domain of paraphrase.

Alongside sensory aphasia there is what is broadly called motor aphasia. It ranges from disorders of agrammatism, well-known by now, to an extreme reduction of his stock of words – its immortal image is the famous pencil that he is unable to get out. This other dimension of aphasic deficit can be very well ranged within the order of contiguity disorders.

Here it's essentially the articulation, the syntax of language, which, progressively along the scale of cases and in the evolution of certain subjects, deteriorates to the point of making them incapable of articulating in a compound sentence what they are nevertheless able to name correctly. They retain the nominative capacity, but lose the propositional capacity. They are unable to construct propositions.

Owing to the properties of the signifier and the signified, the constant temptation to which linguists themselves, and a fortiori those who aren't linguists, succumb is to consider that it's what is the most obvious in the phenomenon that says it all.

Up to a point linguists have fallen victim to this illusion. The emphasis they place, for example, on metaphor, which has always been studied much more than metonymy, is proof of this. In full and living language it's what is the most gripping, but also the most problematical – how does it happen that language is at its most effective when it manages to say something by saying something else? It's enthralling indeed, and it's even thought that this is the way to the crux of the phenomenon of language, in opposition to a naive notion.

The naive notion has it that there is a superimposition, like a tracing, of the order of things onto the order of words. It's thought that a great step forward has been made by saying that the signified only ever reaches its goal via another signified, through referring to another meaning. This is only the first step, and one fails to see that a second is needed. It has to be realized that without structuring by the signifier no transference of sense would be possible.

A number of you rightly saw last time that this is what I meant in emphasizing the role of the signifier in metaphor.

The deficit, if we approach things from this angle, has two sides.

The first is the dissolution of the link between intentional meaning and the apparatus of signifiers. The latter is on the whole retained by the subject, who nevertheless fails to master it in relation to his intention. The second is the dissolution of the link internal to the signifier. Here the fact is emphasized that there is a sort of regressive decomposition, which is sufficiently well explained by the Jacksonian theory according to which functions decompose in the inverse order of their acquisition, not in development – language isn't reducible to the ideally primary language of the infant – but through a veritable turning.[2]

For my part, is that what I wanted to emphasize?

I say – No, it's not. According to a type of general law of illusion concerning what goes on in language, it isn't what appears in the foreground that is important. What's important is the opposition between two sorts of links that are themselves internal to the signifier.

First, the positional link, which is the foundation of the link that I earlier called propositional. This is what in a given language sets up that essential dimension which is the order of words. To understand this it suffices to recall that in French Pierre bat Paul isn't equivalent to Paul bat Pierre.

Concerning the second form of aphasic disorders, notice the strict coherence there is between maintaining the positional function of language and maintaining an adequate stock of terms. This is an absolutely incontestable clinical phenomenon and shows us the fundamental binding of the signifier.

What appears at the grammatical level as characteristic of the positional link reappears at all levels and sets up the synchronic coexistence of terms.

The verbal locution is its highest form. At a lower level there is the word, which has the air of a stability that, as you know, has been rightly challenged. While the independence of the word manifests itself from certain angles, it can't be regarded as radical. The word can in no way be regarded as a unit of language, even though it constitutes a privileged elementary form. At an even lower level you find the phonematic oppositions or couplings which characterize the ultimate radical element that distinguishes one language from another.

In French for example boue and pou are opposed to one another, whatever your accent. Even if, because you live near a border, you tend to pronounce 257 boue like pou, you will pronounce the other pou differently, because French is a language in which this opposition is valid. In other languages there are oppositions totally unknown in French. This binding of opposites is essential to the functioning of language. It must be distinguished from the link of similarity, implicated in the functioning of language, which is tied to the indefinite possibility of the function of substitution, which is conceivable only on the basis of the positional relation.

The mainspring of the metaphor isn't the meaning, which is supposed to be transposed from Booz onto the sheaf. I readily admit that someone might object to me that Booz's sheaf is metonymic, not metaphorical, and that underlying this magnificent poetry, and never named directly, there is Booz's royal penis. But that isn't what gives this sheaf its metaphorical quality, it's that the metaphor is placed in the position of subject, in Booz's place. It's a phenomenon of signifiers that is involved.

Let's move to the limit of poetic metaphor, which you wouldn't hesitate to describe as surrealist, even though we didn't have to wait for the surrealists to make metaphors. You are unable to say whether it makes sense or not. I won't say that this is the best way of putting things, but, in any case, it's near enough.

Take an expression that we can agree is indeed a metaphor. You will see whether it's the sense that sustains it.

Love is a pebble laughing in the sun .

What does this mean? It's indisputably a metaphor. It's likely enough that if it was born, it's because it contains a sense. As for finding one . . . I could do a whole seminar on it. This seems to me to be an indisputable definition of love, and I shall say that it's the last I paused at, because to me it appears indispensable if one wants to avoid falling endlessly into irremediable confusions.

In short, a metaphor is above all sustained by a positional articulation. This can be demonstrated even in its most paradoxical forms.

None of you has, I believe, failed to hear of the exercise that a poet of our day has carried out under the rubric of Un mot pour un autre [one word for another]. It's a little comedy in one act by Jean Tardieu. It concerns a dialogue between two women. One is announced, the other goes up to her and says:

My dear, my dearest, how many pebbles is it since I have had the apprentice to sugar you?

258 Alas, my dear, answers the other, I myself have been extremely unvitreous, my three littlest oil-cakes, etc.

This is confirmation that, even if it's in a paradoxical form, not only is the sense maintained, but that it tends to manifest itself in a particularly fortunate and metaphorical manner. It may be said that the sense is in some way renewed. Whatever effort the poet may have made to push it in the direction of a demonstration, one is at every instant a hair's breadth from a poetic metaphor. It belongs to a register that is no different from what arises as natural poetry as soon as a powerful meaning is involved.

The important thing isn't that the similarity should be sustained by the signified – we make this mistake all the time – it's that the transference of the signified is possible only by virtue of the structure of language. All language implies a metalanguage, it's already a metalanguage of its own register. It's because potentially all language is to be translated that it implies metaphrase and metalanguage, language speaking of language. The transference of the signified, so essential to human life, is possible only by virtue of the structure of the signifier.

Do get it into your heads that language is a system of positional coherence, and secondly that this system reproduces itself within itself with an extraordinary, and frightful, fecundity.

It's not for nothing that the word prolixity is the same word as proliferation. Prolixity is the frightening word. All use of language incurs fright, which stops people and finds expression in the fear of intellectuality. He intellectualizes too much, people say. This serves as an alibi for the fear of language. In fact, you can observe that there is verbalism wherever one makes the error of granting too much weight to the signified, whereas it's by heading further in the direction of the independence of the signifier and the signified that all operations of logical construction adopt their full effect.

At least for the phenomena that interest us, one always falls into verbalism by further adhering to what I call the mythology of significance [mythologie significative]. Mathematics on the other hand uses a language of pure signifier, a metalanguage par excellence. It reduces language to its systematic function upon which another system is built, grasping the former in its articulation. The efficacity of this way of doing things isn't in doubt in its own register.

When one reads the rhetoricians, one realizes that they never get to an entirely satisfactory definition of metaphor, or of metonymy.

This results in, for example, the formula that metonymy is an impoverished metaphor. One might say that the thing is to be taken in exactly the opposite sense – metonymy exists from the beginning and makes metaphor possible. But metaphor belongs to a different level than metonymy.

Let's study the most primitive phenomena, and let's take an example that for us analysts is particularly alive. What is more primitive as the direct expression of a meaning – that is of a desire – than what Freud relates about his youngest little daughter, the one who has since occupied such an interesting place in analysis, Anna?

Anna Freud asleep – things are, you see, in their pure state – she talks in her sleep – Big strawberries, raspberries, cakes, porridge.[3]

There's something here that looks like the signified in its pure state. And it's the most schematic, the most fundamental form of metonymy. There's no doubt that she desires these strawberries, these raspberries. But it isn't self-evident that these objects should all be there together. The fact that they are there, juxtaposed, coordinated in this articulated naming is due to the positional function that places them in a situation of equivalence. This is the essential phenomenon.

[3] Interpretation of Dreams, SE 4:130.

If there is anything that shows indisputably that it's not purely and simply a question here of a phenomenon of expression that a psychology, say Jungian, could get us to see as an imaginary substitute for the object appealed to, it's precisely the fact that the sentence begins with what? With the name of the person, Anna Freud. She's an infant of nineteen months, and we are at the level of naming, of equivalence, of nominal coordination, of signifying articulation as such. It's only within this framework that the transference of meaning is possible.

This is the heart of Freud's thought. His work begins with the dream, its mechanisms of condensation and displacement, of figuration – these are all of the order of metonymic articulation, and it's on this foundation that metaphor is able to intervene.

It's even more apparent at the level of the erotization of language. If there is an order of acquisition, it's certainly not what makes it possible to say that 260 children begin with such and such an element of the verbal stock rather than by some other. There is the greatest diversity. One doesn't take hold of language by one end, like certain painters who start their paintings at the left-hand corner. For language to be born, it must always already be grasped as a whole. On the other hand, for it to be able to be grasped as a whole, it has to be grasped at the outset by means of the signifier.

People speak of the concrete nature of language in children. This is something that, contrary to appearances, refers to contiguity. Someone recently confided to me what had been said by his child, a boy, who at the age of two and a half had grabbed his mother as she was leaning over him to say goodnight and said to her – My big girl full of bottom and muscles.

This language is obviously not the same as that of His sheaf was neither miserly nor spiteful. The child doesn't do that yet. Nor does he say that love is a pebble laughing in the sun. We are told that children understand surrealist and abstract poetry, which would be a return to childhood. This is stupid – children detest surrealist poetry and find repugnant certain stages of Picasso's painting. Why? Because they're not yet up to metaphor, but only metonymy. And when they do appreciate certain things in Picasso's paintings it's because metonymy is involved.

We can also see metonymy in certain passages in Tolstoy, where whenever a woman approaches you see the shadow of a fly, a spot on the upper lip, etc., emerge in place of her – the metonymic process of a great stylist. In general metonymy animates this style of creation called the realist style, as opposed to the symbolic style and to poetic language. The promotion of detail that characterizes it is no more realist than anything else. Only quite specific paths can make a detail the guide of the desiring function – not just any detail can be promoted as equivalent to the whole.

The proof of this is the trouble we go to to emphasize certain of these details, through a series of significant transferences, in our experiments with mazes designed to bring out what we call the intelligence of animals. Call it intelligence if you wish – it's merely a question of definition. It's a matter of the extension of the field of the real in which we can include the animal with its current capacities of discrimination, provided that it's instinctually, libidinally, interested.

The supposed realism of describing the real by details is only conceivable in the register of an organized signifier, due to which, by virtue of the fact that the mother is my big girl full of bottom and muscles, the child will evolve 261 in a certain way. It's clearly as a function of his early metonymic abilities that at a certain moment the bottom can become an equivalent of the mother for him. Whatever the sense by which we can conceive the sensitization on the vital level, it alters absolutely nothing in the problem.

It's on the basis of the metonymic articulation that this phenomenon is able to take place. The coordination of signifiers has to be possible before transferences of the signified are able to take place. The formal articulation of the signifier predominates with respect to transference of the signified.

How do we now raise the question of the repercussions on the function of language of disturbances in the relationship to the other? Just as metaphor and metonymy are opposed to one another, so the fundamental functions of speech are opposed to one another – foundational speech and passwords.

Why are they both fundamentally necessary? What distinguishes them? This is something that arises in relation to a third term. If it's necessary for man to use speech to make discoveries or to get his bearings, it's as a function of his natural propensity to decompose in the presence of the other.

In what way does he compose and recompose himself? We shall come back to this on another occasion, but in the phenomena that Schreber presents you can already grasp the use we can make of these categories.

I spoke to you last time of the interrupted sentences, but there is also question and reply. This has to be understood as having the value of being opposed to the dimension of foundational speech, where one doesn't ask the other for his opinion. The function of question and reply, insofar as it is given value through initiation into language and is its complement and its root, lays bare the signifying foundation of foundational speech in relation to what is profoundly significant in such speech. The delusional phenomenon lays bare, at all levels moreover, the signifying function as such.

I shall give you another example. You know these famous equivalences that the delusional Schreber gives as having been formulated by the birds from the sky parading in the twilight. One finds assonances here – Santiago or Carthago, Chinesenthum or Jesum-Christum.[4] Is the absurdity of this all that is to be retained? What strikes Schreber is the fact that the birds from the sky are brainless. On this Freud is in no doubt – they are young girls.[5]

But what's important isn't the assonance, it's the term-by-term correspondence between closely neighboring elements of discrimination, which only 262 have importance for a polyglot like Schreber within the linguistic system of German.

Schreber, with all his perspicacity, once again shows that what is being sought is of the order of the signifier, that is, of phonematic coordination. The Latin word Jesum-Christum here is, as we know, an equivalent of Chinesenthum only insofar as in German the ending tum has a particular sound quality.

Promoting the signifier as such, the emergence of this always hidden substructure that is metonymy, is the condition of any possible investigation of the functional disorders of language in neurosis and psychosis.

An address: Freud in the century

The session is opened by Professor Jean Delay.

For the centenary of Freud's birth, who was born May 16, 1856, commemorative occasions have been organized in Paris.

It's appropriate to recall that it was in Paris, while following Charcot's teaching at la Salpêtrière when he was only twenty-nine years old, that Freud found his calling. And in the article in the edition of his complete works he himself stressed all he owed to the teaching at la Salpêtrière.

This filiation in no way detracts from his obvious, brilliant originality, since it's really to him that we owe the method and doctrine of psychoanalysis. One can, indeed one must, have reservations about certain theoretical and practical aspects of psychoanalysis. But it remains no less true that in highlighting the role of affective conflicts and instinctual disorders in the neuroses he has made a very important contribution to psychiatry. Moreover, by highlighting the role of the unconscious in all manifestations of mental life it can be said that his contribution goes beyond the framework of medical science and is applicable to all human sciences.

This is why I thought it necessary on the occasion of this centenary to ask Jacques Lacan, who is the director here, with Daniel Lagache and Mme Favez-Boutonier, of the Société française de psychanalyse, to address us on Freud and his influence in the century. I believe he is particularly well qualified for this since he has an admirable knowledge of the life and work of Freud.

Here I am, then, today entrusted by Professor Jean Delay with a commis- 264 sion that, through being different from the teaching that under his patronage takes place here on this same day each week, greatly honors me – namely, to speak about Freud to an audience, new to the subject, of students in their psychiatry course, with the intention of commemorating the centenary of his birth.

I have a twofold aim here, which will perhaps give my talk some sort of double vision, that of instructing through honoring, of honoring through instructing – and I should have to apologize for it were I not hoping to adapt the aim of this talk to making the man's arrival in the world coincide with his arrival at the supreme sense of his work.

This is why my title, Freud in the century, is intended to suggest more than a chronological reference.

I wish to begin by saying what, while appearing under Freud's name, extends beyond the time of his appearance and conceals its truth even in its very unveiling – that Freud's name signifies joy.

Freud himself was conscious of this, as is demonstrated by a good number of things – an analysis of a dream that I could adduce, dominated by a sum of composite words, more especially by a word of ambiguous resonance, both English and German at the same time, and in which he enumerates the charming little spots in the environs of Vienna.[1]

If I pause at this name, it's not that my procedure is panegyrical. I'm anticipating what I shall articulate in my discourse by recalling that his family, like all the families of Moravia, of Galicia, of the outlying provinces of Hungary, owing to an edict of 1785 by Joseph II, had to choose this name from a list of first names – it's a feminine first name, in fairly frequent use at the time. But this name is a much older Jewish name which throughout history one already finds translated differently.

This is well suited to remind us that this recurrence of a purely literal tradition persists through the cultural assimilation of hidden signifiers and takes us very close to the heart of the structure with which Freud answered his questions. To be sure, to grasp this properly we would immediately need to evoke the extent to which he acknowledged belonging to the Jewish tradition and its literal structure which, he says, goes so far as to imprint itself
265 upon the structure of language. Freud could make the striking observation in a message addressed to a confessional community on the occasion of his seventieth birthday that he acknowledges that this was where his most intimate identity lay.[2]

There is, to be sure, a contrast between this acknowledgment and his early rejection – offensive, almost insulting, for those close to him whom he had the most reason to spare – of the religious faith of his fathers. Perhaps this is the angle from which we might be best introduced to what would help us understand how questions were raised for Freud.

However, this isn't how I shall be going about it. For, in point of fact, it's not always the simplest approaches that seem the clearest. In a word, they aren't the ones we are the best prepared for. And it's certainly not for nothing that we often have to take a more complex route to make truths heard.

Nor is it in Freud's biography that we shall find the source of the subversion brought about by his discovery.

It does not seem that a touch of neurosis, which can certainly help us understand Freud, has ever guided anyone before him down the same path. Nothing is less perverse, it seems to me, than the life of Freud. If this were where one had to seek the price of his daring, neither his poverty as a student nor his years of struggle as the father of a large family seems sufficient to me to explain something that I would call an abnegation of love relations, which one really has to point out when it concerns the person who renewed the theory of Eros.

Recent revelations, the letters to his fiancée, the great attraction of a recent biography,[3] seem to me to be complemented by a certain something which I shall call a touching egocentrism that consisted of demanding from the other an unreserved compliance with the ideals of his beautiful soul and of being torn apart at the thought of the favors shown to another the unforgettable evening that he rēceived from her the first token of her love. All this comes down to what I should call the rawness of a virgin, which we may excuse him for, on discovering its equally indiscreet equal in the same published letters to a fiancée of our own Hugo.

This disclosure, quite opportune in the final analysis, prevents me from dwelling on the dignity of a union where what Freud himself confides indicates mutual respect and attention to parental tasks – in short, the high tradition of Jewish family values. For what one cannot fail to detect in his early letters is some kind of reduction to the smallest common denominator of a petit-bourgeois convention of a love the sentimental extravagance of which doesn't exclude reserve or Freud's long-held rancor towards his fiancée for 266 having caused him, through an ill-timed journey, to miss the glory of having been the inventor of the surgical use of cocaine. This is indication enough of a relationship of psychical forces for which the term of ambivalence, employed without rhyme or reason, would be entirely inappropriate.

In point of fact, we shall not follow the geography of these ravages over time.

One day I heard Freud spoken of in these terms – without ambition and without needs. The thing is comical if one thinks of the number of times throughout his work that Freud confessed his ambition which, while undoubtedly quickened by all sorts of obstacles, is much more extensive in his unconscious, as he was able to show. To make you appreciate this, must I depict for you – as Jung, speaking to me personally, did one day – the scene of Freud's reception at the University he placed on the world's stage? I mean, depict the stream, whose symbolic meaning he was the first to have shown, blossoming out into a growing stain on his pale trousers?

[3] Ernest Jones's biography, Sigmund Freud: Life and Work was partially completed at the time Lacan is speaking.

Shall I say it? This isn't the point from which I would like to throw light upon the figure of Freud, for really it seems that nothing can go beyond what he disclosed in his long autobiography that his first works constitute – Die Traumdeutung, The Psychopathology of Everyday Life and Der Witz.[4] Nobody, in a sense, has ever taken the confession so far, at least within the limits that a man's concern for his authority imposes on him. And this isn't to diminish its importance, far from it. The sigh at which these confidences stop perhaps gives us the feeling of a barrier, but nothing ever since has enabled us to cross it – even the most indiscreet hypothesis makers have never managed to add anything to what he himself disclosed to us.

There is something here worth dwelling on, which is well suited to make us feel the value of a critical method I shall surprise you with by saying that someone's work is to be judged by the standard of its own criteria.

If the discovery of psychoanalysis really is to have reintegrated into science an entire objectifiable field of man and to have shown its supremacy, and if this field is the field of sense, why seek the genesis of this discovery outside the meanings that its inventor encountered within himself along the path leading him to it? Why look elsewhere than in the register to which this discovery must, if one is to be rigorous, be limited? If we must have recourse to some other source foreign to the field discovered by our author, and by nobody else, to explain what it is, the prevalence of this field becomes null and void, through having been made subordinate.

To suppose the supremacy, and not the subordination, of sense as efficient 267 cause is apparently to repudiate the principles of modern science. In fact, for the positive science to which Freud's masters, this Pleiad that Jones quite rightly mentions at the beginning of his study, belonged, the entire dynamics of sense can, question-beggingly, be neglected — it is all fundamentally superstructure.[5] It's therefore a revolution in science that Freud introduces, if this science has the value he claims for it.

Does it have this value? Does it have this meaning?

I want to pause here to try to restore the point of view, currently effaced, from which Freud's work can be viewed in its proper light.

I shall ask you straightaway to be prepared for a contrast between what Freud's work authentically signifies and what is currently being offered as the sense of psychoanalysis. For many of you, the students, as you draw nearer to things in the mental sphere, psychoanalysis is, it's said, first of all a means to a better understanding of the mentally ill.

I can't recommend too highly that those of you who have the opportunity to become acquainted with the analytic literature – and God knows how enormous, almost diffuse, it has become – combine this reading with an at least equivalent measure of Freud himself. The difference will leap out at you.

The term frustration, for example, has become the leitmotiv of the prolific mothers of analytic literature in English, with the abandonism and relationship of dependence it comprises. Now, this term is quite simply absent from Freud's work. The simplistic use of notions taken out of context, like that of reality testing, or of bastardized notions like that of the object relation, the recourse to the ineffability of affective contact and of lived experience – all of this is strictly foreign to the inspiration behind Freud's work.

This style has for some time tended to descend to the level of a foolish optimism which stems from an equivocal moralism and is founded on an equally crude schematism, which really is the most superficial image ever given to man to apply to his own development – the famous sequence of so-called pregenital phases of the libido. The reaction has not failed to make itself felt, so much so that we have now got to the pure and simple restoration of an orthopedics of the ego, which only a hundred years ago everyone would have laughed at as being the most simplistic question begging.

This rather improbable slide is due, I believe, to the fact that there is a 268 profound misrecognition in thinking that analysis is meant to be used as a bridge for gaining access to a sort of intuitive penetration and easy communication with the patient. If analysis had only been an improvement in the doctor-patient relation, we would literally have no need of it.

Just recently, reading an old text by Aristotle, the Nicomachean Ethics, with the intention of rediscovering the origin of Freudian themes on pleasure in it – it makes salubrious reading – I came across a curious term that means something like fearful. And this explained many things to me, in particular why it's sometimes the best minds among young psychiatrists that rush headlong down this mistaken path by which they seem to be captivated. I think as a matter of fact that paradoxically they are the best, dreadfully intelligent young men. They're afraid to be so, they frighten themselves – Where would we be if we gave way to our fine intelligence? And so they enter analysis where they're taught that their intellectualization is a form of resistance. Once they have finished they're delighted, they've encountered at first hand this famous intellectualization, which for so long had been an obstacle for them. At this stage my discourse can no longer address them.

By contrast, what is at issue in Freud's work? What stands out in it? What, in a word, is its style? Freud's own style would alone suffice to characterize its significance. To see this, I ask you to refer to another form of resistance, which hasn't been much better appreciated than the one I alluded to just before.

For a long time it was thought that the main resistance encountered by Freud's work was due to the fact that he was touching on sexual matters. Good God, why would sexual matters have been any less welcome at that time than in our own, where they appear to be the delight of everyone?

Besides, we have had to wait until our own day for some well intentioned scholar to point out the kinship between Freud's work and the Naturphilosophie that prevailed in Germany at the beginning of the nineteenth century. This time was far from having been as fleeting and contingent as Jones represents it to us from an Anglo-Saxon perspective, nor were we in France, above all at the time Freud began to become known here, lacking certain irrationalist or intuitionist tendencies that were advocating recourse to an affective, or sentimental, effusion to understand man or, even, natural phenomena – I don't need to mention the name of Bergson. Why did honest and 269 cultivated people suddenly see in Freud's work some kind of excessive scientism? Why didn't the scholars themselves, who seemed repelled by the results and the originality of the method whose status they didn't immediately identify, ever think of referring Freud to the vitalist or irrationalist philosophy that was much more alive then?

As a matter of fact, nobody was taken in by it. Psychoanalysis does in fact manifest something of the positive spirit of science qua explanatory. Psychoanalysis is as far removed as is possible from any form of intuitionism. It has nothing to do with this hasty, short-circuited understanding that so simplifies and limits its significance. To put it back into its proper perspective, one only has to open Freud's work and see the place that a particular dimension, which has never been really emphasized, has there. The value of this for opposing the current evolution of analysis can now be recognized, named, and orientated towards a real reform of analytic studies.

I shall light my lantern and I'll tell you what this is in a way that attempts to be both rapid and striking.

Open The Interpretation of Dreams. You will find nothing there resembling this graphology of children's drawings that has ended up becoming the paradigm of analytic interpretation, none of these ascending and descending manifestations of the waking dream. If there is anything this resembles, it's deciphering. And the dimension in question is that of the signifier. Take any of Freud's dreams and you will see that a word, such as Autodidasker, predominates.[6] This is a neologism. From here we get Lasker, plus a number of other memories. The very form of the word is absolutely essential where interpretation is concerned. An initial interpretation, an orientation or a dichotomy, will direct us towards Lassalle. Here one discovers Alex, Freud's brother, through the intermediary of another, purely phonetic and verbal transformation. Freud finds in his recollection a novel by Zola in which a character by the name of Sandoz appears. In the way Freud reconstructs it, Zola constructed Sandoz out of Aloz, the ananym of his name, by replacing Al, the beginning of Alexander, by the third syllable sand. Thus, just as it was possible to make Sandoz from Zola, so Alex is included in the Lasker that Freud dreamed as the last part of the word Autodidasker.

I'm telling you what Freud did. I'm telling you how his method proceeds. And, as a matter of fact, one only has to open any page of the book, Die Traumdeutung, to find an equivalent. I could have taken any other dream, the one for example where he speaks of jokes that have been made on his name, or the one that features a swimming bladder.[7] You will always find a sequence of homonyms or metonyms, of onomastic constructions that are absolutely 270 essential to an understanding of the dream and without which it dissipates, vanishes.

M. Emil Ludwig wrote a book against Freud, almost defamatory in its unfairness, in which he evokes the impression of delusional alienation that one is supposed to get from reading him.[8] I should almost say that I prefer such a testimony to the wearing down of the angles, to the softening, reductive smoothing out being brought about by analytic literature claiming to follow Freud. The incomprehension, the refusal, the shock displayed by Emil Ludwig – whether he's being honest or acting in bad faith doesn't matter to us much – is greater testimony than the disintegration of Freud's work that is being achieved in the decadence analysis is sliding into.

How has it been possible to omit the fundamental role of the structure of the signifier? Of course, we understand why. What is expressed within the apparatus and the play of signifiers is something that comes from the bowels of the subject, which can be called his desire. As soon as this desire is caught up in the signifier it's a signified desire. And thus we are all fascinated by the meaning of this desire. And we forget, despite Freud's reminders, the apparatus of the signifier.

Freud emphasizes, however, that the elaboration of the dream is what makes the dream the leading model of symptom formation. Now, this elaboration bears a strong resemblance to a logical and grammatical analysis, just slightly more erudite than what we did at school. This register is the normal level of Freudian work. It's the very register that makes linguistics the most advanced of the human sciences, provided one is simply prepared to acknowledge that what is distinctive about positive science, modern science, isn't quantification but mathematization and specifically combinatory, that is to say linguistic, mathematization which includes series and iteration.

[6] The Interpretation of Dreams, SE 4:298–302.
[7] SE 4:298 & 206.
[8] Doctor Freud, an Analysis and a Warning.

This is what stands out in Freud's work. Without it nothing of what he subsequently develops is so much as thinkable.

I'm not alone in saying this. We have recently published the first volume of the journal in which we inaugurate our attempt to renew the Freudian inspiration, and you can read there that at the bottom of the Freudian mechanisms one rediscovers these old figures of rhetoric which over time have come to lose their sense for us but which for centuries elicited a prodigious degree of interest. Rhetoric, or the art of oration, was a science and not just an art. We now wonder, as if at an enigma, why these exercises could have captivated whole groups of men for such a long time. If this is an anomaly 271 it's analogous to the existence of psychoanalysts, and it's perhaps the same anomaly that's involved in man's relationships to language, returning over the course of history, recurrently, with different ramifications and now presenting itself to us from a scientific angle in Freud's discovery. Freud encountered it in his medical practice when he came upon this field in which the mechanisms of language can be seen to dominate and organize the construction of certain so-called neurotic disorders, unbeknown to the subject, outside his conscious ego.

Here's another example Freud gives at the beginning of The Psychopathology of Everyday Life, and which I've given a commentary on in my seminar.[9] Freud can't recall the name Signorelli and a series of other names present themselves to him, Boticelli, Boltraffio, Trafoi. How does Freud construct his theory of this memory lapse? During a journey in Bosnia-Herzegovina he is talking to someone when he has this kind of name loss. There's also the beginning of a sentence uttered by a peasant – Herr, what is there left to say now? It's about the death of a patient, in the face of which a doctor can do nothing. So here we have Herr, and death, which is hidden, since Freud, any more than the rest of us, doesn't have any particular reason to linger over the thought of it. What is the other place where Freud has already had occasion to reject the idea of death? It's a place that isn't far from Bosnia, where he received very bad news about one of his patients.

That's the mechanism. Its schema, analogous to that of a symptom, suffices to demonstrate the essential importance of the signifier. It's insofar as Signorelli and the series of names are equivalent words, translations of one another, metaphrases if you like, that the word is linked to repressed death, refused by Freud. He bars them all, even those within the word Signorelli, which has only the most distant of links with it – Signor, Herr.

What takes its place in response? The other does, he who both is Freud and isn't Freud, the other who is on the same side as the memory lapse, the other from whom Freud's ego has withdrawn and who answers in its place. He doesn't give the reply, since he is forbidden to speak, but he gives the beginning of the telegram, he answers, Trafoi and Boltraffio, which he makes the intermediary of the metonymy, the intermediary of the slide between Herzegovina and Bosnia. Freud has exactly the same conception of this mechanism as the one I'm expounding here. Verify it.

Similarly, everything lucid, unique that Freud has contributed on the subject of Witz is conceivable only on the basis of the signifying material involved.

That is what, beyond all the determinisms and all the formations, beyond all the presentiments, Freud encountered after turning forty. Of course, he had a father and a mother like everyone else. His father died and everyone knows that that never passes unnoticed, but all the same these facts must not cause us to underestimate the importance of the discovery of the positive order of the signifier for which something in him had undoubtedly prepared him, the long literary, literalist, tradition from which he came.

The discovery he made in dealing with dreams is to be radically distinguished from any intuitive interpretation of dreams, such as it had been possible to practice before him. Moreover, he had a heightened awareness of how crucial to his thought this adventure that Die Traumdeutung was, and in writing to Fliess he mentions it with a kind of fervor, he calls it something like my garden plant, by which he meant a new species that had emerged from his stomach.

Freud's originality, which disconcerts our sentiment but alone enables the effect of his work to be understood, is his recourse to the letter. This is the spice in Freud's discovery and in analytic practice. If some of this hadn't fundamentally remained, there would have been nothing left of psychoanalysis a long time ago. Everything stems from here. Who is this other who speaks in the subject, of whom the subject is neither the master nor the counterpart, who is the other who speaks in him? Everything is here.

It's not enough to say that it's his desire, for his desire is libido, which, let's not forget, above all means whim [lubie], unbounded desire, due to the fact that he speaks. If there were no signifiers to support this rupture, these fragmentations, displacements, transmutations, perversions, this insulation of human desire, the latter would have none of these characteristics that make up the substance of the signifying material provided by analysis.

Nor is it enough to say that this other is in some way our counterpart, on the pretext that he speaks the same language as what we may call common discourse, which is thought to be rational and which, as it happens, sometimes is. For in this discourse of the other what I take to be me is no longer a subject but an object. It's a function of mirage, in which the subject refinds himself only as misrecognition and negation.

It's on this basis that the theory of the ego is best understood.

Freud produced it in a number of stages, and one would be wrong to think that it must date from Das Es.[10] Perhaps you've already heard mention of the 273 famous Freudian topography. I fear that you've heard only too much mention of it, since the way it's interpreted goes in a sense contrary to Freud's reason for introducing it. It was in 1914, with his major article "On Narcissism," which is prior to this topography that has now come to the foreground, that Freud constructed a theory of the ego.

The main, unique reference of contemporary analytic theory and practice, namely the famous so-called pregenital stages of the libido which are thought to date from the beginning of Freud's work, date from 1915. "On Narcissism" dates from 1914.

There can be no mistaking Freud's intentions in emphasizing the theory of the ego. It was a question of avoiding two traps. The first is dualism. There is a kind of mania in some analysts which consists in turning the unconscious into another ego, a bad ego, a double, a symmetrical counterpart to the ego – whereas the theory of the ego in Freud is on the contrary designed to show that what we call our ego is a certain image we have of ourselves, which gives us a mirage, of totality no doubt. These leading mirages don't at all orientate the subject in the direction of so-called profound – an adjective I personally don't care for – self-knowledge. The ego's function is explicitly designated in Freud as analogous in every way to what in the theory of writing is called a determinative.

Not all forms of writing are alphabetic. Some are ideophonetic and contain determinatives. In Chinese a thing like this means something more or less just, but if you add this, which is a determinative, it becomes to govern. And if instead of putting in this determinative you put in a different one it means illness. The determinative emphasizes in a particular way, inserts into a class of meanings, something that already has its phonetic individuality as a signifier. Well then, for Freud the ego is precisely a sort of determinative whereby certain of the subject's elements are associated with a special function that appears on the horizon of his theory at that moment, namely aggressiveness, considered as characteristic of the imaginary relationship with the other in which the ego constitutes itself through successive and superimposed identifications. Its variable value, its value as a sign, essentially distinguishes it from the entity of the organism as a whole. And, indeed, this is the other trap that Freud was avoiding.

As a matter of fact, even as Freud rallies the personality that speaks in the unconscious around a center, he wanted to avoid the mirage of the famous total personality that hasn't failed to regain the upper hand throughout the entire American school which continues to relish the term, promoting the restoration of the primacy of the ego. This is a complete misrecognition of 274
Freud's teaching. The total personality is precisely what Freud intends to characterize as fundamentally foreign to the function of the ego as it has been regarded by psychologists until now.

There is a twofold alienation in the movement of Freudian theory.

There is the other as imaginary. It's here in the imaginary relation with the other that traditional Selbst-Bewusstsein or self-consciousness is instituted. There is no way that the unity of the subject can be brought about in this direction. The ego isn't even the place, the indication, the rallying point, the organizing center of the subject. It's profoundly dissymmetrical to it. Although it is in this sense that he is going to begin by getting one to understand the Freudian dialectic – I can in no way expect to attain my accomplishment and my unity from the recognition of an other who is caught up with me in a relation of mirage.

There is also the other who speaks from my place, apparently, this other who is within me. This is an other of a totally different nature from the other, my counterpart.

That's what Freud contributes.

If this still required confirmation, we would only have to observe the way in which the technique of the transference is prepared. Everything is designed to avoid the relation of ego to ego, the imaginary relation that could be established with the analyst. The subject isn't face to face with the analyst. Everything is designed to efface the entire dual, counterpart-to-counterpart relation.

On the other hand, analytic technique derives from the necessity for an ear, an other, a listener. The analysis of a subject can only be brought about with an analyst. This is a reminder to us that the unconscious is essentially speech, speech of the other, and can only be recognized when the other sends it back to you.

Before I finish I would still like to speak about what Freud added towards the end of his life, when he had already left his troop of followers behind him a long time before. I'm unable to doubt for one instant, merely from the evidence of the style and tone of Freud's dialogue with all around him, that he had a profound notion of their radical inadequacy, of their total incomprehension. There is a period in Freud's work, between 1920 and 1924, when he quite simply broke off. He knew that he didn't have very long to live – he died at 83 years of age, in 1939 – and he went straight to the heart of the problem, namely the compulsion to repeat [automatisme de répétition].

This notion of repetition is so perplexing for us that one tries to reduce it 275 to a repetition of needs. If on the contrary we read Freud we see that the compulsion to repeat was based, as it always had been from the beginning of his entire theory of memory, on the question raised for him by the insistence of speech which returns in the subject until it has said its final word, speech that must return, despite the resistance of the ego which is a defense, that is, the adherence to the imaginary misconstrual of identification with the other. Repetition is fundamentally the insistence of speech.

As a matter of fact, the final word of Freudian anthropology concerns what possesses man and makes him, not the support of the irrational – Freudism isn't a form of irrationalism, on the contrary – but the support of a form of reason of which he is more victim than master and by which he is condemned in advance.

This is the final word, the red thread that passes through all of Freud's work. From beginning to end, from the discovery of the Oedipus complex to Moses and Monotheism, via the extraordinary paradox from the scientific point of view of Totem and Taboo, Freud only ever asked himself, personally, one question – how can this system of signifiers without which no incarnation of either truth or justice is possible, how can this literal logos take hold of an animal who doesn't need it and doesn't care about it – since it doesn't at all concern his needs? This is nevertheless the very thing that causes neurotic suffering.

Man is in fact possessed by the discourse of the law and he punishes himself[11] with it in the name of this symbolic debt which in his neurosis he keeps paying for more and more.

How can this have taken hold, how does man enter into this law which is foreign to him and which as an animal he has nothing to do with? It was to explain this that Freud constructed the myth of the murder of the father. I'm not claiming that this is an explanation, but I'm showing you why Freud fomented this myth. Man must become involved in it as guilty. This remains in Freud's work to the end and confirms what I'm presenting to you here and teach elsewhere.

Henceforth, what is the Freudian discovery's center of gravity. What is its philosophy? Not that Freud was doing philosophy. He always repudiated the claim that he was a philosopher. But to ask oneself a question is already to be a philosopher, even if one is unaware that this is what one is doing. What, then, does Freud the philosopher teach? To keep the positive truths that Freud has contributed in proportion, to leave them in their place, let's not forget that his inspiration is fundamentally pessimistic. He denies any tendency towards progress. He is fundamentally anti-humanist to the extent that there is in humanism this romanticism which would like to make the mind the flower of life. Freud is to be situated in a realist and tragic tradition, 276 which explains why it is that it's in the light of Freud that we are today able to understand and read Greek tragedy.

But for us, workers, scholars, doctors, technicians, what direction does this return to the truth of Freud indicate?

It is the direction of a positive study whose methods and forms are given to us in this sphere of the so-called human sciences, which concerns the order of language, linguistics. Psychoanalysis should be the science of language inhabited by the subject. From the Freudian point of view man is the subject captured and tortured by language.

Psychoanalysis introduces us to a psychology, to be sure, but which one? Psychology properly so-called is effectively a science of perfectly well-defined objects. But, undoubtedly, by virtue of the significant resonances of the word, we slide into confusing it with something that refers to the soul. One thinks that everyone has his own psychology. One would be better off, in this second usage, to give it the name it could be given. Let's make no mistake – psychoanalysis isn't an egology. From the Freudian perspective of man's relationship to language, this ego isn't at all unitary, synthetic. It's decomposed, rendered complex in various agencies – the ego, the superego, the id. It would certainly be inappropriate to make each of these terms a little subject in its own right, which is a crude myth that makes no advance, illuminates nothing.

Freud could not have been in any doubt about the dangers confronting his work. When, in 1938, he took up his pen for his final preface to Moses and Monotheism he added a very curious note – I do not share, he says, the opinion of my contemporary Bernard Shaw, who claims that man would be capable of achieving something only if he could live to be three hundred years old. I do not believe this prolongation of life would have any advantages unless, as the translation goes, the conditions of the future were totally transformed. There you have the sad nature of these translations. In German, this has quite a different sense – many other things would have to be profoundly altered, at the base, at the root, in the determinations of life.[12]

This note by Freud written when he was old, continuing to pursue his meditation before leaving his message to decompose, to me appears to echo the terms in which the chorus accompanies the final steps of Oedipus towards the little wood of Colonus. Accompanied by the wisdom of the people, he meditates upon the desires that bring man to pursue shadows, he indicates that it's his having strayed that makes him unable even to know where the 277 woods are. I'm astonished that nobody – except for someone who rendered this into Latin reasonably well – has ever managed to translate properly the mé phunaï that the chorus then utters.[13] It's reduced to the value of a verse that says it's better not to have been born, whereas the sense is absolutely clear – the only way to overcome all this business of logos, the only way to be rid of it all, would be not to have been born like this. This is the very sense accompanying the gesture of the old Freud, when he rejected with his hand any wish that his life be prolonged.

It's true that somewhere in his work on the Witz, in other words on the quip, he indicates a reply – Much better not to have been born – unfortunately, this happens barely once in two hundred thousand.[14]

I give you this reply.

The appeal, the allusion

THE ONSET OF PSYCHOSIS

SPEAKING OUT

THE MADNESS OF LOVE

THE EVOLUTION OF DELUSION

If we reflect that the means of representation in dreams are principally visual images and not words, we shall see that it is even more appropriate to compare dreams with a system of writing than with a language. In fact the interpretation of dreams is completely analogous to the decipherment of an ancient pictographic script such as Egyptian hieroglyphs. In both cases there are certain elements which are not intended to be interpreted (or read, as the case may be) but are only designed to serve as "determinatives," that is to establish the meaning of some other element. The ambiguity of various elements of dreams finds a parallel in these ancient systems of writing; and so too does the omission of various relations which have in both cases to be supplied from the context. If this conception of the method of representation in dreams has not yet been followed up, this, as will be readily understood, must be ascribed to the fact that psychoanalysts are entirely ignorant of the attitude and knowledge with which a philologist would approach such a problem as that presented by dreams.[1]

This passage is clear enough. The apparent flagrant contradiction that you can draw from it on the basis of Freud's remark that dreams are expressed in images rather than otherwise is restored and resituated as soon as he shows the sort of images in question – namely, images that occur in writing, that is not even for their literal sense since there is a number of them that will not be there to be read, but simply to contribute an exponent without which this would remain enigmatic.

The other day I wrote some Chinese characters on the board. I could just as easily have written some ancient hieroglyphs – the first person pronoun, for example, which is drawn as two little signs that have a phonetic value and may be accompanied by a more or less fleshed-out image which is there to give the other signs their sense. But the other signs are no less autographic than the little fellow[2] and have to be read in a phonetic register.

The comparison with hieroglyphs is rendered all the more valid and certain by the fact that it's dispersed throughout Die Traumdeutung and that Freud returns to it constantly.

282 Freud wasn't unaware of what hieroglyphic writing really is. He was in love with everything touching on the culture of ancient Egypt. Very often he would make reference to the style, to the signifying structure, of hieroglyphs and to the sometimes contradictory, superimposed, way of thinking of the beliefs of the ancient Egyptians. And he readily refers to this to give, for example, an image expressive of a certain way in which contradictory concepts coexist in neurotics.

At the end of this passage he evokes the language of symptoms and speaks of the specificity of the signifying structuration in the different forms of neuroses and psychoses. Then suddenly, in a striking summary, he compares the three great neuropsychoses. For instance, he says, what a hysteric expresses by vomiting an obsessional will express by painstaking protective measures against infection, while a paraphrenic will be led to complaints or suspicions that he is being poisoned. These are all of them different representations of the patient's wish to become pregnant which have been repressed into the unconscious, or of his defensive reaction against that wish.[3]

That was to set us going.

Let's return to our subject.

We're not far away from it with the theme of procreation, which lies at the heart of the symptomatology in the Schreber case. But even today we shall not get there immediately.

I would like, from yet another angle, and concerning what you heard on Monday evening from our friend Serge Leclaire, to raise once again the issue of what I call the ultimate signifier in neurosis.

Even though it's essentially a signifier, it of course isn't a signifier without meaning. I stress this fact that it doesn't depend on meaning but is the source of meaning.

The two sides, male and female, of sexuality are not given data, are nothing that could be deduced from experience. How could the individual situate himself within sexuality if he didn't already possess the system of signifiers, insofar as it institutes the space that enables him to see, at a distance, as an

[2] Presumably a reference to one of the characters drawn.
[3] "Claims of Psycho-Analysis to Scientific Interest," SE 13:178.

enigmatic object, the thing that is the most difficult of access, namely his own death? This is no more difficult of access, if you think about it, if you think precisely of the long dialectical process necessary for an individual to accomplish it and of the extent to which our experience consists of too much and too little in one's access to the male and female poles – a reality that may 283 make us wonder whether it's so much as graspable outside the signifiers that isolate it.

The notion we have of reality as that around which the setbacks and obstacles of neurosis revolve must not deflect us from remarking that the reality with which we are concerned is upheld, woven through, constituted, by a tress of signifiers. We have to bring out the point of view, the plane, the particular dimension, of the human being's relationship to the signifier if we are to know even what we are saying when for example we say that in psychosis something becomes lacking in the subject's relation to reality. As a matter of fact it's a question of a reality structured by the presence of a particular signifier that is inherited, traditional, transmitted – but how? Of course, by virtue of the fact that all around the subject people speak.

If we now admit as a fact of common experience that not to have undergone the trial of Oedipus, not to have seen its conflicts and its dead ends open before one, and not to have resolved it, leaves the subject with a certain defect, in a certain state of inability to bring about the correct distance that is called human reality, this is because we hold that reality implies the subject's integration into a particular play of signifiers. Here I'm only formulating what everyone admits, in a kind of implicit way, in analytic experience.

We have indicated in passing that what characterizes the hysterical position is a question that refers precisely to the two signifying poles of male and female. The hysteric addresses it with all his being – how can one be either male or female? – which implies that the hysteric nevertheless has reference to it. The question is this – what is it that the entire structure of the hysteric, with his fundamental identification with the individual of the sex opposite to his own by which his own sex is questioned, is introduced into, suspended from, and preserved in? The hysterical manner of questioning, either . . . or . . ., contrasts with the obsessional's response, negation, neither . . . nor . . ., neither male nor female. This negation comes about against a background of mortal experience and of hiding his being from the question, which is a way of remaining suspended from it. The obsessional is precisely neither one nor the other – one may also say that he is both at once.

I shall move on, since that was only intended to situate what happens in the psychotic, who contrasts with the position of each of the subjects of the two great neuroses.

In my talk on Freud a fortnight ago I spoke of language insofar as it's inhabited by the subject who to a greater or lesser extent speaks out in lan- 284 guage with all his being, that is, in part unknowingly. How can one fail to see in the phenomenology of psychosis that everything from beginning to end stems from a particular relationship between the subject and this language that has suddenly been thrust into the foreground, that speaks all by itself, out loud, in its noise and furor, as well as in its neutrality? If the neurotic inhabits language, the psychotic is inhabited, possessed, by language.

What comes to the foreground reveals that the subject is subjected to a trial, to the problem of some fault concerning the permanent discourse that supports the everyday, the miscellany, of human experience. Something detaches itself from the permanent monologue and appears as some kind of music for several voices. It's worthwhile dwelling on its structure so as to ask ourselves why it's made in this way.

This is, at the level of the phenomena, something that immediately gives us the impression of being structured. Don't forget that the very notion of structure is borrowed from language. To misrecognize this, to reduce it to a mechanism, is as conclusive as it is ironic. What is it that Clérambault has isolated under the name of the elementary phenomena of psychosis – the repeated, contradicted, commanded thoughts – if it's not this discourse that is augmented, recapitulated in antitheses? But on the pretext that there is an entirely formal structuration here – and Clérambault is absolutely right to insist upon this – the conclusion he draws is that we are dealing with simple mechanical phenomena. This is totally inadequate. It's much more promising to think of it in terms of the internal structure of language.

The merit of Clérambault is to have shown its ideationally neutral nature, which in his language means that it's in total discord with the subject's mental state, that no mechanism of the affects adequately explains it, and which in ours means that it's structural. The weakness of the etiological or pathogenic deduction is of little concern to us in comparison with what he stresses, namely that the nucleus of psychosis has to be linked to a relationship between the subject and the signifier in its most formal dimension, in its dimension as a pure signifier, and that everything constructed around this consists only of affective reactions to the primary phenomenon, the relationship to the signifier.

The subject's relation of exteriority to the signifier is so striking that all clinicians have emphasized it in one way or another. The syndrome of influence still leaves some things vague, but the syndrome of action from without, as naive as it appears, does underline the essential dimension of the phenomenon, the psychotic's exteriority in relation to the entire apparatus of language. Hence the question arises whether the psychotic has really entered language.

285 Many clinicians have shown an interest in the psychotic's prior history.

Helene Deutsch has emphasized a certain as if that appears to mark the first stages of development in those who at some moment sink into psychosis. They never enter the game of signifiers, except through a kind of external imitation.[4] The non-integration of the subject into the register of the signifier indicates the direction from which the question of the preconditions of psychosis arises – which is undoubtedly soluble only through analytic investigation.

It sometimes happens that we take prepsychotics into analysis, and we know what that produces – it produces psychotics. The question of the contraindications of analysis would not arise if we didn't all recall some particular case in our practice, or in the practice of our colleagues, where a full-blown psychosis – a hallucinatory psychosis, I'm not speaking of a precipitated schizophrenia – is triggered during the first analytic sessions in which things heat up a bit, at which point the poor analyst rapidly becomes the transmitter who makes known to the analysand [analysé] what he must do and must not do.

Aren't we here touching on what in our very own experience, without our having to look any further, lies at the heart of the reasons for the onset of psychosis? It's one of the most difficult things that can be proposed to a man, with which his being in the world doesn't confront him all that often – it's what is called speaking out [prendre la parole], I mean speaking out one's own speech, which is quite the opposite of saying yes, yes to the speech of one's neighbor. This isn't necessarily put into words. The clinic shows that, provided one knows how to discern it at very different levels, it is at precisely this moment that psychosis breaks out.

It's sometimes a question of a tiny spot of speaking out, whereas previously the subject had been living in his cocoon like a moth-worm. This is the form that Clérambault characterized very well under the name of the mental automatism of old maids. I'm thinking of the marvelous richness characteristic of his style – how could Clérambault have failed to dwell on the facts? There was really no reason to pick out these unfortunate beings, forgotten by everybody, whose existence he describes so well and in whom, at the slightest provocation, mental automatism emerges from this discourse that had always remained latent and unexpressed in them.

If we allow that the failing [défaillance] of the subject on encountering real speech locates his entry, his sliding, into the critical phenomenon, the inaugural phase, of psychosis, then we can begin to see how this comes to link up with what we have already expounded.

The notion of Verwerfung indicates that there must already have been something in the relation to the signifier previously lacking here in the initial introduction to fundamental signifiers.

This is, quite clearly, an absence undiscoverable by experimental research. There is no way of grasping something that lacks at the time it lacks. In the case of President Schreber this would have been the absence of the primordial male signifier to which for years he was able to appear to be equal – he looked as if he, like everyone else, were upholding his role as a man and of being somebody. Virility does signify something for him, since it's equally the object of his very lively protestations at the time the delusion erupts, which initially presents itself in the form of a question over his sex, an interpellation [appel] that comes to him from outside, as in the fantasy – how nice it would be to be a woman undergoing intercourse. The delusion's development expresses the fact that for him there is no other way of realizing himself, of affirming himself as sexual, than through admitting he is a woman, transformed into a woman. This is the axis of the delusion. For there are two planes to distinguish.

On the one hand, the course of the delusion reveals the need to reconstruct the cosmos, the world's entire organization, around the fact that there is a man who can only be the wife of a universal god. On the other hand, let's not forget that in his common discourse up to the critical period of his existence this man appeared to know just like everyone else that he was a man, and what he somewhere calls his manly honor cries out aloud when he happens suddenly to be aroused a bit too strongly by the enigma of the absolute Other entering into play, which emerges with the first signs of the delusion.

In short, we are led here to the distinction that is the thread running through everything we have until now deduced from the very structuration of the analytic situation – namely, what I have called the little other and the absolute Other.

The former, the other with a small o, is the imaginary other, the otherness in a mirror image, which makes us dependent upon the form of our counterpart. The latter, the absolute Other, is the one we address ourselves to beyond this counterpart, the one we are forced to admit beyond the relation of mirage, the one who accepts or is refused opposite us,[5] the one who will on occasion deceive us, the one of whom we will never know whether he is deceiving us, 287 the one to whom we always address ourselves. His existence is such that the fact of addressing ourselves to him, of sharing something like language with him, is more important than anything that may be placed at stake between him and us.

Misrecognizing the distinction between these two others in analysis, where it's present throughout, lies at the origin of all the false problems, and in particular of the one that appears now that the primacy of the object relation is being emphasized.

Indeed, there is an obvious discrepancy between the Freudian position according to which the newborn, on entering the world, is in a so-called autoerotic relation, that is, a relation in which the object doesn't exist, and the clinical observation that from the beginning of life we undoubtedly have every indication that all sorts of objects exist for the newborn. The solution to this difficulty can only be found by distinguishing between the imaginary other insofar as he is structurally the originary form of the field in which a multiplicity of objects is structured for the human newborn, and the absolute Other, the Other with a big O, which is surely what Freud was driving at – and which analysts have subsequently neglected – when speaking of the non-existence, originally, of any Other.

There is a good reason for this, which is that this Other lies entirely within itself, Freud says, but at the same time entirely outside itself.

The ecstatic relation to the Other is an issue that didn't arise yesterday, but because it has been left in the background for several centuries it's worth our while, for we analysts who are constantly dealing with it, to reexamine it.

In the Middle Ages a distinction was drawn between what was called the physical theory and the ecstatic theory of love. This is the way the question of the subject's relation to the absolute Other was raised. Let's say that in order to understand the psychoses we have to make the love relation with the Other qua radically Other, and the mirror situation, everything of the order of the imaginary, animus and anima, which is located according to the sexes at one or other of the places, overlap in our little schema.

Where does the difference between someone who is psychotic and someone who isn't come from? It comes from the fact that for the psychotic a love relation that abolishes him as subject is possible insofar as it allows a radical heterogeneity of the Other. But this love is also a dead love.

It may seem to you that it's a curious and unusual detour to resort to a medieval theory of love in order to introduce the question of psychosis. It is, however, impossible to conceive the nature of madness otherwise.

Think about, sociologically, the forms of enamoration, of falling in love, 288 attested in culture.

Psychologists only ever put the question of patterns on the agenda. In certain cultures things have become so worn out that it's extremely awkward to know how to give form to love – the crisis begins the moment one takes the classic orchid, worn as a corsage, to the first rendezvous. Let's take as a reference point the technique, for it was a technique, or the art, of love – say, the practices of the love relation that prevailed for a time down in our Provence or in our Languedoc. There is an entire tradition there that was followed by the Arcadian novel along the lines of L'Astrée,[6] as well as by romantic love, in which one can observe a degradation in love patterns, which became increasingly uncertain.

Undoubtedly, over the course of this historical evolution passionate love becomes, to the extent that it's practiced in the style called platonic or passionate idealism, an increasingly ridiculous thing, or what is commonly called, quite rightly, a form of madness. The tone has been lowered, the thing has fallen into derision. We undoubtedly play upon this alienated and alienating process, but in an increasingly external manner upheld by an increasingly diffuse mirage. The thing, if it no longer takes place with a beautiful woman or with a lady, is accomplished in a darkened cinema with an image on the screen.

It's something of this order that I want to bring into prominence. This dimension tends in the direction of the madness of pure mirage insofar as the original style of the love relation has been lost. It strikes us as comical, this total sacrifice of one being for another, systematically pursued by people who had the time to do nothing but this. It was a spiritual technique that had its own modes and registers that we can barely grasp, given the distance that separates us from these things. We analysts would find plenty to interest us in this mixture of sensuality and chastity that was technically sustained, so it would appear, over the course of a singular concubinage with no physical relationship, or at the very least with deferred relations.

The characteristic of alienating degradation, of madness, that connotes the remnants of this practice which have been lost at the sociological plane provides us with an analogy with what takes place in the psychotic and gives meaning to the sentence from Freud I quoted to you the other day, namely that the psychotic loves his delusion like himself.[7]

The psychotic can only apprehend the Other in the relation with the sig-289 nifier, he lingers over a mere shell, an envelope, a shadow, the form of speech. The psychotic's Eros is located where speech is absent. It is there that he finds his supreme love.

Many things become clear if we take them in this register – for example, the curious onset of Schreber's psychosis with the curious expression soul murder he employs, a most unusual echo, you'll agree, of the language of love in the technical sense I have just been highlighting for you, love at the time of the Carte de Tendre.[8] This sacrificial and mysterious symbolic soul murder is formed at the onset of psychosis according to the precious language.

[6] Seventeenth-century novel by Honoré d'Urfé.

What can we discern concerning the onset of psychosis – at the least, that an imaginary abundance of modes of beings that are as many relations to the little other, an abundance supported by a certain mode of language and speech, is produced proportionate to a certain interpellation to which the subject is unable to respond?

From the outset I've emphasized the intrusion of what Schreber calls the fundamental language, which is affirmed as a sort of particularly full signifier.

This ancient German, he says, is full of resonances by virtue of its nobility and simplicity. There are passages where things go much further than this – Schreber attributes the misunderstanding with God to the fact that the latter does not know how to draw the distinction between what expresses the real feelings of the little souls, and thus of the subject, and the discourse in which he commonly expresses himself over the course of his relations with others. A distinction is thus literally traced out between the unconscious discourse that the subject expresses with all his being and common discourse.

Freud says it somewhere – there is more psychological truth in Schreber's delusion than in the psychologists.[9] This is Freud's wager. Schreber is more true than anything psychologists may say about him, he knows a lot more about human mechanisms and feelings than psychologists do. If God doesn't stop at man's daily needs, if he understands nothing of man, it's because he understands him only too well. The proof of this is that he also introduces into the fundamental language what happens while man sleeps, that is, his dreams. Schreber emphasizes this as if he had read Freud.

Opposed to this from the outset is a side of the signifier that is given to us for its qualities, its particular density – not for its meaning, but for its meaningfulness. The signified is empty, the signifier is retained for its purely formal properties, which are used for example to form series. This is the language of the birds from the sky, the discourse of the young girls, which Schreber grants the privilege of being without meaning. 290

The register in which the onset of psychosis is played out is located between these two poles – the word of revelation, which opens up a new dimension and gives a feeling of ineffable understanding, which corresponds to nothing previously experienced, and on the other hand the refrain, the same old song.

[9] See Freud's remarks at the end of the Schreber case, SE 12:78–79.

Beginning with what I call the first sign of the onset of psychosis, the world sinks into confusion, and we can follow, step by step, how Schreber reconstructs it in an attitude of gradual, ambiguous, reticent, reluctant as they say in English, consent. He admits bit by bit that the only means of escape, of preserving a certain stability in his relations with the invasive, desiring entities that for him are the supports of the unleashed language of his internal uproar, is to accept his transformation into a woman. Isn't it better, after all, to be a spirited woman than a cretinous man?[10] His body is thus progressively invaded by images of feminine identification to which he opens the door; he lets them take over, he has himself possessed, remodeled, by them. In a note somewhere there is the notion of his permitting images to enter himself.[11] And it's at this point that he recognizes that the world doesn't appear to have changed all that much since the beginning of his crisis – the return of a certain, no doubt problematic, sense of reality.

Concerning the delusion's evolution, it's worth observing that initially full manifestations of speech are produced and that they are satisfactory to him. But while his world is being reconstructed on the imaginary plane, there is a proportionate withdrawal of sense to other places. Speech is initially produced in what he calls the anterior, prior realms of God. Then God withdraws to a distance, remoteness, and that which corresponds to the first great signifying intuitions slips further and further away. At the same time as he reconstructs his world, that which is close to him and which he deals with, the speech of this anterior god with whom he has this unusual relation, which is an image of copulation, as is shown by the first dream of psychotic invasion, this god enters the universe of the learning by rote, of the refrain, of empty sense, and of objectification. In the vibrant space of his introspection what he calls writing-down henceforth permanently connotes, records, and ratifies his thoughts. There is a displacement here in the subject's relation to speech.

291 The spoken hallucinatory phenomena that for the subject have a sense in the register of interpellation, irony, defiance, allusion, always allude to the Other with a big O, as if it were a term that is invariably present but never seen and never named except indirectly. These considerations will lead us to some linguistic remarks relating to a fact that is within your reach but which you never grasp. I have in mind the two distinct types of usage of personal pronouns.

There are personal pronouns that decline, je [I], me [me], tu [you], te [you], il [he], le [him or it], etc. In the register me [me], te [you], le [him or it], the personal pronoun is liable to be elided. In the other me, moi [me], toi [you], lui [him], it isn't elided.

Do you see the difference? Je le veux [I want it or I want him] and Je veux lui or elle [I want him or her] aren't the same thing.

We'll stop there for today.

SENSE AND SCANSION

THE FULL CIRCLE AND SEGMENTATION

"YES, I COME INTO HIS TEMPLE . . ."

THE FEAR OF GOD

THE FATHER, A QUILTING POINT

Does the subject hear with his ears something that exists or something that doesn't exist? It's quite obvious that it doesn't exist and that consequently it's of the order of a hallucination, that is, of a false perception. Is this adequate for us?

This massive conception of reality leads to the quite mysterious explanation, advanced by analysts, according to which a so-called refusal to perceive produces a hole and there then appears in reality a drive that has been rejected by the subject. But why should something as complex and architectured as speech appear in this hole? This is what we are not told.

To be sure, such an explanation already constitutes progress over the classical conception, but we can go further. In short, we can expect that the phenomenon of psychosis will enable us to restore the proper relationship, increasingly misunderstood in analytic work, between the signifier and the signified.

I remind you that at the end of the period during which the external world disintegrated for Schreber, with its roots in that period, there appeared in him a structuration of the relations between the signifier and the signified that is presented thus – there are always two planes.

They are without doubt indefinitely subdivided within themselves. But 294 Schreber's efforts always to locate an anterior plane and a plane beyond is obviously imposed on him by his experience, and this guides us towards something that is really deep-seated in psychotic structure. I have sometimes got you to feel this in an immediate way in my presentations.

On one of these planes phenomena are produced that are above all ones the subject regards as neutralized, as signifying less and less a true other – phrases, he says, learned by rote, drummed into the birds from the sky who repeat them to him, who don't know what they are saying. This term birds leads to the parrot – it's a question of the transmission of something empty that wearies and exhausts the subject. At their first appearance these phenomena are situated at the limit of meaning, but they soon turn into quite the contrary – residue, refuse, empty bodies.

I have already mentioned these interrupted sentences that suggest a continuation. They teach us a great deal about the unity that prevails at the level of the signifier – in particular, that the latter isn't isolatable.

These unfinished sentences are in general interrupted at the point at which the full word that would give them their meaning is still lacking but is implied. I've already picked out more than one example of this. For instance, the subject hears – Do you still speak . . . , and the sentence stops. This means – Do you still speak . . . foreign languages?[1]

The said conception of souls is this dialogue, which is much fuller than the drummed-in words the souls exchange with him, in teaching him an entire psychology of thoughts, on the subject of himself. What first of all manifested itself at the beginning of the delusion, like an ineffable and vigorous form of expression, withdraws to a distance, becomes enigmatic, passes into the posterior realms of God, at the level of which the intrusive and absurd voices multiply. Even further beyond these voices there are other voices which express themselves in striking formulas.

I remind you of one that is not the least striking of them – Lacking now is . . . the leading thought.[2] They also speak to him of Gesinnung, which can mean either conviction or faith. Gesinnung, they explain, is something we owe any good man, even the blackest of sinners, subject to the demands of purification inherent in the order of the universe, something we owe him in exchange [dans l'échange], in the name of that which must regulate our relations with human beings. It is indeed faith that is in question, that minimum of good faith implied by recognition of the other.

A certain period of his hallucinations goes much further still. We have the most unusual expression [. . .]. It's a rare word, extremely difficult to translate. After consulting with people who know about these things, I had arrived at the idea that it was a question of nothing other than what I call the base word, the key, the ultimate linchpin, rather than the solution. It has a tech- 295 nical connotation, in fact, in the art of hunting – it would be what hunters call the fumées, that is, the traces of big game.

The essential aspect seems to me to be the withdrawal or migration of sense, its flight onto a plane that the subject is led to situate as the background. Two styles, two levels, are opposed to one another. On the one hand scansion, which plays on the properties of the signifier, with the implicit questioning that scansion contains and which extends to coercion. On the other hand sense, the nature of which is to take flight, to define itself as something that flees, but which at the same time presents itself as an extremely full sense, the fleeing of which draws the subject in towards what would be the core of the delusional phenomenon, its navel. You know that Freud uses this term navel to designate the point at which the sense of a dream appears to culminate in a hole, a knot, beyond which it is to the core of being that the dream appears to be attached.[3]

This description is no more than phenomenological. Try to get as much out of it as possible for what is at issue here, which is to find an explanation, a mechanism. We devote ourselves to the work of scientifically analyzing phenomena whose ways of manifesting themselves are familiar to us doctors, practitioners – the condition of familiarity is essential if we are not to lose the sense of analytic experience. The phenomenal relationship I am speaking of remains entirely within the distinction I've stressed a hundred times between the signifier and the signified.

You must undoubtedly end up saying to yourselves – In the end, don't we know that within the meanings that orient analytic experience this signifier is given by one's own body? And, conversely, that when he speaks of this signifier a given element of which happens to be missing, doesn't he, by means of one of these sleight-of-hand tricks that he holds the secret to, place meaning at the summit of the signifier? There is always a three-card trick from one register to another, according to the needs of the demonstration.

Well then, I shall happily grant you that there is in fact something of this sort, and this is just what I would like to explain to you today.

The problem is to give you a vivid sense of what you should have a general intuition of anyway, and which last year I showed you concerning a given neurotic phenomenon, by means of a game of letters that some of you recall, and this year concerning psychosis – the elementary meanings we call desire, or feeling, or affectivity, these fluctuations, these shadows, these resonances even, have certain dynamics that can be explained only at the level of the signifier insofar as it is structuring.[4]

296 The signifier doesn't just provide an envelope, a receptacle for meaning. It polarizes it, structures it, and brings it into existence. Without an exact knowledge of the order proper to the signifier and its properties, it's impossible to understand anything whatsoever, I don't mean about psychology – it

[3] Freud refers to the dream's navel at SE 5:525 and also at 4:111 n.1. The expression "core of our being," "Kern unseres Wesens," occurs at SE 5:603.

Saussure's schema

suffices that one restrict it in a certain way – but certainly about psychoanalytic experience.

This is what I would like to show you today.

The opposition between the signifier and the signified lies, as you know, at the basis of Ferdinand de Saussure's linguistic theory. It has been expressed in the famous schema of the two curves.[5]

At the upper level Saussure locates the series of what he calls thoughts – without the slightest conviction, since his theory consists precisely in reducing this term to that of the signified insofar as it is distinct from both the signifier and the thing – and he insists above all upon the aspect of amorphous mass. It's what, for our part, we shall provisionally call the sentimental mass of the current of discourse, a confused mass in which appear units, islands, an image, an object, a feeling, a cry, an appeal. It's a continuum, whereas underneath is the signifier as a pure chain of discourse, a succession of words, in which nothing is isolable.

How can I show you this through an experience?

I have to tell you that I spent a week looking for something in the area of the personal pronoun that would give you an image in French of the difference between je, I, and moi, me, in order to explain to you how the subject can lose mastery of them, if not contact with them, in psychosis. But concerning the person of the subject and the way it functions, it isn't possible to stop at this pronominal embodiment – it's the structure of the term as such that is involved, at least for our languages. I'm only saying this to secure the steps that I want to get you to follow today.

Come last night, then, I had a mountain of documents. But the ways linguists go about things are so diverse, so contradictory, and would require so many different levels to show you what is meant, that I once again found myself reproducing this double flow of discourse on a piece of paper.

This is indeed the impression we get. The relationship between the signified and the signifier always appears fluid, always ready to come undone. Analysts know better than anyone what is ungraspable in this dimension and 297 how much they themselves may hesitate before taking the plunge. A step forward has to be taken in order to give what is involved here a sense that is really usable in our experience.

Saussure tries to define a correspondence between these two flows that would segment them. But the sole fact that his solution is inconclusive, since it leaves the locution and the whole sentence problematic, clearly shows both the sense and limitations of his method.

Well then, I think to myself – What does one start with? And I go about looking for a sentence, a bit like this pseudo-Shakespeare stuck for inspiration, who paces up and down, repeating – To be or not . . to be or not . . . , stuck until he discovers that he can continue by starting at the beginning again – To be or not . . . to be. I start with a Yes. And, since French, not English, is my language, what comes to me next is – Yes, I come into his temple to worship the Eternal Lord.[6]

This means that no signifier is isolable.

It's very easy to see it immediately. Stop at Yes, I – why not? If your ear really was like a machine, at each instant the unfolding of the sentence would be followed by a sense. Yes, I does have a sense, which probably even constitutes the significance of the text.

Everyone wonders why the curtain rises on this Yes, I come . . . , and they say – There is a conversation going on. It's initially because this makes sense. The initial yes does indeed have a sense, linked to a species of ambiguity that remains in the word yes, oui, in French. It's not necessary to be involved with a woman of the world to be aware that Yes sometimes means no and that No sometimes means perhaps. The oui appeared late in French, it appeared after the si, after the da, which we agreeably rediscover in our time in the dac.[7] Because it comes from something that means, How good that is, the oui is in general a confirmation and at the very least a concession. Most often a Oui, mais, Yes, but, is just the type of thing.

Yes, I come into his temple. . . . Don't forget who this character is who is introducing himself here, being a little bit forward. It's the said Abner. He is an officer of the Queen, the said Athaliah, who gives the story its title and who sufficiently dominates everything that takes place as to be its main character. When one of the soldiers begins by saying, Yes, I come into his temple . . . , we have no idea where it might be taking us. It could well end up anywhere. I come into his temple . . . to arrest the High Priest, for example. It does have to be completed for one to know what is going on. The sentence only exists as completed and its sense comes to it retroactively. We need to have got right to the end, that is to say, to this famous Eternal Lord. 298

[7] Dac is a familiar abbreviation of d'accord, okay. In contemporary French si is an affirmative response to a negative question.

We are, here, in the order of signifiers, and I hope I have made you feel what the continuity of the signifier is. A signifying unit presupposes the completion of a certain circle that situates its different elements.

That is where I had paused momentarily. But this modest beginning has a much greater interest. It made me appreciate that the entire scene gives a very nice opportunity to get you to sense what brings psychologists to a standstill, because their function is to understand something of which they understand nothing, and what linguists don't extend to, despite the marvelous method they have in their hands. As for us, we shall go a bit further.

If we return to the scene, who is there listening to the said Abner? Jehoiada is, the High Priest who is engaged in cooking up the little conspiracy that will end with the accession to the throne of his son whom he rescued from massacre at the age of two and a half months and raised in a distant refuge. You can imagine the sentiment in which he listens to this declaration by the officer – Yes, I come into his temple to worship the Eternal Lord. The old man may well say to himself, in response – What is he doing here, then? The theme continues –

> Yes, I come into his temple to worship the Eternal Lord,
> I come, according to ancient and hallowed custom,
> To celebrate with you the glorious day
> When on Mount Sinai we received the law.

In short, they have a chat. And once the Eternal Lord has been left there in the lurch, he won't be spoken of again until right at the end of the play. They start reminiscing. Those were the good old days, masses of holy people streamed in through the gates, but now, how things have changed, scarcely a handful of zealous worshippers.

Here we start to understand what this is all about. Scarcely a handful of zealous worshippers – here's a character who thinks that this is the moment to join the Resistance. Here we are at the level of meaning – while the signifier goes on its merry way, zealous worshippers indicates what's at issue, and the ear of the High Priest does not, we can well imagine, fail to pick up this zeal in passing. Zeal comes from the Greek and means something like emulation, 299 rivalry, mimicry, because in this game one only wins by doing what suits, by looking like the others.

The climax appears at the end of the first discourse, namely that

I tremble with fear, to hide nothing from you, that Athaliah
Should have you ripped from the altar
And wreak upon you her dreadful revenge,
Shedding the remnants of a forced respect.

Here we see a word emerge that has a great deal of importance – tremble. It's etymologically the same word as craindre, fear, and fear is going to appear. There is something here that reveals the significant climax of the discourse, that gives an indication that has two senses. Here we are placed at the level of the upper register, that is, of what Saussure calls the amorphous mass of thoughts – it may be inherently amorphous, but it isn't merely that, because the other has to guess it.

Abner is there in effect, undoubtedly zealous, but when later the high priest virtually grabs him by the throat and says to him – Stop the chatter. What's this all about? How does one recognize those who are anything other than zealots?, one is going to realize how hard times are. It's a long time since God has given anything much in the way of proof of his power, whereas the power of Athaliah and her followers has up till now always proved to be triumphant. Consequently, when he mentions this new threat we don't see what he is driving at very well. It's double-edged. It's equally a warning, a piece of good advice, a counsel of prudence, or even of what's called discretion.

The other's responses are much briefer. He has many reasons for this, and principally that he is the more powerful, he holds the trump card, as it were – Where, he simply replies, does this dark foreboding come from today? And the signifier sticks perfectly to the signified. But you can see that he gives absolutely nothing away, all he does is make a retort, send back to the subject a question about the sense of what he has to say.

Thereupon, Abner elaborates further and begins to penetrate a bit further into the significant game. It's a mixture of flattery – Do you believe you can be holy and just with impunity? and informing, which consists of recounting that there is a certain Mattan who is, in any case, indomitable. He doesn't pursue very far his denunciation of the proud Athaliah, who is after all still his Queen. There happens to be a scapegoat, which is extremely convenient for continuing to lay the bait.

It's still not clear what the point of all this is, unless it's this –

Do believe me, the more I think about it, the less I am able to doubt That upon you her wrath is about to break.

This displays the moving nature of the characters well. The less he is able to doubt . . . this doubt doesn't make such a disagreeable pillow, but it's no longer quite the moment to relax.

. Yesterday I observed her . . .

Here we are at the level of the intelligence officer.

. . . and I saw her eyes
At the holy place throw furious glances.

I would like you to observe that after all the courtesy that Abner has pledged over the course of the exchange, nothing will have happened by the end if we remain at the level of meaning. At this level everything can be summed up in a few words. They both know a bit more than they are prepared to say. Jehoiada is the one who knows the most, but in order to go out and meet what the other claims to know, he makes only one allusion to the fact that there is something in the wind, in other words an Elician in the sanctuary.

But you have the striking evidence of the speed with which the said Abner jumps on this – She made a mistake, he says later, that is to say –Did she botch part of the massacre? What if there remains someone from this famous family of David? This contribution shows well enough that the reason Abner has gone into the temple is that he is attracted by the smell of fresh blood. But in the final analysis he knows neither more nor less at the end of the dialogue than at the beginning, and this first scene in its meaningful fullness could be summed up in these words –

– I have come to the Festival of the Lord.
– Very well, says the other. Take part in the procession and no talking in the ranks.

It's not this at all, on the one condition that you are aware of the role of the signifier. If you are, you will see that there are a number of key words underlying the discourse of the two characters and that they partly coincide. There 301 is the word tremble, the word fear, the word extermination. Tremble and fear are used by Abner first, who takes us to the point I have just indicated, that is, to the point at which Jehoiada truly starts to speak out.

He who can still the raging seas can also thwart the wicked in their plots.
In respectful submission to His holy will,
I fear God, dear Abner, and have no other fear.

I fear God, you say . . . , he replies, whereas Abner had never said this,

. . . his truth touches me.
Here is how the Lord answers you out of my mouth.

And we see the word I pointed out to you at the beginning, zeal, appear here –

By zeal for my law,
By sterile vows do you think to honor me?

What is the fruit for me of all your sacrifices?
The blood of your Kings cries out, and is not heard.
Break off all your pacts with impiety.
From the midst of my people extinguish the crimes
And then you will immolate your victims in my name.

You mustn't think that these are innocent victims in more or less fixed form in appropriate locations. When Abner observes that the Holy Ark is mute and gives no more oracles, he gets this lively response –

Ungrateful race. What? Will the greatest marvels strike your ears but never move your heart?
Must I, Abner, must I recall the series
Of wondrous prodigies accomplished in our time?
Of Israel's tyrants the celebrated disgrace,
And God found faithful in all his threats;
The impious Ahab destroyed, and drenched with his blood
The field that by murder he had usurped;
302 Near this fatal field Jezebel immolated,
Under the horses' hooves this Queen was crushed,
In her inhuman blood the dogs slaked their thirst,
And her hideous body dismembered;

So we know what sort of victim will be involved.

In short, what is the role of the signifier here? Fear is something that is particularly ambivalent. We others, we analysts, aren't unaware of this – it's as much something that drives you on as something that holds you back, it's something that makes you a double being and that, when you express it before a character with whom you want to play at being afraid together, will always place you in the position of a reflection. But there is something else, which looks homonymous – the fear of God.

This isn't the same thing at all. It's the signifier, itself rather rigid, that Jehoiada trots out precisely at the moment he is alerted to the danger.

The fear of God is an essential expression in a certain line of religious thought which you would be wrong to think of as simply the general line. The fear of the gods, from whom Lucretius wants to free his little friends, is something altogether different, a multiform, confused feeling, one of panic. The fear of God, on the other hand, on which a tradition that goes back to Solomon is based, is the principle of wisdom and the foundation of the love of God. Moreover, this tradition is precisely our own.

The fear of God isn't a signifier that is found everywhere. Someone had to invent it and propose to men, as the remedy for a world made up of manifold terrors, that they fear a being who is, after all, only able to exercise his cruelty through the evils that are there, multifariously present in human life. To have replaced these innumerable fears by the fear of a unique being who has no other means of manifesting his power than through what is feared behind these innumerable fears, is quite an accomplishment.

You will say to me – That really is a curate's idea! Well, you're wrong. The curates have invented absolutely nothing in this genre. To invent a thing like this you have to be a poet or a prophet, and it's precisely insofar as this Jehoiada is one to some extent, at least by the grace of Racine, that he can use as he does this major and primordial signifier.

I have only been able to briefly mention the cultural history of this signifier, but I have sufficiently indicated to you that it's inseparable from a particular structuration. It's the signifier that dominates the thing, since as far as the meanings are concerned they have completely changed.

This famous fear of God completes the sleight of hand that transforms, 303 from one minute to the next, all fears into perfect courage. All fears – I have no other fear – are exchanged for what is called the fear of God, which, however constraining it may be, is the opposite of a fear.

What has happened by the end of the scene is precisely this – the said Jehoiada has handed the fear of God onto the other, and in the proper way, the right way round, painlessly. And straightaway Abner departs completely trustworthy, with this word that echoes God found faithful in all his threats. It's no longer a question of zeal, he will join the faithful troops. In short, he himself has become the support of the bait that will hook the Queen. The play is already played out, it's over. It's insofar as Abner doesn't say a word to her about the real risks she is running that the Queen will take the bait he henceforth represents.

The power of the signifier, the effectiveness of this word fear, has been to transform the zeal at the beginning, with everything that is ambiguous, doubtful, always liable to be reversed, that this word conveys, into the faithfulness of the end. This transmutation is of the order of the signifier as such. No accumulation, no superimposition, no summation of meanings, is sufficient to justify it. The entire progress of this scene, which would otherwise be worthy of the Deuxième Bureau,[8] resides in the transmutation of the situation through the intervention of the signifier.

Whether it be a sacred text, a novel, a play, a monologue, or any conversation whatsoever, allow me to represent the function of the signifier by a spatializing device, which we have no reason to deprive ourselves of. This point around which all concrete analysis of discourse must operate I shall call a quilting point.

[8] The French Secret Service.

When the upholsterer's needle, which has entered at the moment of God found faithful in all his threats, reappears, it's all over, the chap says, I'm going to join the faithful troops.

Were we to analyze this scene as a musical score, we should see that this is the point at which the signified and the signifier are knotted together, between the still floating mass of meanings that are actually circulating between these two characters and the text. It's due to this admirable text, and not to the meaning, that Athaliah is not a piece of boulevard theatre.

The quilting point is the word fear, with all these trans-significant connotations. Everything radiates out from and is organized around this signifier, similar to these little lines of force that an upholstery button forms on the 304 surface of material. It's the point of convergence that enables everything that happens in this discourse to be situated retroactively and prospectively.

The schema of the quilting point is essential in human experience.

Why does this minimal schema of human experience which Freud gave us in the Oedipus complex retain its irreducible and yet enigmatic value for us? And why privilege the Oedipus complex? Why does Freud always want to find it everywhere, with such insistence? Why do we have here a knot that seems so essential to him that he is unable to abandon it in the slightest particular observation – unless it's because the notion of father, closely related to that of the fear of God, gives him the most palpable element in experience of what I've called the quilting point between the signifier and the signified?

Perhaps I've spent a long time explaining this to you, but I nevertheless believe that this creates an image and enables you to grasp how it can happen, in psychotic experience, that the signifier and the signified present themselves in a completely divided form.

One can think that in a psychosis everything is there in the signifier. It looks as if everything is there. President Schreber seems to understand perfectly well what it is to be screwed by Professor Flechsig and by a number of others who become his substitutes. What is vexatious is precisely that he should say so, and in the clearest possible way – why, henceforth, should this provoke, as people explain to us, such profound disorders in his libidinal economy?

No, it's in another register that what happens in psychosis has to be explored. I don't know how many there are, but it isn't impossible that one should manage to determine the minimal number of fundamental points of insertion between the signifier and the signified necessary for a human being to be called normal, and which, when they are not established, or when they give way, make a psychotic.

What I'm proposing is still altogether crude, but it's the point from which we can begin next time to examine the role of the personization of the subject, namely the manner in which in French je and moi are differentiated.[9]

Of course, no particular language has any privilege in the order of signifiers, the resources of each are extremely different and always limited. But equally, any one of them covers the entire field of meanings. 305

Where in the signifier is the person? How does a discourse hang together? Up to what point can a discourse that seems personal bear, on the level of the signifier alone, a sufficient number of traces of impersonalization for the subject not to recognize it as his own?

I'm not saying that this is the source of the mechanism of psychosis, I'm saying that the mechanism of psychosis manifests itself here. Before outlining this mechanism we must make an effort to recognize at the different stages of the phenomenon the points at which the quilting is omitted. A complete catalogue of these points would enable us to discover some surprising correlations and appreciate that it isn't just in any old way that the subject depersonalizes his discourse.

In this respect there is an experience within hand's reach. Clérambault recognized it. He alludes somewhere to what happens when all of a sudden we are gripped by an event from our past that we find difficult to tolerate being affectively evoked. When it's not a question of commemoration but of the resurgence of affect, when, recollecting being angry, we are very close to being angry, when, recollecting a humiliation, we relive the humiliation, when, remembering the destruction of an illusion, we feel the need to reorganize our equilibrium and our meaningful field, in the sense in which one speaks of social field – well then, this is the most favorable moment, Clérambault notes, for the emergence, which he himself calls purely automatic, of scraps of sentences sometimes taken from one's most recent experience, and which have no kind of meaningful relationship with the matter at hand.

These phenomena of automatism are in fact admirably observed – but there are many others – and having the adequate schema is sufficient for one to situate oneself in the phenomenon in a way that is no longer purely descriptive but properly explanatory. There you have the order of things that an observation such as that of President Schreber, which is no doubt unique in the annals of psychopathology, must convey to us.

[9] Damourette and Pichon define "personization" as the distribution of verbs on the "delocutory" plane (i.e., in the indicative, subjunctive, and conditional moods) and on the "locutory" plane (i.e., in the imperative mood).

Next time I shall pick things up at the je and the tu.

There is no need for these to be expressed in a sentence for them to be there. Come on! is a sentence and implies an I and a you.

306 In the schema I have given you, where are the I and the you? You imagine perhaps that the you is here, at the level of the big Other, do you? No, not at all. This is where we shall begin – the you in its verbalized form does not at all coincide with this pole that we have been calling big O.

"Thou art the one who wilt follow me"

THE OTHER IS A LOCUS
THE YOU OF THE SUPEREGO
DEVOLUTION AND OBSERVATION
THE VOICE
INTERPELLATION OF THE SIGNIFIER

I'm much more myself. Before, I was a para-me who thought of myself as the true one, and who was absolutely false.

In any càse, I want to point out that there is a lot of us, those who gave our support to the Popular Front.[1]

These sentences, which are attested, I have selected from Damourette and Pichon's Grammaire, a substantial and highly instructive work, even if only because of the enormous quantity of very intelligently classified documents, whatever errors it contains as a whole and in its details.

These two sentences, one spoken and one written, show us that what I am going to get you to think about today is not a forged artifact, a misplaced literary subtlety.

The first sentence obviously comes from a patient in analysis. Pichon indicates this by her initials, Mme X, such and such a date. I'm much more myself, she says, no doubt very satisfied with progress accomplished in her treatment, Before, I was a para-me who thought of myself as. . . . Thank God that the French language, which is often ambiguous when spoken, here, owing to the encounter between a silent consonant and an initial vowel, enables what is in question to be clearly discerned.[2] The verb is in the first person singular, it's I who thought of myself as. . . . Through the relative pronoun, the first person has been transmitted to the relative clause.

You'll tell me – This is obvious! That was the response of a charming woman

[1] "Je suis beaucoup plus moi. Avant, j'étais un paramoi qui croyais être le vrai, et qui était absolument faux.

"En tout cas, je veux préciser que nous sommes nombreux ceux qui avons soutenu le Front populaire."

[2] With most verbs the difference between the first and third person singular would not normally be heard in French, but when, as here, the following word begins with a vowel, the final consonant of the verb may be pronounced. The first and third persons can then be differentiated in spoken language.

308 whom I tried recently to interest in these issues by propounding to her the problem of the difference between I am the woman who will not abandon you and I am the woman who shall not abandon you.[3] I have to say that I was unsuccessful. She refused to show any interest in this nuance whose importance you have nevertheless already felt.

Usage makes this sufficiently clear, since in the same sentence Mme X continues – I am much more myself. Before, I was a para-me who thought of myself as the true one, and who was absolutely false.

I think that no sentence is more appropriately expressed. It was absolutely false, this para-me. An I in the first part of the sentence, it has become an it in the second.

There are a few of them like that in Pichon, equally quite pertinent and still of interest – In any case, I want to point out that there is a lot of us, those who gave our support to the Popular Front, voted for its candidates, and who thought of themselves as having a totally different ideal to follow, a totally different action, and a totally different reality, etc.[4]

If you pay attention you can collect these examples by the bucketful. The issue is whether or not the personization that is in the principal clause crosses the screen, the lens, at the entrance to the relative clause. The screen is obviously neutral, it won't vary. It is therefore a question of knowing what the penetrative power, as it were, of the antecedent personization consists in.

We shall see that this minor linguistic point can also be found in other languages in a manner that is very much alive. But obviously one would have to look in other syntactic forms. We shall come back to this later on.

Last time I left you at the point of examining what new light the advances we have made concerning the function of the signifier can contribute to the burning question, which has been made topical in a confused way by the function of the object relation and made present as much by the structure as by the phenomenology of psychosis, of the other.

Until now I have been showing you the duality of this other, between the imaginary other and the Other with a big O, this Other that I discussed in the small piece I read out to you in the last session of last year, and which has just been published in Evolution psychiatrique under the title of La Chose freudienne.[5]

[3] "Je suis la femme qui ne vous abandonnerai pas" and "Je suis la femme qui ne vous abandonnera pas." The relative verb is in the second person in the first example and in the third person in the second example. The old or regional distinction in English usage between shall and will seems to capture much of the sense of the distinction that Lacan draws.

[4] "En tout cas je veux préciser que nous sommes nombreux ceux qui avons soutenu le Front populaire, voté pour ses candidats, et qui croyaient à un tout autre idéal poursuivi, à une tout autre action et à une tout autre réalité."

I apologize for quoting myself, but what's the use of polishing up one's propositions if one is not to use them? I say – the Other is, therefore, the locus 309 in which is constituted the I who is speaking with him who hears.[6] I say this following some remarks on the fact that there is always an Other beyond all concrete dialogue, all interpsychological play. This proposition that I quote has to be taken as a starting point, the issue is to find out where it leads to.

I would like you to be aware of how much difference there is between such a perspective and the one that is confusedly accepted today. Saying that the Other is the locus in which is constituted he who is speaking with him who hears is something quite different from setting out from the idea that the other is a being.

We have been intoxicated for some time in analysis by themes that have indisputably come from so-called existentialist discourse, where the other is the thou, the one who can respond, but in a symmetrical mode, one of complete correspondence, the alter ego, the brother. One forms a fundamentally reciprocal idea of intersubjectivity. Add to this the sentimental confusions that come under the rubric of personalism, plus Martin Buber's book on the I and the thou,[7] and the confusion will be definitive and irremediable unless one returns to experience.

Far from having made any contribution whatsoever that would throw light on the foundation of the existence of the other, all the existentialist experience has done is to suspend it, in an increasingly radical way, from the hypothesis of projection – upon which you of course all live – according to which the other is barely more than a certain human semblance, animated by an I that is the reflection of my own.

Animism and anthropomorphism are there, always liable to emerge and in fact impossible to refute, as are the summary references to the experience of language at the time of one's first babbling. It's brought to our attention that the child doesn't immediately acquire mastery of you and I, but the acquisition is ultimately summed up in the child's being able to say I when you have said you to him, in his understanding that when he is told you're going to do this he has to say in his register I'm going to do this.

In analysts this symmetrical conception culminates in a number of first truths, in extraordinary statements such as the following, which I heard from the mouth of someone who belongs to what one calls the other group – One can't analyze someone for whom the other doesn't exist.

[5] See "The Freudian Thing," E, 401-36 / 114-45.
[6] E, 431 / 141.
[7] Martin Buber, I and Thou.

I wonder what it means to say that the other doesn't exist. I wonder whether this expression has any value whatsoever, even as an approximation. What is at issue? A lived experience? An irreducible feeling? Take the case of Schre-310 ber, for whom all humanity was at one time in the state of fleeting-improvised-men – well then, there is indeed an other for him, a singularly accentuated other, an absolute Other, an entirely radical Other, an Other who is neither a place nor a schema, an Other who he says is a living being in his own way, and who he stresses is capable, when threatened, of egoism like other living beings. God, finding himself in a position in which his independence is threatened by this disorder for which he is primarily responsible, manifests spasmodic defense relations. He nevertheless retains an otherness such that he is a stranger to living things and, more particularly, is deprived of all understanding with respect to the vital needs of our Schreber.

That there is for Schreber an other who is worthy of the name is adequately indicated by the singularly pointed, witty beginning of one of the chapters of his Memoirs, where he says he is in no way a paranoiac. A paranoiac is someone who relates everything to himself, he's someone whose egocentrism is invasive – he's read Kraepelin – but as for me, he says, it's quite different, it's the Other who relates everything to me.[8] There is an Other, and this is decisive, structuring.

Thus, before speaking of the other as something that is either placed or not placed at a certain distance, which we are either capable or incapable of embracing, of clasping, or even of consuming in more or less rapid quantities, one would have to know whether the very phenomenology of things as they present themselves in our experience doesn't necessitate a different approach – precisely the one I adopt in saying, before seeing how it will be more or less brought about – that the Other must first of all be considered a locus, the locus in which speech is constituted.

Persons – since this is what we are interested in today – must come from somewhere. They come first in a signifying, by which I mean formal, manner. Speech is constituted for us by an I and a you. These are two counterparts. Speech transforms them, by giving them a certain appropriate relationship, but – and this is what I want to insist upon – a distance that's not symmetrical, a relationship that isn't reciprocal. In fact, the I is never there where it appears in the form of a particular signifier. The I is always there in the name of a presence that supports the discourse as a whole, whether in direct or indirect speech. The I is the I of him who is pronouncing the discourse. Underneath everything that is said there is an I who pronounces it. It's within this enunciation that the you appears.

These are first truths, so much so that you are liable to look further than the end of your nose. There is nothing more to understand than what I have just observed. That the you is already within discourse is obvious. There has never been a you anywhere else than where one says you. Let's start from there. 311

As for the I, is it, too, a coin, a fiduciary element circulating in discourse? I hope to answer this a little later, but I raise the question now so that you won't lose sight of it and so that you will know what I'm getting at.

The you is far from being addressed to an ineffable person, to that species of beyond whose leading accent the sentimentalist tendency in the manner of existentialism would like to show us. It's something quite different in its usage.

The you isn't always the full you, of which so much is made and which, as you know, I myself occasionally evoke in some leading examples. You are my master, you are my woman – I make a great deal of such expressions for getting the function of speech understood.

It is a question today of recentering the significance attached to this you, which is far from always having this full employment.

I return to some linguistic observations.

The second person is far from always being employed with this emphasis. When it is said in quite ordinary usage – One can't go for a walk in that place without someone's accosting you,[9] it isn't about any you in reality. The you is almost the reflexive of the one, it is its correspondent.

Something even more significant – When you have attained this degree of wisdom, all that remains is to die.[10] Here again, what you is involved? I am certainly not addressing myself to no one in particular in this utterance. I ask you to take the sentence as a whole because there is no sentence that can be detached from the fullness of its meaning. What you is alluding to is so far from being an other that I should say it is alluding to those left behind who would persist in living after this discourse – if wisdom says that there is no end to anything other than death, then all that remains is to die. This shows you well enough that the function of the second person on this occasion is precisely to allude to what is nobody, to what is depersonalized.

In fact, this you that one kills here is the one that is perfectly familiar to us from the phenomenology of psychosis, as well as from common experience.[11] It's the you that says you in us, this you that always makes itself more or less 312

[9] "On ne peut pas se promener dans cet endroit sans qu'on vous aborde."
[10] "Quand on en vient à ce degré de sagesse, il ne vous reste plus qu'à mourir."
[11] "Tu," "you," and "tue," "kill," are homophonic.

discreetly heard, this you that speaks alone, and says You see! to us, or, You're always the same. As in Schreber's experience, this you doesn't need to say you in order to be the you that speaks to us. A tiny bit of disintegration suffices – Schreber had more than his fair share – for things like, Don't surrender to the first inducement to emerge.[12]

This is an allusion to something that isn't named and that we reconstruct as being Schreber's homosexual tendency, but it is possibly something different, since invitations, injunctions, are not rare but constant. This sentence is in fact the rule of conduct for many people – Don't surrender to your initial reaction, it might be the right one, as they say.[13] And what are you taught, if it isn't precisely never to surrender to the first inducement? Here we recognize our good old friend the superego, who suddenly appears before us in his phenomenal form, rather than in amiable genetic hypotheses. This superego is indeed something like the law, but it's a law without dialectic, and it's not for nothing that it is recognizable, more or less correctly, in the categorical imperative, with what I would call its maleficent neutrality – one author calls it the internal saboteur.

We would be wrong if we misunderstood that this you is also present as an observer – it sees everything, hears everything, notes everything. This is indeed what takes place in Schreber, and it's his mode of relation to it that is expressed in him by this remorseless, incessant you, which provokes him into responses devoid of any kind of sense.

I am tempted to quote the old expression, Nobody suspects a thing,[14] that used to be displayed in the pages of the telephone directory concerning a private detective agency. One senses to what extent an ideal is involved here. How happy everybody would be if in fact nobody did suspect a thing! But hide as one may behind a curtain, there is always a big pair of shoes that stick out. It's the same for the superego. But it doesn't suspect anything. Nothing is less doubtful than whatever appears to us through the intermediary of this you.

It is incredible that we should be liable to forget this major obstacle, which our analytic experience makes manifest – that the you is present as a foreign body. An analyst, Mr. Isakower, went so far as to compare it with what takes place in a little crustacean of the prawn genus that has the unusual property of having, at the beginning of its existence, its vestibular chamber, the organ that governs balance, open to the marine environment.[15] The vestibular chamber subsequently closes and includes a number of small particles prevalent in the environment that will make it easier for it to adopt a vertical or horizontal position. At the beginning of their existence these little animals 313 themselves gently introduce small grains of sand into their shell, then, by a physiological process, the chamber closes up. If you substitute small particles of iron filings for these grains of sand you can lead these charming little things to the end of the earth with an electromagnet or make them swim upside down.

This is the function of the you in man according to Mr. Isakower, and I would be happy to make an apologue of this in order to get the experience of the you understood, but at its lowest level. One totally misrecognizes its function if one neglects that it leads to the you as signifier.

Analysts – the path I'm following here isn't a solitary one – have emphasized yet another point. I can't dwell upon the relation that exists between the superego, which is nothing other than the function of the you, and the sentiment of reality. I don't need to insist on this for the simple reason that it's stressed on every page of President Schreber's observation. If the subject doesn't doubt the reality of what he hears, it's because of this characteristic of foreign body that the intimation of the delusional you presents. Need I invoke the philosophy of Kant, who recognizes a fixed reality only in the starry skies above our heads and the voice of conscience within?[16] This foreignness, like the character Tartuffe, is the true possessor of the house who readily says to the ego – You will have to leave. When the feeling of foreignness, strangeness, strikes somewhere, it's never on the side of the superego – it's always the ego that loses its bearings, it's the ego that enters the state of you, it's the ego that thinks it is in the state of the double, that is, expelled from the house, while the you remains the possessor of things.

That's our experience. We don't have to stop there all the same. But ultimately we have to be reminded of these truths if we are to understand where the structural problem lies.

It may seem strange to you that I mechanize things in this way, and perhaps you will imagine that I'm working with an elementary notion of the discourse I teach, that everything is contained within the relation between the I and the you, between the ego and the other.

This is what linguists – not to mention psychoanalysts – start mumbling about whenever they investigate the question of discourse. One may even regret seeing that Pichon, in the quite remarkable work I have mentioned, finds it necessary to remind us that for the basis of his definition of verbal distributories[17] – as he puts it – one has to set out from the idea that discourse is always addressed to an other, to the allocutor.[18] And so he begins [16] Conclusion, Critique of Practical Reason, 258.

[17] "répartitoire." Damourette and Pichon define a "distributory" as a system of grammatical classification involving number, voice, person, etc.

[18] Damourette and Pichon define the "allocutor" as the second person singular.

314 with the simple locutory plane[19] found in the imperative, Come here! There's no need to say much about this – Come here! presupposes an I, it presupposes a you. There is moreover a narrative plane that is delocutory,[20] on which there's always I and you, but on which one is alluding to something else.

We can only think that one is not fully satisfied with such a distribution, since a new problem arises concerning the interrogative, which we shall introduce with a dissymmetry that forms a symmetry provided we regard the number three as the best.

If the narrative is He's coming, the interrogative is Vient-il?, Is he coming? But it's not so simple in this function. The proof is that one says Le roi vient-il?, Is the King coming?, which clearly shows that t-il is not quite the same subject in the interrogative as in the narrative. This may mean there is a King, let the King come, or if the King comes. The question becomes much more complex as soon as one approaches the concrete usage of language. The imperative Viens!, Come here!, creates the illusion of a symmetrical, bipolar presence of an I or a you. But are the I or the you also present when reference is made to this third object called a third person?

The said third person doesn't exist. I tell you this in passing so as to begin to unsettle some principles that are, certainly, very tenacious in your minds, owing to the elementary teaching of grammar. There is no third person, M. Benveniste has demonstrated this conclusively.[21]

Let's pause for a moment in order to place the question that the subject asks himself, or more exactly the question that I ask myself about what I am or may hope to be.

In our experience we only ever find it expressed by the subject outside himself and without his knowledge. It's a fundamental question, however, since it lies at the foundation of neurosis, which is where we have grabbed it by the ears.

We can see that this question, when it crops up, decomposes remarkably. It crops up in forms that have nothing interrogative about them, like Puissé-je y arriver!, Would that I succeed!, but which are in between an exclamation, a wish, an expression of doubt. If we want to give this a little bit more consistency, to express it in the delocutory and narrative register, in the indicative, notice how we quite naturally say – Penses-tu réussir?, Do you really think you'll succeed?

In short, I would like to convey to you a distribution of the functions of language other than by rambling on about the locution, the delocution, and [19] The "locutory plane" is defined as "the state of language when the attention is focused on the state of mind of the person speaking." Glossary, Essai de grammaire 7:10.

[20] The "delocutory plane" is the state of language when the expression is focused on the thing being spoken of.

the allocution – and to do it as a function of the question that is always latent, never raised.

If it is brought to light, if it emerges, it's always in connection with a mode of appearance of speech that we may in various ways call a mission, a mandate, a delegation, or a devolution, in reference to Heidegger. It's the foundation or foundational speech – You are this, my woman, my master, a thousand other things. This You are this, when I receive it, makes me in speech other than I am. 315

Who utters it? Is this you the same as the you swimming at large in the examples I have given you? Is this mission phenomenally primary or secondary in relation to the question?

The question tends to emerge when we have to answer to a mission. The third party at issue here – I point this out to you in passing – is nothing resembling an object. It's always the discourse itself to which the subject is referring. To the you are my master a certain what am I? responds – What am I if that's what I am, if indeed I am it at all? This it isn't the master taken as an object, it is the entire enunciation of the sentence that says I am your master, as if your master had a sense solely through the homage I receive from it. What am I, if I'm what you've just been saying I am?

There is a very nice prayer in Christian practice called the Ave Maria. Moreover, nobody suspects that this begins with the three letters that buddhist monks murmur all day long, AUM, there must be something radical in the order of the signifier here – but it's not important. I salute you, Mary and – according to another popular saying – You will have a son without a husband, as the song goes.[22] Moreover, this is not at all unrelated to the subject of President Schreber. The response is not at all, I am what?, but, I am the maid-servant of the Lord, that it be done unto me according to your word. I am the maid-servant simply means, I abolish myself. What am I if I am she who you say I am? But that it be done unto me according to your word.

Such is the order of response at issue in speech at its clearest. When the devolution presents itself in a sufficiently advanced manner, we can study the reciprocal relationships between the you, a foreign body, and the signifier that pins down, quilts, the subject.

I ask you to consider with me today some examples whose linguistic significance is completely tangible to us French.

What is the difference between Thou art the one who wilt follow me everywhere and Thou art the one who will follow me everywhere?[23]

[22] "Je vous salue Marie / Vous aurez un fils sans mari."

[23] "Tu es celui qui me suivras partout" and "Tu es celui qui me suivra partout." In 316 We have a principal clause in the second person, Thou art the one. Who is the screen. Will it or will it not let the thou pass into the relative? You see immediately that it is absolutely impossible to separate the thou from the sense of the signifier that follows. The permeability of the screen doesn't depend on the thou, but on the sense of to follow and on the sense that I place upon it, I who am speaking – this I who is speaking isn't necessarily me, it is perhaps whoever hears that with the echo that lies underneath the whole sentence – on the sense placed on this sentence.

Thou art the one who wilt follow me everywhere is at the very least an election, perhaps unique, a mandate, a devolution, a delegation, an investment. Thou art the one who will follow me everywhere is an observation, which we are inclined to feel as being on the side of a sorrowful observation. Of this thou who will follow me everywhere we shall rapidly have had a stomach full if this really is determinative in character. If in one case this tends towards the sacrament, in the other it would move fairly quickly over to the side of the persecution included in the very term to follow.

You will tell me yet again that the signifier in question is precisely a meaning. My retort is that the meaning of secution that is in question when I say thou art the one who will follow me everywhere to the one whom I recognize as my companion, and which may be the response to you are my master that we are always going on about, implies the existence of a certain mode of signifier. I shall materialize this for you immediately.

Suivre, to follow, may be ambiguous in French. It may not carry quickly enough in itself the mark of the signifying originality of the dimension of the true suivre. Follow what? This is what remains open. And this is precisely what I want you to observe – that it remains open. Follow your being, your message, your word, your group, what I represent? What is it? It's a knot, a point of contraction in a bundle of meanings, whether acquired by the subject or not. If the subject hasn't acquired it, he will hear Tu es celui qui me suivra partout, Thou art the one who will follow me everywhere, what the other has said to him suivras, wilt follow, that is, in quite a different sense, which changes even the significance of the thou.

The presence of the thou, in the wilt follow, affects the personization of the subject to whom one is addressing oneself. When I say, in a tangible example, Thou art the woman who will not abandon me, I display a much greater certainty concerning the conduct of my partner than when I say Thou art the woman who wilt not abandon me. To make you feel the difference which [in French] isn't heard, in the first case I exhibit a much greater certainty and in the first of these two sentences the subordinate verb is in the second person singular, in the second it is in the third person singular. For what follows it is important to bear in mind that the two French sentences sound the same.

the second a much greater trust. This trust presupposes precisely a looser link between the person who appears in the thou of the first part of the sentence and the one who appears in the relative. It's precisely because this link 317 is loose that it appears in a special form of originality with respect to the signifier and because it presupposes that the person knows what sort of signifier is at issue in this to follow, that she assumes it. This also means that she may not follow.

I am going to select a reference that touches on the most radical characteristic of the relations between the I and the signifier. In the old Indo-European languages, and in certain remnants in living languages, there is what is called the middle voice. The middle voice is distinguished from the active and the passive in that, this is an approximation one learns at school, the subject performs the action in question for himself. There are for example two different forms for saying I sacrifice, according as one performs the sacrifice or offers the sacrifice.

Let's not enter into the nuances of the middle voice concerning verbs that have the three voices, because, not using it ourselves, our feel for it will always be poor. What is instructive is the verbs that have only a middle voice. Selecting them from an article by M. Benveniste on this subject in the Journal de psychologie normale et pathologique of January–March 1950, dedicated entirely to language, the following are middle verbs – to be born, to die, to follow or embrace a movement, to be master, to be lying down, to return to a familiar state, to enjoy or benefit, to suffer, to be patient, to be mentally agitated, to take measures – which is the medeor that is invested in you as doctors – to speak.[24] In short, this is the entire register at work precisely in analytic experience.

These verbs exist only in the middle voice in a number of languages. What do they have in common? It emerges on investigation that what they have in common is that the subject is constituted as such in the process or the state expressed by the verb.

Don't attach any importance to the terms process or state – the verbal function isn't easily apprehended in a category. The verb is a function in the sentence, nothing else. There is no difference between the name and the verb other than their function within the sentence. Substantives are able to express a process or state also. The implication of the subject is absolutely unchanged by the fact that the process or state concerned is expressed in verbal form. If it's expressed in verbal form, this is because it is the support of a number of signifying accents that place the sentence as a whole in a temporal mode.

The existence of distinct forms for the verbs in which the subject is constituted as such, as I, like the Latin sequor which, by virtue of the full sense of [24] See "Active and Middle Voice in the Verb," 148.

318 the verb to follow, implies the presence of the I in the secution, gives us a clue to what is involved in the fact that in French the verb in the relative clause agrees or doesn't agree with the thou of the main clause. It will agree or not agree with the thou, depending on the way in which the I in question is involved, captivated, pinned down, caught up in the quilting I spoke of the other day, depending on the way in which, in the subject's total relationship to the discourse, the signifier latches on.

The entire context of Thou art the one who wilt follow me changes according to the accent placed on the signifier, according to the implications of the wilt follow, according to the mode of being that lies behind this wilt follow, according to the meanings the subject has coupled to a certain signifying register, according to the baggage with which the subject departs into the indetermination of the what am I? – and it matters little whether this baggage is primordial, acquired, secondary, defensive, fundamental, its origin matters little. We live with a number of responses, in general highly suspect, to what am I? If I am a father has a sense, it's a problematic sense. If it is common usage to tell oneself, I am a professor, this leaves completely open the question professor of what? If one tells oneself, among a thousand other identifications, I am a Frenchman, this presupposes the bracketing of everything the notion of belonging to France may represent. If you say I am a Cartesian, in most cases you haven't got a clue about what M. Descartes said because you have probably never opened him. When you say I am the one who has clear ideas, one has to ascertain why. When you say I am the one who has character, the whole world may rightly ask which one? And when you say I always tell the truth, well then, you're not afraid.

It's this relation to the signifier that determines the accent that the first part of the sentence, Thou art the one who . . ., will have for the subject according as the signifying part has been conquered and assumed or on the contrary verworfen, rejected by him.

I still want to give you some more examples before I leave you.

If I say to someone tu es celui qui dois venir, thou art the one who must come, the background of signifiers that this presupposes is no longer there if I say Tu es celui qui doit arriver, Thou art the one who must arrive, since this is simply to say that you will arrive, and this leaves it to be supposed – Yes, but in what state![25]

Tu es celui qui veux ce qu'il veut, Thou art the one who wantst what he wants, means You are an obstinate little person. Tu es celui qui veut ce qu'il veut, Thou art the one who wants what he wants, means You are the one who knows how to want. It is not necessarily a question of being the one who wilt follow me or not follow me, thou art the one who will follow his path to the end.

Tu es celui qui sais ce qu'il dit, Thou art the one who knowst what he is saying, isn't the one who will follow his path to the end.

The importance of these distinctions is to show that the change of emphasis, the fullness that thou confers on the other, which is also what he gets back, is essentially linked to the signifier. 319

What happens when the signifier in question, the organizing center, the point of significant convergence that it constitutes, is evoked but fails to appear [fait défaut]?

We can both deduce this from this approach and see it confirmed in our experience.

It's enough to situate our formula on the schema I have given you as being that of speech.[26] Thou art the one who wilt follow me everywhere. Naturally, the S and the O are always reciprocal, and insofar as the message we receive is that of the other that founds us, the O is at the level of the thou, the little o' at the level of who . . . me, and the S at the level of wilt follow.

What happens if the signifier which gives the sentence its weight and the thou its emphasis is lacking? if this signifier is heard, but nothing in the subject is able to respond to it? The function of the sentence is then reduced solely to the significance of the thou, a free signifier that is nowhere pinned down. There is no elective thou. The thou is precisely he to whom I address myself, nothing else. If I say Thou art, the thou is the one who dies.[27] This is exactly what one observes in Schreber's interrupted sentences, which stop precisely at the moment at which a signifier that remains problematic is on the point of emerging, charged with a definite meaning, but one doesn't know which – a paltry, derisory meaning, which indicates the gap, the hole, where nothing meaningful is able to respond in the subject.

It is precisely insofar as this signifier is interpellated, evoked, involved, that there emerges around it the pure and simple apparatus of the relation to the other, the empty muttering – Thou art the one who. . . . This is the very model of the interrupted sentence of President Schreber who, of course, produces the other's presence, made all the more radical, all the more radically other, by the fact that there is nothing that places him at a level of the signifier with which the subject would in any way be in harmony. Schreber states it – if the Other abandons him for one instant, drops him, a veritable decomposition occurs. This decomposition of the signifier occurs around a point of interpellation constituted by the lack, the disappearance, the absence of a certain signifier to the extent that at a given moment it is interpellated as such.

320 Let's suppose that it's a question of wilt follow me. All meanings nearby will be evoked, there will be I shall be ready, I shall be obedient, I shall be dominated, I shall be frustrated, I shall be whisked away, I shall be alienated, I shall be influenced. But the wilt follow in the full sense won't be there.

Which meaning is it that, in the case of President Schreber, has been drawn near to like this? Which signifier has thus been interpellated, the lack of which has produced such an upheaval in a man who till then had come to terms with the apparatus of language perfectly well, insofar as he establishes a normal relation with his fellows? Which is the signifier whose absence can explain how this constant repetition of speech becomes for him the elective mode of relating to another, how otherness is reduced to the unique register of absolute otherness, breaking, dissipating the otherness of all the other beings in his surroundings?

This is the question we shall stop at today.

I point out to you here and now, so as not to leave you completely up in the air, the direction in which we shall be looking. The key words, the signifying words of Schreber's delusion, soul murder, nerve-contact, voluptuousness, blessedness, and a thousand other terms, revolve around a fundamental signifier, which is never mentioned and whose presence is in command, is determinant. He says it himself. I shall give you an indication and, to reassure you by showing you that we are in our own domain, I shall tell you that in Schreber's entire work his father is cited only once.

This is on the subject of his most well-known, if not his most important, work, which is called Manual of Bedroom Gymnastics.[28] It's a book that I did everything to obtain, full of little diagrams. The only time Schreber mentions his father by name is when he goes and looks in this book to see whether what the voices tell him about the typical position of men and women when they make love really is true. You will admit that it is an amusing idea to go in search of this in a Manual of Bedroom Gymnastics. Everyone knows that love is an ideal sport, but all the same.

However amusing this way of approaching it may be, this must nevertheless put you on the track of what, after having approached, from the direction of the coherence of the sentence, the problem of what results from a certain lack at the level of the signifier, I shall bring along for you next time.

The highway and the signifier "being a father"

Thou art the one who followst me the best.
Thou art the one who follows me like a little dog.
Thou art the one who did follow me that day.
Thou art the one who didst follow me through trials.
Thou art the one who followst the law . . . the text.
Thou art the one who follows the mob.
Thou art the one who didst follow me.
Thou art the one who did follow me.
Thou art the one who art.
Thou art the one who is.[1]

Your trade of psychoanalyst is well worth your pausing for a moment at what speaking means.[2] Though it's of a slightly different nature, this is an exercise that borders on mathematical games, which are never given enough attention, for they have always been used for training the mind.

Here, this goes beyond a bit of entertainment. This isn't something that can be totally objectified, formalized. This is at the level of what conceals itself, it's here that you pause the least willingly, and yet it's here that is found the essential in what happens when you are in a relationship with the discourse of another.

Let's pick up from where we had got to last time, with the future tense of the verb to follow – Thou art the one who wilt follow me, Thou art the one who will follow me.

We began to punctuate the genuine double senses that arise according as 322 one passes through the screen of the one who or not. The demonstrative is nothing other than the famous third person. In all languages this person is made out of demonstratives, and this is the reason it's not a person of the verb. There remain the two other persons, the thou to whom I address myself and in the background the presence of an ego more or less presenced – I would even say invoked, provided we give this term its full sense.

[1] "Tu es celui qui me suis le mieux," "Tu es celui qui me suit comme un petit chien," "Tu es celui qui me suivait ce jour-là," "Tu es celui qui me suivais à travers les épreuves," "Tu es celui qui suis la loi . . . le texte," "Tu es celui qui suit la foule," "Tu es celui qui m'as suivi," "Tu es celui qui m'a suivi," "Tu es celui qui es," "Tu es celui qui est."

[2] "ce que parler veut dire"; this also means the exact value of what is said.

I emphasized the opposition that exists between the character of inevitability, the simple observation, of Thou art the one who will follow me in the third person, and the mandate, the delegation, the interpellation, that can be heard in Thou art the one who wilt follow me. I could equally have contrasted prediction and foresight, a difference that is perceptible only in a sentence embodying the message. If we abstractify, prediction becomes something different.

Thou art the one who didst follow me and Thou art the one who did follow me offer an analogous divergence. The tense of the verb isn't solely reducible to the consideration of past, present, and future, it's involved in quite a different way when the second person is there. I should say that in the former case, where the didst follow me is in the second person, an action in time is involved, a temporalized action, considered in the act of being accomplished. In the other, Thou art the one who did follow me, it's a perfect tense, a completed thing, so much so that one may even say that it borders on a definition – Of the others, thou art the one who did follow me.

There is without any doubt a rule here, but one needs to give numerous examples of it if one is to succeed in grasping it. The difference between Thou art the one who followst me the best and Thou art the one who follows me like a little dog is there to enable you to have a go at the exercises that follow, what it is appropriate to put in the spaces.

Thou art the one who did follow me that day. Thou art the one who, at one time, didst follow me through trials. Between these two expressions there is all the difference that there is between constancy and faithfulness. Let's even say, if the word constancy is perhaps ambiguous, all the difference between permanence and faithfulness.

The me doesn't need to be there. Thou art the one who followst the law, Thou art the one who followst the text seem to me to be inscribed differently from Thou art the one who follows the mob, while being perfectly valid sentences from the point of view of the signifier, that is, as organic groups whose significant value is organized from the beginning to the conclusion.

MR. PUJOL – They're not identified phonetically, but only orthographically.

323 These grouped examples don't seem to me to be too contrived to be valid. These differences don't exist without a reason.

M. PUJOL – In Tu es celui qui m'as suivi, Thou art the one who didst follow me, it's the other who inserts the s, it's not the speaker.

Here you've come to the heart of the matter, in taking up what I've just indicated – that this thou to whom I address myself from the place I myself am in as Other with a big O is in no way my pure and simple correlate. These examples demonstrate that there is something else beyond the thou, which is the ego that sustains the discourse of the one who follows me when he follows my speech, for example. It's precisely the greater or lesser intensity, the greater or lesser presence of this ego, that decides between the two forms. Of course, it's he who sanctions, and it's because the sanctioning depends on him that we're applying ourselves to these examples. This ego is beyond this thou art the one, which is the mode in which he is called to orientate himself. In one case it's he who is going to follow, and in effect the words the one becomes null and void – he will follow, he will follow, it's he who will follow. In the other, it's not he who is in question, it's I.

In a word, it's a matter of showing you that the support of this you, whatever form it takes in my experience, is an ego, the ego expressing it, but that the ego can never be taken to sustain it completely. Whenever I make an appeal to the other via this message, this delegation, whenever I explicitly designate him as the one who must act, the one who is to act, but even more, as the one to whom I announce what he is going to be, no doubt I sustain him but there remains something completely uncertain and problematic in this fundamental communication, which is the announcement, not to say the annunciation.

The I is essentially fleeting in nature and never entirely sustains the thou.

Indeed it's one of the most profound characteristics of the mental foundation of the Judaeo-Christian tradition that against it speech clearly profiles the being of the I as its ultimate ground. On all the essential questions the subject always finds himself in a position, summoned, to justify himself as I. The I who says, I am the one who am, this I, absolutely alone, is the one who radically sustains the thou in his interpellation. That's all the difference there is between the god of the tradition we come from and the god of the Greek tradition. I wondered whether the Greek god is capable of proffering himself 324 in the mode of any I. Would he say, I am the one who is? This is out of the question, however. The super-attenuated form of the Greek god isn't something that there is any reason to laugh at, or to believe that it's situated on the path to the atheistic disappearance of God. It's rather the god Voltaire was interested in to the point of regarding Diderot as a cretin, the god of deism, who is of the half-flesh, half-fish order of the I am the one who is.

Your minds won't readily dwell on the god of Aristotle, because this has become unthinkable for us. But still, try to get yourselves to meditate – a mode of this medeor I was speaking to you about last time, and which is the original verb of your medical function – for a second on what the relationship to the world might have been for a disciple of Aristotle's for whom God was the most immutable sphere in the sky. He isn't a god who announces himself through the word, like the one we were evoking a second ago. He is that part of the starry sphere that includes the fixed stars, he is that sphere in the world that doesn't move. This obviously involves a relationship to the other that to us is foreign and unthinkable and much more distant than the one put into play, for example, in the punitive fantasm [la fantaisie punitive].

Nobody dwells on this – it's because at the heart of the religious thought that has formed us there is the idea of making us live in fear and trembling, that the coloration of guilt is so fundamental in our psychological experience of the neuroses, without its being possible for all that to prejudge what they are in another cultural sphere. This coloration is even so fundamental that it was by its means that we explored the neuroses and noticed that they were structured in a subjective and intersubjective mode. This is why there is every reason to wonder whether the tradition that announces itself in the expression which is, we're told, flanked by a little tree on fire – I am the one who am, doesn't fundamentally bear upon our relationship to the other. We're not so far from our subject matter. It's a question of this in President Schreber – of a mode of constructing the Other-God.

The word atheism has quite a different sense for us from that which it could have had in a reference to the Aristotelian divinity, for example, where it's a question of a relationship to a superior entity [étant], to the supreme entity. Our own atheism is located in another perspective – it's linked to this always elusive aspect of the I of the other.

An other who announces himself as I am the one who am is by virtue of this sole fact a god beyond, a hidden god, and a god who under no circumstances unveils his face. Precisely from the Aristotelian perspective it could be said 325 that our own point of departure is already atheistic. This is an error, but from that perspective it's strictly true, and in our experience it's no less so. Whatever announces itself as I am the one who am is totally problematic, not sustained, and almost unsustainable, or only sustainable by an idiot.

Think about the I am of I am the one who am. This is what makes for the problematic nature of the relation to the other in our own tradition. It's also what in its own right characterizes our relationship to entities, to objects, and our own science – much more profoundly than its so-called experimental nature. The ancients didn't experiment any less than we do, they experimented on what interested them. This isn't the issue. It's in the way in which we place others, little others, in the light of the ultimate, absolute Other that we are distinctive in the way we fragment the world, break it down into pieces. The ancients on the other hand approached it as something that was graded on a scale of consistency of entities. Our position radically calls into question the very being of what announces itself as being, and not as an entity.[3]

We are no longer in a position to reply to him who says, I am the one who am. What are we to be able to reply to the one who am? We know only too well. A birdbrain – in fact we get lots of flights of these birdbrains coming in from the other side of the Atlantic – whom I met recently remarked to me – But still, all the same, I am me! To him that seemed to be the ultimate certainty. I assure you that I didn't instigate this, and that I wasn't there to make anti-psychological propaganda.

As a matter of fact, if there is one minimal thing that is obvious in experience – I won't say analytic experience, but simply in anyone's internal experience – it's that we are certainly even less the ones who are,[4] for being well aware what a racket, what frightful chaos permeated by various objurgations, we experience within ourselves at every turn, at every instant.

I've guided you by the hand long enough for you to perceive that speech, and especially this essential form of speech in which we announce ourselves as a thou, is a complex mode that is far from reducible to the intuition of two centers exchanging signals. As the relation of subject to subject is structured in a complex mode by the properties of language, the specific role the signifier plays in it has to be located therein.

I would like to return to some simple properties of the said signifier. The radicalism I showed you on the subject of the relation of subject to subject extends to an investigation proceeding in the direction of the Other as such, which shows that strictly speaking it cannot be grasped – it doesn't sustain, it can never totally sustain, the wager that we offer it. Inversely, the point of 326 view I am trying to maintain before you involves a certain materialism of the elements in question, in the sense that the signifiers are well and truly embodied, materialized, they are words that wander about and as such they play their role of fastening together.

To give you a rest, I shall now offer an analogy. An analogy is not an argument,[5] but the examples I have used have been of a rigorous quality, like this first scene of Athaliah, where I showed you that the development consisted in substituting for the interlocutor, Abner, the fear of God, which has no more of a relationship to the fears and the voice of Abner than has the didst follow me.

An aside. I recently happened to read an article in English on Racine which defines the originality of his tragedy by the claim that he had the art, the skill, to introduce into this setting, almost without his public's knowledge, characters of high whoredom.[6] You see the distance between Anglo-Saxon culture and our own. The fundamental mark of Andromaque, Iphigénie, etc. is whoredom. It is pointed out in passing that Freudians have made an extraordinary discovery in Racine's tragedies. I haven't yet noticed this, I'm sorry to say. It's true that in the wake of Freud one has sought exemplification of a certain number of analytic relations in the plays of Shakespeare, and not without some self-satisfaction. But as for our own cultural references, they have been slow to appear. It may be time to start, one might perhaps find something to illustrate, as I did last time, the problems that have arisen over the use of the signifier.

[4] "sommes," first-person plural.

[5] "Comparison n'est pas raison," a French proverb.

[6] See "The Agency of the Letter in the Unconscious or Reason Since Freud," E, 503 n.1 / 176 n.17. The reference is to a book review by Geoffrey Brereton, "Keeping up with Racine," New Statesman and Nation, Saturday May 19, 1956, p. 575. Brereton's term is "extreme bitchery."

Let's turn to an example I want to give you to get you to understand the gravity, the inertia specific to the signifier in the field of relations with the Other.

The road, now there's a signifier worth taking as such – the road, the highway you travel down in your various means of locomotion, the road that goes from Mantes to Rouen, for example. I won't say Paris, which is a special case.

The existence of a highway between Mantes and Rouen is a fact that all on its own presents itself to the researcher's meditation.

Suppose that – as happens in the south of England, where you have these 327 highways only in an exceedingly parsimonious way – to get from Mantes to Rouen you have to go via a series of minor roads, such as the one that goes from Mantes to Vernon, then from Vernon to wherever. Having had this experience is enough to make one aware that a succession of minor roads and a highway are not at all the same thing. Not only does it slow you down in practice, but it completely changes the meaning of your behavior concerning what happens between the point of departure and the point of arrival – a fortiori, if you imagine an entire region covered by a network of minor roads without a highway anywhere.

The highway is something that exists in itself and is immediately recognizable. When you emerge from a path, a thicket, a shoulder, or a minor local road, you know immediately that you have come to a highway. The highway isn't something that extends from one point to another, it's a dimension spread out in space, the presencing of an original reality.

If I take the highway as an example, it's because, as Monsieur de la Palice would say, it's a path of communication.[7]

[7] Une vérité de Monsieur de la Palice is a purely formal truth which is amusing because self-evident.

You may get the impression that there is a banal metaphor here, that the highway is only a means of going from one point to another. Mistake.

A highway is not at all the same as the track made by the movement of elephants through an equatorial forest. As important, so it seems, as these tracks are, they are nothing other than the passage of elephants. Undoubtedly this isn't nothing, since it's supported by the physical reality of elephantine migrations. Moreover, this passage has a direction. I don't know whether these pathways lead, as is sometimes claimed, to cemeteries, which appear to be quite mythical – it seems that they're rather bone depots – but the elephants certainly don't languish about their roads. The difference between the highway and the elephant track is that we stop along ours – and the Parisian experience comes to the foreground – we stop along the way to the point of forming agglomerations and rendering these places of passage so viscous as to be virtually impassable.

A great many other things occur on highways.

It sometimes happens that we take a trip down the highway intentionally and on purpose so as then to turn around and come back again. This movement of departure and return is also quite essential, and it puts us on the track of the evident fact that the highway is a site around which not only all sorts of dwellings, of places of abode, agglomerate but which also, qua signifier, polarizes meanings.

Houses are built alongside the highway, and they rise up and spread out 328 with no other function than to be looking out at the highway. It's precisely because the highway is an undeniable signifier in human experience that it marks a stage in history.

The Roman road, the road taken and named as such, has in human experience quite a different consistency from those paths, those trails, even the ones with staging posts, of rapid communication, that in the East succeeded for a time in holding empires together. Everything touched by the Roman road adopted a style that goes much further than what is immediately accessible as an effect of the highway. Wherever it went, it left traces that are practically irremovable. Roman imprints, with everything that developed around them, are essential – as are, moreover, interhuman relationships of law, the mode of transmitting the written thing, as well as the mode of promoting the human appearance, statues. M. Malraux may rightly say that there is nothing to retain in Roman sculpture from the point of view of the eternal art museum, it remains no less true that the very notion of a human being is linked to the vast diffusion of statues in Roman sites.

The highway is thus a particularly tangible example of what I'm saying when I speak of the function of the signifier insofar as it polarizes meanings, hooks onto them, groups them in bundles. There is a real antinomy between the function of the signifier and the induction it exerts on the grouping of meanings. The signifier polarizes. It's the signifier that creates the field of meanings.

Compare three maps in a large atlas.

On a map of the physical world you will see things inscribed in nature, ready to play a role, certainly, but still in their natural state. Compare a political map – there you will find, in the form of traces, of alluvion, of sediments, the entire history of human meanings maintaining themselves in a kind of equilibrium and tracing out these enigmatic lines that are the political boundaries of lands. Take a map of the major paths of communication and see how a road that runs through countries linking one river basin to another, one plain to another, crossing a mountain chain, crossing bridges, organizing itself, has been traced out from South to North. You will notice that it's this map that best expresses the role of the signifier in man's relationship to the land.

Don't act like the person who marvelled at the fact that water courses pass precisely through towns. It would be proof of analogous foolishness not to see that towns have formed, crystallized, been established at road junctions.
329 It's where they cross, with a bit of fluctuation moreover, that what becomes a center of meanings, a human agglomeration, a town, comes about historically, with all that is imposed upon it by this dominance of the signifier.

What happens when we don't have a highway and we are forced to combine minor paths, more or less separate modes of grouping meaning, with one another when we go from one point to another? To go from this point to that point we shall have a choice between different components of the network, we can take this route, or that route, for various reasons – for the sake of convenience, in order to roam, or simply because of a mistake at a crossroads.

Several things can be deduced from this, which explain Schreber's delusion to us.

Which signifier is it that is in abeyance in his inaugural crisis? It's the signifier procreation in its most problematic form, the one that Freud himself evokes in relation to obsessionals, which isn't the form being a mother but the form being a father.

This is an appropriate place to pause for a moment to think about the fact that the function of being a father is absolutely unthinkable in human experience without the category of the signifier.

What can it mean to be a father? You are familiar with the learned discussions, ethnological or other, one immediately enters into to establish whether primitives who say that women conceive when they're placed in such and such a spot possess the scientific notion that women become fertilized once they have duly copulated. These inquiries have nevertheless seemed to some to be perfectly foolish, since it's difficult to conceive of human animals stupid enough to fail to notice that when one wants to have kids one has to copulate. This is not the point. The point is that the sum of these facts – of copulating with a woman, that she then carries something within her womb for a certain period, that this product is finally expelled – will never lead one to constitute the notion of what it is to be a father. I'm not even speaking about the entire cultural cluster implied in the term being a father, I'm simply speaking of what it is to be a father in the sense of procreation.

A rebound effect is necessary for the fact that man copulates to receive the sense it really has, but to which no imaginary access is possible, that the child is as much his as the mother's. And for this effect of action in return to occur, the elaboration of the notion of being a father must have been raised by work that has taken place through an entire cluster of cultural exchanges to the state of major signifier, and this signifier must have its own consistency and status. The subject may well know that copulating is really at the origin of procreation, but the function of procreation as a signifier is something else.

I grant you that I haven't yet completely lifted the veil – I'll leave that for 330 next time. In order for procreation to have its full sense there must also be, in both sexes, an apprehension, a relation with the experience of death, which gives the term to procreate its full sense. Moreover, paternity and death are two signifiers that Freud links in relation to obsessionals.

The signifier being a father is what creates the highway in sexual relations with a woman. If the highway doesn't exist, one finds oneself faced with a number of elementary minor paths, copulation and then the woman's pregnancy.

To all appearances President Schreber lacks this fundamental signifier called being a father. This is why he had to make a mistake, become confused, to the point of thinking of acting like a woman. He had to imagine himself a woman and bring about in pregnancy the second part of the path that, when the two were added together, was necessary for the function of being a father to be realized.

The experience of the couvade, as problematic as it seems to us, may be located as an uncertain, incomplete assimilation of the function of being a father. It does effectively answer to a need imaginarily – or ritually or otherwise – to realize the second part of the path.

To take my metaphor a little bit further I shall say to you – what do those who are called road-users do when there is no highway and it's a question of taking minor roads to go from one point to another? They follow the signs erected by the side of the road. That is, where the signifier isn't functioning, it starts speaking on its own, at the edge of the highway. Where there is no road, written words appear on signs. This, perhaps, is the verbal function of auditory verbal hallucinations – they are the signs along their little path.

If we suppose that the signifier continues on its way alone whether we pay attention to it or not, we must admit that within us, more or less eluded by the maintenance of the meanings that interest us, there is a kind of buzzing, a veritable pandemonium, which we have been bewildered by ever since childhood. Why not imagine that, at the precise moment at which the link between what Saussure calls the amorphous mass of the signifier and the amorphous mass of meanings and interests comes apart and is revealed to be deficient, the continuous current of the signifier once again assumes its independence? And then, in this buzzing that people who are hallucinating so often depict to you on this occasion, in this continuous murmur of these 331 sentences, of these commentaries, which are nothing but the infinity of these minor paths, the signifiers begin to talk, to sing on their own. The continuous murmur of these sentences, of these commentaries, is nothing other than the infinity of these minor paths.

There's still a chance that they will vaguely indicate the right direction.

Next time I shall try to show how everything that in delusion is orchestrated and organized according to different spoken registers reveals, in its layering and in its texture, the fundamental polarization of the suddenly encountered, suddenly observed, lack of a signifier.

"Thou art"

FORMS OF GAPS
THE VERB TO BE
FROM THE THOU TO THE OTHER
THE TORTOISE AND THE TWO DUCKS
THE ONSET OF PSYCHOSIS

I shall begin my little weekly discourse by telling you off – but when all is said and done, when I see you there, all so kindly lined up so late in the year, it's rather this verse that comes to mind – It's you who are the faithful ones. . . .

I shall nevertheless resume my plan again, which is related to the last meeting of the Société [française de psychanalyse].

It's clear that while the paths I take you down lead somewhere, they're not so well beaten that you have no difficulty in showing that you recognize the place where someone is moving along. Nevertheless this is no reason to keep quiet – even if it were only to show that you have some idea of the question. By speaking you might display some confusion, but you gain nothing from remaining silent. You will tell me that what you gain from it is that it's as a group that you act like duffers and that when all is said and done it's much more bearable in this form.

On this subject one can't but be struck by what certain philosophers, who are precisely those of the moment and to whom from time to time I discreetly refer, have formulated – that man, of all entities, is an open entity. The openness of being fascinates anyone who begins to think. This kind of panic statement that defines our time cannot fail to appear at certain moments as a balance to and a compensation for what the colloquial term bouché, duffer, expresses, namely, as is sententiously observed, a divorce between the prejudices of science where man is concerned and the experience of man in what is supposed to be his authenticity. These people strive to rediscover that 334 surely what is at the bottom of thought isn't the privilege of thinkers, but that in the slightest act of his existence the human being, however much he may err as to his own existence, nevertheless remains, precisely when he wishes to articulate something, an open being.

This is the level at which those who really think, who say it, are said to maintain themselves. Rest assured in any case that I'm not at this level, even though certain people try to circulate the contrary idea. At the very least, this isn't the level at which the reality in question is situated and conceptualized when we are exploring analytic matters.

No doubt it's impossible to say anything sensible about this, unless one resituates it in what we shall call the gaps of being. But these gaps have assumed certain forms, and this is where there is something valuable in analytic experience – it's surely in no way closed to the radically questioning and questionable side of the human position, but it contributes some determinants. Of course, to take these determinants as determined is to propel psychoanalysis down the path of the prejudices of science, which lets the entire essence of human reality escape. But by simply maintaining things at this level, and not placing them too high, either, it is possible to give our experience the right tone of what I call mediocre reason.

Next year – François Perrier's lecture propelled me into this, as I wasn't sure what I would do – I shall take as the theme of the seminar the object relation or purported relation. Perhaps I shall introduce this by a comparison between the objects of phobia and fetishes, two series of objects. You can already see straight off how different they are in their catalogue.

Regarding the way I have introduced these lessons on the signifier someone said to me – You start from a long way off, no doubt, it's tiring, one doesn't properly see what it is that you're driving at, but still, retrospectively, one can see that there was some relationship between what you started with and where you ended up. This way of putting things proves that nothing is lost in going back over the same ground one more time.

The question is restricted. I'm not claiming to be covering the entire subject of a thing as enormous as the case of President Schreber, or, a fortiori, 335 the field of paranoia in its entirety. I claim to be throwing light on only a small field. I'm applying myself to certain phenomena without reducing them to a mechanism foreign to them, without forcing them into the categories currently in use, into the Psychology chapter of the philosophy program. I'm trying to refer them to slightly more elaborate notions concerning the reality of language. I claim that this effort is of a kind to allow the question of origins, in the precise sense of the determinism of or of the occasion for the onset of psychosis, to be raised otherwise, which will ultimately include entirely etiological determinations.

I ask the question – what is required in order that it speak [ça parle]?

This is in effect one of the most essential phenomena of psychosis. Expressing it thus is already of a kind to remove some false problems, namely those that are raised when one says that in psychosis the id [le ça] is conscious. We increasingly dispense with this reference, about which Freud always said that, literally, no one knew where to place it. From the economic point of view nothing is more uncertain than its effect – it's entirely contingent. We are therefore placing ourselves squarely in the Freudian tradition in saying that after all the only thing that we have to think through is that it [ça] speaks.

It speaks. But why does it speak? Why is it that, for the subject himself, it speaks? Why is it that it presents itself as speech, and that it, not he, is this speech? We've already raised this question at the level of the thou, of the distant thou as someone pointed out to me, which I was getting at in trying to symbolize the signifier through the example of the highway. We shall return to this thou point once again, since it was also upon this that the progress we made last time, as well as certain of the objections that were made to me, were centered.

Let's pause at this thou, if there is any truth whatsoever in my claim that the originary apprehension of what I am leading you towards and asking you to give some reflection to must be located around a thorough study of its function.

Last time someone made the grammatical objection to me that there was something arbitrary in bringing together Thou art the one who wilt follow me and Thou art the one who will follow me, the elements not being homologous. It's not the same the one in question in the two cases, since the former could also be elided, leaving Thou wilt follow me.

One may make the initial observation that Thou wilt follow me is a commandment. Thou art the one who wilt follow me, if we understand it in its full sense, isn't a commandment but a mandate. It implies, in the presence of the other, something expanded that presumes presence. An entire universe instituted by discourse is presumed here, within which thou art the one who wilt follow me. 336

Let's begin by pausing first at this thou, making the remark, which looks self-evident but is rather rare, that the said thou has no literal meaning.

This isn't merely because I address it indifferently to everyone – as a matter of fact I address it to myself as well as to you, and virtually to all kinds of things, I may thou something that is as foreign as is possible to me, I can say thou to an animal, I can say thou to an inanimate object – this isn't the point. Look closely at the formal, grammatical aspect of the thing. This is, moreover, what every kind of usage of the signifier comes down to for you. You will place meanings there despite yourselves. One may say that you believe in grammar! Your entire schooling amounts, as intellectual gain, to your having been made to believe in grammar. To be sure, you weren't told as much, since the aim would not have been achieved.

Let's therefore pause at some sentences like the following – If you poke your nose outside you'll get shot down. Or again – When you see the bridge you turn right.[1] Here the you doesn't have the subjective value of any reality of the other whatsoever, it's entirely equivalent to a site or a point – it introduces a condition or temporality, it has the value of a conjunction.

This may seem rash to you, but I assure you that if you spoke a bit of Chinese you would be convinced of it. One can have a lot of fun with Chinese characters, with this one for example, which is the sign for a woman and the sign for a mouth. The you is someone one addresses oneself to in giving him an order, that is, as befits speaking to women. One may say a thousand other things, so let's not delay, and let's stay with the you. The you may be used in this form to formulate the expression as if, and in another form it's used unambiguously to formulate a when or an if, introducing a conditional.

If this thing is less apparent in our languages, and if we have some resistance to understanding it and to acknowledging it in the examples I've just given, this is solely a function of the prejudices of grammar, which prevent you from hearing. The artifices of etymological and grammatical analysis force you to insert the second person singular into this you. Of course, it is the second person singular, but it's a matter of knowing what it's used for. In other words, our you is related to elements existing in languages that are 337 described as having no inflection and that for us have the advantage of serving to open up our minds a bit. They do in fact have particles at their disposal, which are the curious signifiers whose usage, like that of our you, is singularly multiple and sometimes so broad as to create a degree of confusion in our descriptive grammars. Moreover, one would only need to write the least bit phonetically to observe that differences in tonality or accent of the signifier you have effects that go entirely beyond the identification of the person and are completely different from this from the point of view of meaning.

Attributing autonomy to the you as signified isn't without its difficulties. Let's say that in general it has the value of an introduction, of a protasis as we say, that which is placed before. This is the most general way of designating what precedes the statement [énoncé] of what it is that gives the sentence its importance.

There would be many other things to say about this if we went into the details. Much use would have to be made of expressions like this you've only got to . . . which we use to get rid of our interlocutor. It's something that has so little to do with only that the lapsus quite spontaneously slides into to do this. It's turned into something that declines, that is inflected – the you've only got to . . . does not have the value of reducing this something that allowed some very enlightening semantic remarks.

What's important is that you grasp that the you is a long way from having a univocal value and is therefore a long way from permitting us to hypostatize the other. The you is in the signifier what I call a way of hooking the other, of hooking him in discourse, of fastening meaning to him. It should in no way be confused with the allocutor, that is, he to whom one is speaking. This is obvious, as it's very often absent. In imperatives, where the allocutor is implied in the most manifest of ways, and around which a certain register of language known as the simple locutory has been defined, the you doesn't appear. There is a sort of limit that begins at the signal – I mean the articulated signal. Fire! is undeniably a sentence, and one only has to utter it to appreciate that this is something that provokes a reaction. Then there is the imperative Come here! which necessitates nothing. One stage further on and the you is implicated, for example, in that order in the future tense I was speaking about before, this you which is a hooking-up [accrochage] in discourse, a way of situating it in the curve of meaning that Saussure represents for us, parallel to this curve of the signifier.[2] The you is the hooking of the other in the waters of meaning.

In the final analysis, if we pursue our apprehension, or our metaphor, to its radical end, this term that is used to identify the other at a point in these waters is a form of punctuation.

Reflect on this fact, which is made particularly evident in unsectioned lan- 338 guages, that punctuation is what plays the most decisive role of hooking up, so much so that a classical text may vary in its entirety according as you place it at one point or another. I would even say that this variability is used to increase the richness of interpretation, the variety in the sense of a text. All those interventions known as commentaries in relation to traditional texts play precisely upon the way punctuation is apprehended or fixed in any given case.

The question is this – if the you is a signifier, a punctuation by which the other is secured at a point of meaning, what is required to elevate it to subjectivity? This you, unsecured in the substratum of discourse, in its pure carriage – this you, which by itself isn't so much what designates the other as what enables us to act upon him, but which also is always present in us in a state of suspension, comparable in every way to these otoliths I spoke about the other day, which enable us, with a bit of guile, to conduct little crustaceans about at will with an electromagnet[3] – this you which for us, insofar as we leave it free and in suspension within our own discourse, is always liable to exercise this conduction about which we can do nothing but oppose it and respond to it – what is required to elevate this you to subjectivity so that, in its form as signifier, present in discourse, it becomes the supposed support of something that is comparable to our ego and yet isn't our ego, that is to say, the myth of an other?

This is the question that interests us, since it isn't so astonishing to hear people speaking their internal discourse out loud in the manner of psychotics, a little bit more than we do ourselves. The phenomena of flight of ideas were observed long ago. They're comparable to the testimony we gather from a psychotic in every way, except that the subject doesn't believe himself to be under the influence of a scrambling device.

We shall simply say that this you presupposes an other who, in short, is beyond him. How does this come about? Our next step should be situated around an analysis of the verb to be.[4]

We can't exhaust everything proposed to us concerning the analysis of this 339 verb to be by the philosophers who have centered their meditation on the question of Dasein, and especially Mr. Heidegger, who has begun to consider it from the grammatical and etymological angle in texts that are quite faithfully expounded in several articles that Monsieur Jean Wahl has recently devoted to them.

Mr. Heidegger attaches a great deal of importance to the signifier at the level of the analysis of the word and of conjugation, as it's usually called – let us more accurately say declension. In German as in French this famous verb to be is far from being a simple verb and even from being one single verb. It's evident that the form suis, am, doesn't come from the same root as es, art, est, is, êtes, [you] are, and as fut, [it] was, nor is there any strict equivalence to the form été, been. Whereas fut has an equivalent in Latin, as does suis and the series of est, été comes from another source, from stare. The distribution is equally different in German where sind, [they] are, is grouped with bist, art, whereas in French the second person is grouped with the third. Three roots have been more or less uncovered for all the European languages, those that correspond to sommes, [we] are, est and fut, which has been compared with the root phusis in Greek, which is related to the idea of life and growth. As to the others, Mr. Heidegger insists upon the two aspects, Sten which would be closer to stare, to stand alone, and Verbahen, to last, to endure, this sense being nevertheless attached to the source phusis. According to Mr. Heidegger, the idea of standing erect, the idea of life and the idea of lasting, enduring, is therefore what an etymological analysis combined with a grammatical analysis yields, and it's out of a kind of reduction or of indetermination cast over these senses as a whole that the notion of being emerges.

I summarize, so as to give you some idea of the thing. I must say that an analysis of this order is rather inclined to elide, to mask, what Mr. Heidegger is trying to initiate us into, namely that which is absolutely irreducible in the function of the verb to be, the copulatory function pure and simple. One would be mistaken to think that this function is disclosed through a gradual shift in direction of these various terms.

We raise this question – at what moment and by what mechanism does the you, such as we have defined it as a form of punctuation, as an indeterminate signifying mode of hooking on, achieve subjectivity? Well then, I believe that it's essentially when it's taken in the copulatory function in pure form and in the ostensive function. And it's for this reason that I chose the exemplary sentences that we started with – thou art the one who. . . .

Which element is it that, elevating the you, makes it go beyond its indeterminate function of boredom and begins to turn it, if not into subjectivity, then at least into something that constitutes a first step towards the Thou art the one who wilt follow me? It is the It is thou who will follow me. This is ostension, which in fact implies the presence of the assembly of all those who, whether or not united into a community, are supposed to form its body, to 340 be the support of the discourse in which ostension is inscribed. This it is thou corresponds to the second formula, namely, thou art the one who will follow me.

Thou art the one who will follow me presupposes, I am saying, the imaginary assembly of those who are the supports of the discourse, the presence of witnesses, indeed, of the tribunal before which the subject receives the warning or the opinion that he is called upon to reply to. As a matter of fact, unless he replies I follow you, that is, unless he complies, there is at this level no other response open to the subject than to maintain the message in the very state in which it was sent to him, at the very most modifying the person, than to inscribe it as an element of his internal discourse, which whether he likes it or not is what he has to reply to in order not to follow it. It would strictly speaking be necessary that he precisely not follow this indication at all onto the terrain where it calls on him to reply, that is, that he refuse to hear. He is taken there as soon as he hears. The refusal to hear is a force that no subject, without special gymnastic training, is really capable of. It's in this register that the particular force of discourse becomes apparent.

In other words, at the level we have come to the you is the other such as I cause him to be seen [le fais voir] by means of my discourse, such as I designate him or denounce him, he is the other insofar as he is captured in ostension in relation to this everybody that the universe of discourse presupposes. But by the same token I bring the other out of this universe, I objectify him within it, I may even designate his object relations for him, should he so much as ask me to, as is characteristic of the neurotic. That may go quite a long way.

Notice that it's not entirely useless to give people what they ask for. It's just a question of whether it's beneficial. In fact, if this has any incidental effect, it's insofar as it helps him to complete his vocabulary. Those who operate with object relations believe they are actually designating them, and consequently it's only rarely, and then by pure chance, that any beneficial effect is produced. Completing his vocabulary may enable the subject to extract himself from the signifying entanglement that constitutes the symptomatology of his neurosis. This is why things worked better whenever this addition to the vocabulary, this Nervenanhang, to use the vocabulary of our delusional, had still retained some of its freshness. Since then, what we have at our disposal in our little exercise books as Nervenanhang has greatly fallen in value and doesn't quite fill the function that one might hope for concerning the resubjectification of the subject, by which I designate the operation of extracting oneself from this signifying entanglement in which we have out-341 lined the essence and very forms of the neurotic phenomenon. To handle this object relation correctly, one would need to understand that in this relation it's the neurotic who is ultimately the object. It's even for this reason that he got lost as subject and seeks himself as an object.

We have come to the point at which there is no common measure between ourselves and this you such as we have brought it out. There is ostension necessarily followed by reabsorption, injunction followed by disjunction. In order to have an authentic relationship with the other at this level and on this plane, he must answer, Thou art the one whom I follow. Here we are on his wavelength, and it's he who guides our desire.

Tu es celui que je suis lends itself to a play on words.[5] It's the relationship of identification with the other that is involved, but if we in fact guide one another in our reciprocal identification towards our desire, we shall necessarily encounter one another there, and we shall encounter one another in an incomparable way, since it's insofar as I am you that I am – here the ambiguity is complete. Je suis isn't only to follow, it's also Je suis, et toi, tu es, I am and thou art, and also, toi, celui qui, thou, the one who, to the point of encountering, me tueras, wilt kill me. When the other is captured as an object in the relation of ostension, we can only encounter this relation as a subjectivity equivalent to our own on the imaginary plane, the plane of the moi ou toi, I or thou, one or the other, all confusion is possible concerning the object relation. The object of our love is only ourselves, it's the tu es celui qui me tues, thou art the one who kilst me.

Observe the fortunate opportunity that the signifier offers us in French, with the different ways of understanding tu es.[6] One can make use of it indefinitely. If I were to say to you that we do this all day long – instead of saying, To be or not . . . to be or. . . ,[7] one may say, Tu es celui qui me . . . tu es. . . , Thou art the one who . . . me . . . thou art. . . , etc. This is the foundation of the relationship with the other. In all imaginary identification, the tu es, thou art, ends in the destruction of the other, and vice versa, because this destruction is simply there in the form of transference and hides itself in what we shall call thouness.

In this respect I could have brought you a particularly disheartening and stupid analysis of the type to be found in the famous Meaning of Meaning, which elevates this kind of drivel to giddy heights.[8] Similarly for this famous passage in which it's a matter of urging people who have the beginnings of virtue to have at least the consistency to finish the job. One of them says something like this – Toi qui ne peux supporter le tu, tue-moi, Thou who canst not bear the thou, kilst me. This is a reasonable idea – if you can't bear the truth of the thou, you can always be designated for what you are, namely a scoundrel. If you want your neighbors' respect, raise yourself to the notion of normal distances, that is, to a general notion of the other, the order of the world, and the law. This thou seems to have disconcerted commentators, and as a matter of fact I think that today's thouness will familiarize you with the 342 register in question.

Let's take the next step. It concerns the other's being recognized as an other. What, then, is required for the other to be recognized as an other? What is this other? He is the other insofar as he figures in a sentence of mandate. We have to pause at this for a moment.

Recognition of the other doesn't constitute an unattainable limit, since we have also seen that the disappearing otherness of the ego's imaginary identification only encounters the you at an extreme point at which neither is able to subsist together with the other. The Other, with a big O, has to be recognized beyond this relationship, even reciprocal relationship, of exclusion. It has to be recognized in this disappearing relation as being just as elusive as I. In other words, it must be invoked as what it is unaware of about itself. This is indeed the sense of Thou art the one who wilt follow me.

If you examine this closely, if Thou art the one who wilt follow me is a delegation, indeed a consecration, then it's insofar as the response isn't a play on words but an I follow you, I am,[9] I am what thou hast just said. There is a usage of the third person that is absolutely essential to discourse in that it designates what its very subject matter is, that is, what has been said. Je le suis, ce que tu viens de dire, I am it, what thou hast just said, which as it happens means exactly – I am very precisely what I am ignorant of, since what thou hast just said is absolutely indeterminate, I don't know where thou wilt lead me. The full response to the Thou art the one who wilt follow me is I am it.

[6] "Thou art" and "Kill."
[8] C. K. Ogden and I. A. Richards, The Meaning of Meaning.

You know the fable of the tortoise and the two ducks.[10] The tortoise turns up at the crucial moment when the ducks have offered to take him with them to America, and everybody is waiting to see this little tortoise stuck onto the traveler's staff – The Queen? says the tortoise, Oui, vraiment, je la suis, Yes, really, I am she. Pichon asks himself huge questions to discover whether it's a question of a queen in the abstract or a concrete queen and speculates, in a disconcerting way for someone who had a bit of finesse in grammatical and linguistic matters, on the question of whether she ought not to have said, Je suis elle. Had the tortoise been speaking of an existing queen, she could have said any number of things, for example, Je suis la reine, I am the Queen, but since she says Je la suis, in referring to what you have just spoken of, there is no distinction to be made, it suffices to know that this la, her, concerns what is implied in the discourse.

What is implied in the discourse is indeed what is at issue. We must pause for a moment at this inaugural speech of the dialogue and take stock of the enormity of the Thou art the one who wilt follow me. It's to the thou itself, as the unknown, that we address ourselves. This is what gives it its naturalness, 343 and its force as well, and also what makes it pass from thou art into the wilt follow of the second part, where it persists. It persists there precisely because in the meantime it may decline there. In this formula it's therefore not an I, insofar as I cause it to be seen, that I address myself to, but all the signifiers that make up the subject opposite me. I say all the signifiers he possesses, his symptoms included. We address ourselves both to his gods and to his demons, and for this reason this way of stating the sentence I have until now been calling the mandate I shall now call the invocation, with this term's religious connotations.

An invocation isn't an inert formula. It's that by which I get that faith which is mine to pass into the other. In good authors, perhaps in Cicero, an invocation in its original religious form is a verbal formula by means of which, before combat, one tries to make favorable to oneself what I was just calling the gods and demons, the enemy's gods, the signifiers. It's to them that the invocation is addressed, and this is why I think that the term invocation is suited to designate the most elevated form of the sentence, where all the words I pronounce are true words, evocative voices to which each of these sentences must reply, the insignia of the veritable other.

[9] "Je te suis, je suis."
[10] La Fontaine, "The Turtle and the Two Ducks," 97.

You have just seen how it is that the you depends upon the signifier as such. It's on the level of the vociferated signifier that depend the quality and the nature of the thou that is interpellated to respond. Henceforth, when the latter lacks the signifier that carries the sentence, the I am the one that replies to you can only play the part of an eternal interrogation. Thou art the one who . . . what? The limiting case is the reduction to the preceding signifier – Thou art the one who. . . , thou art the one who. . . , etc., Thou art the one who . . . kilst me.[11] The thou reappears indefinitely. This is how it is whenever, in the appeal proffered to the other, the signifier falls into the field which for the other is excluded, verworfen, unattainable. The signifier at this point produces a reduction, but an intensified one, to the pure imaginary relation.

This is precisely the point at which this so singular phenomenon is located that has had all the commentators on President Schreber scratching their heads – the puzzling soul murder, as he calls it.

This phenomenon, which for him is the signal of the onset of psychosis, may for the rest of us, the commentator-analysts, adopt all sorts of meanings, but it cannot be placed anywhere else than in the imaginary field. It relates 344 to the short-circuiting of the affective relation, which makes the other a being of pure desire who henceforth can only be, in the register of the human imaginary, a being of pure interdestruction. There is a purely dual relation here, which is the most radical source of the very register of aggressiveness. Freud didn't miss this, moreover, but he discussed it in the homosexual register. This text offers us a thousand proofs of what I am putting forward, and this is perfectly coherent with our definition of the source of aggressiveness and its emergence when the triangular, oedipal relation finds itself to be short-circuited, when reduced to its dual simplification.

Undoubtedly we lack the elements in the text that would enable us to get a better grasp of Schreber's relations with his father, with a certain presumed brother, whom Freud also makes a great deal of. But we don't need anything more to understand that it's necessarily via the purely imaginary relation that the register of the you must pass at the moment at which it's evoked, invoked, interpellated from the Other, from the field of the Other, by the emergence of a signifier that is primordial but excluded for the subject. I named this signifier last time – Thou art the one who is, or who will be, a father. As a signifier it can in no way be received, insofar as the signifier represents an indeterminate support around which there is grouped and condensed a number, not even of meanings, but of series of meanings, which come and converge by means of and starting from the existence of this signifier.

Before the Name-of-the-Father there was no father, there were all sorts of other things. If Freud wrote Totem and Taboo, it was because he thought he could glimpse what there was, but before the term father was instituted in a certain register historically there was certainly no father. I am only giving you this perspective as a pure concession, for it interests me in no manner or degree. I'm not interested in prehistory, except to indicate that it's fairly likely that Neanderthal man lacked a certain number of essential signifiers. There's no point in searching so far back, for we can observe this lack in subjects within our reach.

Observe this crucial moment carefully and you will be able to pick out this passage in the onset of every psychosis – it's the moment at which from the Other as such, from the field of the Other, there comes the interpellation of an essential signifier that is unable to be received.

In one of my case presentations I happened to show a West Indian whose family history brought out the problematics of the original ancestor. This was a Frenchman who had gone and introduced himself over there, a sort of pioneer, who had led an extraordinarily heroic life, involving all sorts of high-345 points and lowpoints in his fortunes, and who had become an ideal for the entire family. Our West Indian, extremely deracinated from the region of Detroit where he had been leading quite a comfortable life as a craftsman, found himself one day in possession of a woman who announced to him that she was going to have a baby. It wasn't known whether it was his or not, but nevertheless within several days his first hallucinations declared themselves.

Barely had it been announced to him, You are going to be a father when a character appeared to him telling him, You are Saint Thomas. It must have been, I think, Saint Thomas the Doubter and not Saint Thomas Aquinas. The annunciations that followed leave no room for doubt – they came from Elizabeth, the one to whom it was announced very late in life that she was going to bear a child.

In short, this case demonstrates very well the connection between the register of paternity and the blossoming of revelations, of annunciations regarding generation, namely, precisely what the subject is literally unable to conceive – and it's not by chance that I use this word. The question of generation, a term of alchemical speculation, is always there ready to emerge as a response by detour, as an attempt to reconstitute what isn't receivable for the psychotic subject, for the ego whose power is invoked without his being strictly speaking capable of a response.

Henceforth, beyond every signifier able to be significant for the subject, the only response can be the permanent and, I would say, constantly sensitized employment of the signifier as a whole. We can in fact observe that the memorizing commentary accompanying all human acts immediately finds itself revived, spoken out loud in the emptiest and the most neutral of forms, and becomes the ordinary mode of relation of an ego unable to find its respondent in the signifier at the level from which it's interpellated.

Precisely because he is interpellated on terrain where he is unable to respond, the only way to react that can reattach him to the humanization he is tending to lose is to make himself permanently present in this slender commentary on the stream of life that constitutes the text of mental automatism. The subject who has crossed this limit no longer has the customary significant security, except through the accompaniment of a constant commentary on his gestures and acts.

These phenomena present an exceedingly rich character in the case of President Schreber, but they are not specific to him since they enter into the very definition of mental automatism. This justifies the use of the word automatism, of which so much use has been made in mental pathology without one's really knowing what one was saying. The term has a fairly precise sense in neurology where it characterizes certain phenomena of liberation, but its employment by analogy in psychiatry remains problematic at the very least. It's nevertheless the most appropriate word in de Clérambault's theory if you 346 think of the distinction, completely forgotten today, that Aristotle makes between automaton and fortune.[12] If we go straight to the signifier, that is to say on this occasion with all the reservations that such a reference comprises, straight to etymology, we see that automaton is what really thinks by itself without any link to that beyond, the ego, which gives thought its subject. If language speaks all alone, the occasion to use the term automatism is now or never, and this is what gives the term de Clérambault used its resonance of authenticity, its satisfying side for us.

What we have just been emphasizing will enable us next time to see what is lacking in each of the two points of view developed by Freud and Mrs. Ida Macalpine.

Freud posits a latent homosexuality that is supposed to imply a feminine position – this is where the leap is. He speaks of a fantasy of fertilizing impregnation, as if the thing were self-evident, as if every acceptance of the feminine position implied in addition this register that is so developed in Schreber's delusion and that ends up making him into the wife of God. Freud's theory is that the only way for Schreber to avoid what results from the fear of castration is Entmannung, unmanning, or simply emasculation, transformation into a woman – but after all, as Schreber himself observes somewhere, isn't it better to be a spirited woman than a poor unfortunate man, oppressed, or even castrated?[13] In short, the solution to the conflict introduced by latent homosexuality is found in an enlargement to the size of the universe.

On the whole, Freud's theory is the one that best respects the balance of the psychosis's progress. It's nevertheless certain that Mrs. Macalpine's objections are a worthy reply to Freud, even a worthy complement to a part of his theory.[14] She emphasizes, as being determinant in the process of psychosis, a fantasy of pregnancy, thus evoking a rigorous symmetry between the two great lacks that can manifest themselves as neuroticizing in each sex. She goes a long way in this direction and says some very amusing things to which the text lends support, including in the background the evocation of a heliolithic civilization where the sun, regarded as feminine and incarnated in stones, is said to be the fundamental symbol matching the promotion of the phallus in classical theory. There is a correspondence in the very name of the town in which Schreber is hospitalized, Sonnenstein.[15]

In the concrete analyses of the least neurotic of people we are constantly 347 encountering this mischievous mockery by the signifier, where unusual homonyms from all the corners of the horizon strangely intersect and appear to give a unity, sometimes ungraspable by any other means, both to the entire destiny of a subject and to his symptoms. It's surely less appropriate here than elsewhere to retreat from this investigation where the moment of onset of psychosis is concerned.

Before I finish I would like to draw your attention to the significant, indeed unfortunate, words that Flechsig said to Schreber on the occasion of his relapse when the latter arrived for his consultation in an extremely disturbed state. Flechsig had already been elevated for him to the value of an eminent paternal character. The function of paternity had previously already been put on alert or in suspension. We know from his testimony that he had hoped to become a father, that over the period of eight years separating the first from the second crisis his wife had had several spontaneous abortions. Now, Flechsig said to him that since the previous occasion enormous progress has been made in psychiatry and that they are going to give him one of those short sleeps that will be very fertile.[16]

Perhaps this was just the thing not to say. From this moment our Schreber no longer slept and that night he tried to hang himself.

The relation of procreation is in fact implicated in the subject's relationship to death.

I shall keep this for next time.

PREVALENCE OF CASTRATION

IDA MACALPINE

NATURAL SYMBOLIZATION AND SUBLIMATION

THE RAINBOW

INSERTED IN THE FATHER

I'm not sure what to begin with to end this course. On the off chance, I've put two small schemas on the board for you.

The first is an old one. It's a sort of grid which I used at the start of this year to try to show you how the problem of delusion is raised if we want to structure it insofar as it appears to be a relation in some way linked to speech. The second of these schemas is entirely new and I will have occasion to refer to it shortly.

What I have put forward this year has been centrally concerned with placing the emphasis back upon the structure of delusion. Delusion may be regarded as a disturbance of the object relation and is therefore linked to a transference mechanism. But I wanted to show you that all its phenomena, and I even think I can say its dynamics, would be clarified in reference to the functions and structure of speech. This will also free this transference mechanism from all kinds of confused and diffuse object relations.

By hypothesis, whenever one deals with a disturbance regarded overall as immature, one refers to a linear developmental series derived from the immaturity of the object relation. Now, experience shows that this unilinearity leads to impasses, to inadequate, unmotivated explanations that superimpose themselves on one another in a way that does not enable cases to be differ-350 entiated and, first and foremost, obliterates the difference between neurosis and psychosis. The mere experience of partial delusion mitigates against speaking of immaturity, or even of regression or simple modification of the object relation.

The same thing goes if one refers to the neuroses alone. Next year we shall see that the notion of object relation isn't univocal, when I begin by contrasting the object of phobias with the object of perversions. This will be to take up again, at the level of the category of object, the problem of the relations between the subject and the other, two terms which, regarding the psychoses, are opposed.

I left you last time with two opposed descriptions, Freud's and that of a psychoanalyst who is far from being without merit and, while representing the most modern tendencies, has at least the advantage of doing so very intelligently.

Let's briefly summarize Freud's position on the subject of Schreber's delusion and the objections brought against him, and let's see if anything like a better solution has even begun to be outlined.

For Freud, we're told, Schreber's delusion is linked to the irruption of a homosexual tendency. The subject negates it, defends himself against it. In his case, which isn't the case of a neurotic, this negation ends in what we might call divine erotomania.

You know how Freud divides up the various denials [dénégations] of the homosexual tendency. He starts from a sentence that symbolizes the situation – I love him, a man.[1] There is more than one way of introducing denial into this sentence. One may say for example, It's not I who love him or, It's not him I love or again, For me there's no question of love, I hate him. Moreover, he tells us, the situation is never simple and isn't limited to a simple symbolic reversal. For reasons that he takes to be implied sufficiently, but upon which as a matter of fact he doesn't insist, an imaginary reversal of the situation occurs in only a part of the three terms, namely I hate him is for example transformed through projection into He hates me. In our case, It's not him I love, it's someone else, a big He, God himself, is inverted into He loves me, as in all erotomania. It is clear that Freud is indicating that the final result of defense against the homosexual tendency can't be understood in the absence of a very advanced reversal of the symbolic apparatus.

Everything may therefore appear to revolve around defence. It must undoubtedly be very intense indeed to propel the subject into trials that extend to nothing less than the derealization, not only of the external world in general, but of the very people around him, even those he is closest to, including the other as such. This necessitates an entire delusional reconstruction, fol- 351 lowing which the subject gradually resituates, though in a profoundly disturbed way, a world in which he is able to recognize himself, in an equally disturbed way, as destined – at a time projected into the uncertainty of the future, at a date that is indeterminate but that certainly cannot be delayed – to become the subject par excellence of a divine miracle, that is, to be the support and feminine receptacle of the recreation of all humanity. Schreber's delusion in its final state presents with all the megalomaniacal characteristics of delusions of redemption in their most highly developed form.

How do we account for the intensity of the defense? Freud's explanation looks like it is contained entirely within the reference to narcissism. The defence against the homosexual tendency begins with a narcissism under threat. The megalomania represents that by which the narcissistic fear expresses itself. The ego's enlargement to the dimensions of the world is a fact of libidinal economy which is apparently located entirely on the imaginary level. Making himself the supreme being's love object, the subject can henceforth abandon that which, of all that he was going to save, initially seemed most precious to him – namely the mark of his virility.

But ultimately, and I stress this, the pivot, the point of convergence of the libidinal dialectic that the mechanism and development of neurosis refer to in Freud, is the theme of castration. It's castration that conditions the narcissistic fear. To accept castration the subject must pay as elevated a price as this reworking of the whole of reality.

Freud stuck by this prevalence. In the material, explanatory order of Freudian theory, from beginning to end, this is an invariable, a prevalent invariable. He never subordinated or even relativized its place in the theoretical conditioning of the subjective interplay in which the history of any psychoanalytic phenomenon whatsoever is inscribed. It was around Freud, within the analytic community, that one wanted to give it symmetrical or equivalent things. But in his work the phallic object occupies the central place in libidinal economy, in both man and woman.

This is an altogether essential fact, characteristic of all the theorizing given and maintained by Freud – whatever reworking he brought to his theorizing, throughout all the phases of the schematization he was able to give of psychic life, the prevalence of the phallic center was never modified.

If there is some truth in Mrs. Macalpine's remarks – and this is however 352 the only thing that she doesn't really make evident – it's that, effectively, in Schreber castration is never an issue. The Latin term that is used in German, eviratio – Entmannung, means in the text transformation, with all that this word conveys of transition, into a woman – it's not castration at all.[2] This doesn't matter, Freud's analysis makes the entire dynamics of the subject Schreber revolve around the theme of castration, of the loss of the phallic object.

We must remark that despite certain weaknesses in his argument, which are due to the use of terms that only have their place in the imaginary dialectic of narcissism, the virile object is the essential element at play in the conflict. It alone enables us to make sense of and to understand the different stages of the delusion's evolution, its phases, and its final construction. Furthermore, we may note in passing all sorts of subtleties that have not been developed or completely explored. Freud shows us for example that projection alone cannot explain delusion, that it is not a matter of a mirror image of the subject's feeling, but that it is indispensable to determine stages in it and, at a certain moment as it were, a loss of the tendency, which ages. Over the course of the year I have greatly insisted upon the fact that what has been repressed within reappears without, re-emerges in the background – and not in a simple structure but in a position that is, as it were, internal, which makes the subject himself, who in the present case happens to be the agent of persecution, ambiguous, problematic. He is initially only the representative of another subject who not only permits but undoubtedly acts, in the final analysis. In short, the otherness of the other is spread out. It's one of the problems to which as a matter of fact Freud does lead us, but he stops there.

Ida Macalpine, after others, but in a much more coherent way than others, objects that nothing permits us to think that this delusion presupposes the genital maturity, if I may call it that, that would explain the fear of castration. The homosexual tendency is far from manifesting itself as primary. What we see from the start are symptoms, initially hypochondriacal, which are psychotic symptoms.

At the outset one finds this particular something which is at the heart of the psychotic relation, such as the psychosomatic phenomena that this clinician has especially worked on, and which certainly for her are the means of access to the phenomenology of this case. It is here that she might have directly apprehended phenomena that are structured quite differently from what takes place in the neuroses, namely, where there is some sort of direct imprint or inscription of a characteristic and even, in certain cases, of a conflict upon what may be called the material picture that the subject presents as a corporeal being. A symptom such as a facial eruption, which can be variously characterized dermatologically, will be mobilized in response to a given anniversary for example, directly, without any intermediary, without any dialectic, without any interpretation's being able to indicate any correspondence with anything from the subject's past. 353

This is no doubt what drove Ida Macalpine to raise the most unusual problem of direct correspondences between the symbol and the symptom. The apparatus of the symbol is so absent from the mental categories of the contemporary psychoanalyst that the sole way such relations can be conceived is through the intermediary of a fantasy. Furthermore, her entire argument consists in relating the development of the delusion to a fantasmatic theme, to an originary – original [originelle] according to the usual word today – preoedipal fixation, emphasizing that what sustains desire is essentially a theme of procreation, but one that is pursued for its own sake, is asexual in form, and only induces conditions of devirilization, of feminization, as a sort of a posteriori consequence of the requirement in question. The subject is conceived as born into the sole child-mother relation, prior to any constitution of a triangular situation. This is when he would have seen a fantasy of desire born within himself, a desire to equal the mother in her ability to create a child.

This is Mrs. Macalpine's entire argument, which I have no reason to pursue here in all the richness of its detail, since it is within your reach in the substantial preface and postface to the English edition of Schreber's text she has done. It is important to see that this construction is connected with a certain reorientation of the entire analytic dialectic which tends to make the imaginary economy of fantasy, the various fantasmatic reorganizations, disorganizations, restructurations, and destructurations, the hub of all comprehensive progress as well as of all therapeutic progress. The schema that is currently so widely accepted, frustration-aggressiveness-regression, is at the base of everything in this delusion that Mrs. Macalpine thinks she can explain.

She goes a long way in this direction. There is, she says, a decline, a twilight of the world, and at one point a quasi-confusional disorder of the apprehensions of reality, only because the world has to be recreated.[3] She thus introduces, at the most profound stage of the mental confusion, a sort of teleology. The entire myth was only constructed because it is the only way for the subject Schreber to satisfy himself in his imaginary requirement of childbirth.

354 Ida Macalpine's point of view can no doubt enable us to understand the putting into play, the imaginary impregnation, of the subject to be reborn – I'm copying here one of Schreber's themes which is, as you know, the picturing.[4]

But from such a point of view, in which only imaginary fantasies are involved, what enables us to understand the prevalence that Freud gives to the function of the father?

Whatever certain of the weaknesses in Freud's argument concerning psychosis may be, it is undeniable that the function of the father is so exalted in Schreber that nothing less than God the father – in a subject for whom up to this point this has had no sense – is necessary for the delusion to attain its culminating point, its point of equilibrium. The prevalence, in the entire evolution of Schreber's psychosis, of paternal characters who replace one another, grow larger and larger and envelop one another to the point of becoming identified with the divine Father himself, a divinity marked by the properly paternal accent, is undeniable, unshakable, and destined to make us raise the question once again – how come something that confirms that Freud is so right is only investigated by him in certain modes that leave a lot to be desired?

[4] In English in the original. Mem, 231–37.

In reality, everything in him is balanced, and everything remains inadequate in Mrs. Macalpine's rectification. It's not only the vastness of the fantasmatic character of the father that prevents us from being in any way satisfied with a dynamics founded on the irruption of a pre-oedipal fantasy. There are many more things, including what in both cases remains enigmatic. Freud, much more than Mrs. Macalpine, comes close to the preponderant, crushing, proliferating aspect of the phenomena of verbal auditivation, the formidable captivation of the subject in the world of speech, which is not only copresent with his existence, which constitutes not only what last time I called a spoken accompaniment of acts, but also a perpetual intimation, solicitation, summation even, to manifest itself on this plane. Not for one instant must the subject cease testifying, at the constant inducement of the speech that accompanies him, that he is there present, capable of responding – or of not responding, because perhaps, he says, one wants to compel him to say something silly. By his response, as by his nonresponse, he has to testify that he is always awake to this internal dialogue. Not to be so any longer would be the signal of what he calls a Verwesung, that is, as it has been correctly translated, a decomposition.

This is what we have drawn attention to this year and what we have insisted upon, in order to say that it's what gives the pure Freudian position its value. Despite the paradox presented by certain manifestations of psychosis if one 355 refers them to the dynamics that Freud recognized in neurosis, psychosis nevertheless happens to be explored in a more satisfactory manner from his point of view.

His point of view. Freud never completely elucidated it, but it's what makes his position tenable in relation to this kind of leveling-off, as it were, of instinctual signs that psychoanalytic dynamics have tended to be reduced to since Freud. I am speaking of the terms that he never abandoned, that he requires for any possible analytic understanding, even where it hangs together only approximately, for it hangs together all the better in this way – namely, the function of the father and the castration complex.

It can't be a question purely and simply of imaginary elements. What one finds in the imaginary in the form of the phallic mother isn't homogeneous, as you are all aware, with the castration complex, insofar as the latter is integrated into the triangular situation of the Oedipus complex. This situation is not completely elucidated by Freud, but by virtue of the sole fact that it is always maintained it is there ready to lend itself to elucidation, which is only possible if we recognize that the third element, central for Freud, which is the father, has a signifying element that is irreducible to any type of imaginary conditioning.

I'm not saying that the Name of the Father is the only one of which we can say this.

We can uncover this element whenever we apprehend something that is of the symbolic order properly so-called. On this subject I reread, once again, Ernest Jones's article on symbolism.[5] I shall take up one of the most notorious examples in which this master's brat tries to grasp the phenomenon of the symbol. It concerns the ring.

A ring, he tells us, doesn't enter into play as an analytic symbol insofar as it represents marriage, with all that is cultural and developed, even sublimated – since this is how he expresses himself – that this conveys.[6] The ring as a symbol of marriage is to be sought somewhere in sublimation – we couldn't care less about all that, it drives us up the wall, we're not people to speak to about analogies. If a ring signifies something it's because it is a symbol of the female sexual organ.

356 Doesn't this kind of declaration give you cause to wonder, when we know that the putting into play of the signifier in the symptom has no link with anything of the order of a tendency? You would really have to have the oddest idea of natural symbolization to believe that a ring is the natural symbolization of the female sexual organ.

You are all familiar with the theme of the Ring of Hans Carvel, a fine story from the Middle Ages of which La Fontaine made a tale and which Balzac used again in his Contes drolatiques. This fellow, who is colorfully depicted and is sometimes said to be a priest, dreams that he has a ring on his finger and on waking finds that he has his finger inside the vagina of his companion. To put this in a way that dots the *i*s and crosses the *t*s – how could the experience of penetrating this orifice, since it is an orifice that is in question, resemble in any way at all that of putting on a ring, if one didn't already know in advance what a ring is?

A ring isn't an object one encounters in nature. If there is anything in the order of penetration that resembles the more or less tight-fitting penetration of a finger inside a ring, it is certainly not – I appeal, as Marie-Antoinette used to say, not to all mothers, but to all those who have ever put their finger in a certain place – it's certainly not penetrating this place which is, my God, more like a mollusk than anything else. If something in nature is designed to suggest certain of the properties of a ring [anneau] to us, it is restricted to what language has dedicated the term anus to, which in Latin is spelt with one n, and which in their modesty ancient dictionaries designated as the ring that can be found behind.

[5] Ernest Jones, "The Theory of Symbolism." Lacan examined this paper in "A la mémoire d'Ernest Jones: sur sa théorie du symbolisme," E, 697–717.

[6] "Theory of Symbolism," 128–29.

But to confuse one with the other on the basis of the fact that it may be a question of natural symbolization, one must really have had in the order of these cogitative perceptions. . . . Freud himself must have really despaired of you not to have taught you the difference between the two, and regarded you as irredeemable little idiots.

Mr. Jones's lucubration is designed to show us that a ring is introduced into a dream, indeed a dream that culminates in a sexual action, only because we thereby signify something primitive. Cultural connotations frighten him and this is where he is mistaken. He doesn't imagine that the ring already exists as a signifier, independently of its connotations, that it's already one of the essential signifiers by which man in his presence in the world is capable of crystallizing many things other than marriage. A ring isn't a hole with something around it, as Mr. Jones seems to think, in the manner of these people who think that to make macaroni one takes a hole and surrounds it 357 with flour. A ring above all has a signifying value.

How else can we explain that a man is able to understand something, what is called understanding, of the simplest formulation to be inscribed in language, the most elementary utterance – That's it [c'est cela]? For a man, this expression nevertheless has an explanatory sense. He has seen something, anything, which is there, and that's it. Whatever the thing is he is in the presence of, whether it be a question of the most unusual, the most bizarre, or even the most ambiguous, that's it. It is now located somewhere other than where it was beforehand, which was nowhere, now it's – that's it.

I would for a moment like deliberately to take a phenomenon that is exemplary because it's the most inconsistent of that which can present itself to man – the meteor.[7]

By definition the meteor is that [cela], it's real and at the same time it's illusory. It would be quite wrong to say that it's imaginary. The rainbow, that's it. You say that the rainbow is that, and then you search. People racked their brains for some time until M. Descartes came along and completely reduced the whole affair. There is a region that becomes iridized in little drops of water in suspension, etc. Fine. And so what? There is the ray on one side and the condensed drops on the other. That's it. It was only an appearance – that's it.

[7] Besides the current meaning of mass from space made luminous by the earth's atmosphere, "meteor" has the older, generic meaning of any atmospheric phenomenon. This earlier meaning is clearly intended in the current context.

Notice that the question is not at all settled. A ray of light is, as you know, a wave or a corpuscle and a little drop of water is a curious thing, since ultimately it's not really in gaseous form, it's condensation which is falling in a liquid state, but in a suspended fall, between the two, in the state of an expansive pool, as water.

When we say, then, That's it, we imply that that's all it is, or that that's not what it is, namely, the appearance that we had stopped at. But this proves to us that everything that has subsequently emerged, the that's all it is as well as the that's not what it is, was already implied in the that's it at the beginning.

A rainbow is a phenomenon that has no kind of imaginary interest, you will have never seen an animal pay one any attention, and as a matter of fact man pays no attention to an incredible number of related manifestations. Various iridizations are exceedingly widespread in nature and, gifts of observation or some special research aside, nobody pauses at them. If on the contrary rainbows exist, it's precisely in relation to the that's it. That's why we have named them rainbows and why when one speaks of them to someone 358 who hasn't yet seen one there is a point at which one says to him – That's what a rainbow is. And this that's what it is presupposes the implication that we are going to carry on until we have run out of breath, to discover what lies hidden behind it, what its cause is, to which we shall be able to reduce it. Notice that what has characterized the rainbow and the meteor from the beginning – and everybody knows this since this is why it's called a meteor – is precisely that nothing is hidden behind it. It exists entirely in this appearance. What makes it nevertheless subsist for us, to the point where we do not stop asking ourselves questions about it, stems uniquely from the original that's it, that is, the naming as such of the rainbow. There is nothing besides this name.

In other words, to pursue this further, this rainbow doesn't speak, but one could speak in its place. Nobody ever speaks to it, this is quite striking. The aurora is interpellated, and so are all sorts of other things. The rainbow retains the privilege, along with a number of other manifestations of the same kind, that nobody speaks to it. No doubt there are reasons for this, namely that it is quite particularly insubstantial. But let's say that one speaks to it. If one speaks to it, one can make it speak. One can make it speak to whomever one wants. This could be to the lake. If the rainbow has no name, or if it doesn't want to hear anything of its name, if it doesn't know that it's called the rainbow, the only resource this lake has is to show it the thousand little mirages of the sunshine upon its waves and the rising vapor. It may well attempt to join up with the rainbow, but it will never join up with it, for the simple reason that the little fragments of sun that dance on the surface of the lake, like the vapor that wafts away, have nothing to do with producing the rainbow which begins at a certain angle of inclination of the sun and at a certain density of the droplets in question. There is no reason to search for either the inclination of the sun or for any of the indices that determine the phenomenon of the rainbow, so long as it is not named as such.

If I've just carried out this lengthy study concerning something that has the characteristic of a spherical belt, able to be unfolded and refolded, it's because the imaginary dialectic in psychoanalysis is of exactly the same kind. Why are the mother-child relationships, to which there is a tendency to limit it more and more, inadequate? There is really no reason.

We're told that a mother's requirement is to equip herself with an imaginary phallus, and it's very clearly explained to us how she uses her child as a quite adequate real support for this imaginary prolongation. As to the child, there's not a shadow of doubt – whether male or female, it locates the phallus very early on and, we're told, generously grants it to the mother, whether or 359 not in a mirror image, or in a double mirror image. The couple should harmonize symmetrically very well around this common illusion of reciprocal phallicization. Everything should take place at the level of a mediating function of the phallus. Now, the couple finds itself on the contrary in a situation of conflict, even of respective internal alienation. Why? Because the phallus is, as it were, a wanderer. It is elsewhere. Everyone knows where analytic theory places it – it's the father who is supposed to be its vehicle. It's around him that in the child the fear of the loss of the phallus and, in the mother, the claim for, the privation of, or the worry over, the nostalgia for, the phallus is established.

Now, if affective, imaginary exchanges between mother and child are established around the imaginary lack of the phallus, then that which makes it the essential element of intersubjective coaptation in the Freudian dialectic, the father, has his own and that's that, he neither exchanges it nor gives it. There is no circulation. The father has no function in the trio, except to represent the vehicle, the holder, of the phallus. The father, as father, has the phallus – full stop.

In other words, he is that which in the imaginary dialectic must exist in order for the phallus to be something other than a meteor.

So fundamental is this that if we try to situate on a schema what it is that makes the Freudian conception of the Oedipus complex cohere, it is not a question of a father-mother-child triangle, but of a triangle (father)-phallus-mother-child. Where is the father in this? He is in the ring that holds all this together.

The notion of father can only be supposed as provided with an entire series of signifying connotations which give it existence and consistency and which are a very long way indeed from merging with those of the genital, from which it is semantically different across all the linguistic traditions.

I shan't start quoting Homer and Saint Paul to tell you that invoking the father, whether it be Zeus or someone else, is entirely different from purely and simply referring to the generative function. An indefinite number of beings can issue from a woman. They could all be women —moreover, we shall soon reach this point, since every day the newspapers tell us that parthenogenesis is on the way and that soon women will beget daughters without anyone's assistance. Well then, notice that if any masculine elements intervene here, 360 they will play a role of fecundation without being anything other than an indispensable lateral circuit, as in animals. There will be the begetting of women by women, with the aid of lateral abortees that can be used to set the process off again but will not structure it. It's only when we seek to inscribe descendence as a function of males that any innovation in the structure intervenes. It's only when we speak of descendence from male to male that a cut intervenes, which is the difference between generations. The introduction of the signifier of the father introduces henceforth an ordering in the descendants, the series of generations.

We're not here to develop all the facets of this function of the father, but I am pointing out one of the most striking of them, which is the introduction of an order, of a mathematical order, whose structure is different from the natural order.

We've been trained in analysis through the experience of the neuroses. The imaginary dialectic may suffice if, within the framework of this dialectic that we have sketched out, there already exists this implied signifying relation for the practical use one wants to put it to. In two or three generations no doubt no one will understand it at all anymore, a cat won't be able to find its kittens, but for the moment, on the whole, the continued presence of the theme of the Oedipus complex preserves the notion of signifying structure, which is so essential for finding one's way about the neuroses.

But where the psychoses are concerned, things are different. It's not a question of the subject's relation to a link signified within existing signifying structures, but of his encounter under elective conditions with the signifier as such, which marks the onset of psychosis.

Look at the point in his life at which President Schreber's psychosis declares itself. On more than one occasion he was in the situation of expecting to become a father. Here he is, all of a sudden, invested with a socially eminent function, one that has great value for him – he becomes President of the Court of Appeal. I should say that within the administrative structure in question it is something like the Conseil d'Etat.[8] Here he is admitted to the top of the legislative hierarchy, among men who make laws and are all twenty years older than he is – a disturbance in the order of generations. Following what? Following an explicit call from the ministers. This promotion of his nominal existence solicits a renewing integration from him. Ultimately the question is whether or not the subject will become a father. The question of the father centers all Freud's research, all the points of view he has introduced into subjective experience.

This is entirely forgotten, I'm well aware. Recent analytic technique is 361 clouded by the object relation. The supreme experience that is described, this famous distance taken in the object relation, ultimately consists in fantasizing the sexual organ of the analyst and imaginarily absorbing it. Make filiation the equivalent of fellatio? Indeed there is an etymological relationship between these two terms, but this isn't a sufficient reason for deciding that analytic experience is a sort of obscene chain that consists in the imaginary absorption of an object that has finally been extracted from fantasies.

In any case, it is impossible in the phenomenology of psychosis to misunderstand the originality of the signifier as such. What is perceptible in the phenomenon of everything that takes place in psychosis is that it is a question of the subject's access to a signifier as such and of the impossibility of that access. I shan't go back over the notion of Verwerfung I began with, and for which, having thought it through, I propose to you definitively to adopt this translation which I believe is the best – foreclosure.

There follows a process whose first stage we have called an imaginary cataclysm, namely that no longer can anything in the mortal relation, which is in itself the relation with the imaginary other, be held on lease. Then there is the separate deployment and bringing into play of the entire signifying apparatus – dissociation, fragmentation, mobilization of the signifier as speech, ejaculatory speech that is insignificant or too significant, laden with nonmeaningfulness, the decomposition of internal discourse, which marks the entire structure of psychosis. After the encounter, the collision, with the inassimilable signifier, it has to be reconstituted, since this father cannot be simply a father, a rounded-out father, the ring of just before, the father who is the father for everybody. And President Schreber does in fact reconstitute him.

Nobody is aware of being inserted into the father. Nevertheless, I would like to point out to you before leaving you this year that to be doctors you may be innocent, but that to be psychoanalysts you should nevertheless meditate from time to time on a theme such as this, even though neither the sun nor death can look itself in the face. I shan't say that the slightest little gesture to arouse an evil creates possibilities for a greater evil, it always entails a greater evil. This is something that a psychoanalyst should become accustomed to, because I believe that he is absolutely incapable in all conscience of conducting his professional life without it. Having said this, it won't take you very far. The newspapers are always saying that God only knows whether the progress of science is dangerous, etc., but for us this is neither here nor 362 there. Why not? Because you are all, myself included, inserted into this major signifier called Father Christmas. With Father Christmas things always work out and, I would add, they work out well.

What is at issue in the psychotic? Suppose someone unthinkable for us, one of these gentlemen who, we are told – if indeed any have ever existed, don't believe I attribute any importance to such hearsay – was capable of such self-discipline that he no longer believed in Father Christmas and was able to convince himself that everything good that one does entails an equivalent evil and that consequently one mustn't do it. Admitting this, even for an instant, is sufficient for you to understand that all sorts of things which are fundamental at the level of the signifier may depend on it.

Well then, compared to you the psychotic has this disadvantage, but also this privilege, of finding himself a little bit at odds with, askew in relation to, the signifier. Once he is summoned to harmonize with these signifiers, he has to make a considerable effort of retrospection, which culminates in these extraordinarily bizarre things that constitute what is called the development of a psychosis. This development is quite particularly rich and exemplary in the case of President Schreber, but I have shown you in my case presentations that things become a bit clearer once one possesses this point of view, even in the most common illnesses. The most recent case I have shown you was of someone who was very, very strange, on the verge of mental automatism, though not quite there. For him everyone was suspended in an artificial state whose coordinates he defined well. He had observed that the signifier dominates the existence of beings, and his own existence appeared to him to be much less certain than anything that presented itself with a certain signifying structure. He stated it quite crudely. You noticed that I put this question to him – When did all this begin? During your wife's pregnancy? He was a bit astonished for a moment, then answered me – Yes, that's true – adding that it had never occurred to him.

–From the imaginary point of view, what we say in passing, in analysis, has strictly no importance, since it's solely a question of frustration or of no frustration. One frustrates him, he is aggressive, he regresses, and we continue like that until the most primordial fantasies emerge. Unfortunately, this isn't the correct theory. One has to know what one's saying. It isn't sufficient to bring signifiers into play in this way – I tap you on the shoulder . . . You're really a nice person . . . You had a bad daddy . . . Things will work out. One has to use them in full knowledge, make them resonate otherwise, and at least know how not to employ certain of them. The negative indications con- 363 cerning certain contents of interpretation are highlighted by such a point of view.

I leave these questions open. The year ends in dialect, why should it end in any other way?

In conclusion I would like to move to a different genre of style from my own. Several weeks back I promised myself to end on a very pretty page by an admirable poet called Guillaume Apollinaire. It comes from the Enchanteur pourrissant.

At the end of one of the chapters there is the enchanter who is rotting away in his tomb, and who, like any good cadaver, I won't say speaks drivel, as Barrès would say, but enchants and speaks very well. There is also the Lady of the Lake seated on her tomb – it was she who had got him to enter the tomb by telling him that he could get out again easily, but she, too, had her tricks, and the enchanter is there, rotting away, and from time to time speaks. This is where we are when a number of madmen appear in the middle of various funeral processions, along with a monster whom I hope you are going to recognize. This monster is the one who found the analytic key, the active force of men, and especially in the relation of the father-child to the mother.

> I mewed, I mewed, said the monster, I encountered only owls who assured me that he was dead. I shall never be prolific. However, those who are have qualities. I confess that I do not recognize any in me. I am alone. I am hungry, I am hungry. Here I discover a quality of my own; I am famished. Let's look for something to eat. He who eats is no longer alone.[9]

THEORISING THE LACK OF OBJECT

INTRODUCTION

The Z-shaped diagram
The object, lost and re-found
Gems
The object, anxiety and the hole
Fetishes and phobic objects

This year we shall be speaking on a topic to which the historical evolution of psychoanalysis, or what is so termed, could offer a central place in both theory and practice, whether in a way that hangs together or otherwise.

This topic is The Object Relation.

Why did I not choose this topic before, back when we began these seminars, given that it was already a crucial, prominent and contemporary topic? Well, precisely for the reason behind the second part of my title – . . . and The Freudian Structures.

Indeed, this topic could be treated only after a certain step back had been taken in relation to this question. We first had to examine what constitutes those structures in which, according to what Freud has shown us, analysis moves and operates, and most especially the complex structure of the relation between the two subjects present in analysis, namely the subject being analysed and the analyst. This is what our past three years of commentary and critical reading of Freud's texts have been devoted to, which I shall rapidly recall for you now.

The first year dealt with the main technical features in the steering of the treatment, that is, with the notions of transference and resistance. The second year bore on the grounding of the Freudian discovery and experience, namely the notion of the unconscious. I think I showed well enough how this notion is what necessitated Freud's introduction, in Beyond the Pleasure Principle, of principles that are utterly paradoxical on the purely dialectical plane. Lastly, over the third year, I gave you a patent example of the absolute necessity of isolating the essential articulation of symbolism that is known as the signifier, so as to understand, analytically speaking, something of that field of psychoses that is strictly limited to paranoia.

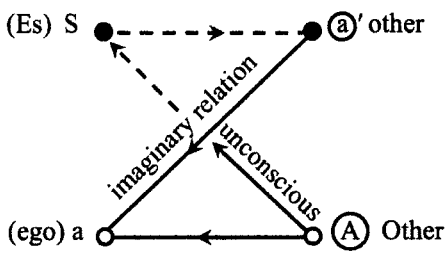
After these years of critical reading we are now armed with a number of terms that have culminated in certain schemas. On no account is the spatiality of these schemas to be taken in the intuitive sense of the term schema, but rather in another sense that is altogether legitimate, the topological sense. It's not a matter of localisations, but rather of relationships between loci, interposition, for example, or succession, sequence. What we developed culminated in the following diagram –



This diagram lays out, first and foremost, the subject's relation to the Other. In the way that it is naturally constituted at the start of analysis, this relation is one of virtual speech wherein the subject receives, from the Other, his own message in the form of unconscious speech. This message, which for him is interdicted, is profoundly misrecognised. It is mangled, stayed and intercepted by the interposition of the imaginary relationship between a and a', between the ego and the other, which is the ego's type-object. The imaginary relationship, which is an essentially alienated relation, barges in, hampers, and more often than not reverses and profoundly misrecognises the relationship of speech between the subject and the Other. This happens insomuch as the big Other is another subject and insomuch as he is capable, par excellence, of deceiving.

There was a point to introducing this schematisation in analytic experience, given how nowadays this experience is being reformulated by an ever larger number of analysts who give priority in analytic theory to the object relation as something primary, without for all that offering any further commentary. They have been realigning the entire dialectic of the pleasure principle and reality principle on the object relation, and basing all analytic furtherance around what might be called a rectifying of the subject's relation to the object, regarded as a dual relationship, as a relationship that would be – so we are told when they speak about the analytic situation – exceedingly straightforward.[1] Well, this relationship between subject and object that is increasingly tending to occupy the centre stage of analytic theory is the very thing that we are going to put to the test.

Given that the object relation, insomuch as it is dual, corresponds to the line a–a' in our diagram, can we on this basis construct in a satisfactory way the entirety of phenomena open to our observation in our analytic experience? Can this implement possibly answer for the facts all by itself? Can the more complex diagram that we have set in opposition to this be disregarded, indeed must it be cast aside?

I shall give you some sustained evidence of how the object relation has become, at least apparently, the foremost theoretical feature in the explication of analysis. Not that I can recommend that you delve into what can be called a sort of collective work that has just come out, and to which the term collective is particularly well suited. You will see that from beginning to end this object relation is foregrounded in a way that is not always particularly satisfactory, in the sense of hanging together, but the monotony of which, the uniformity, is quite striking. You will see this object relation being expressly promoted in one of the articles, entitled Évolution de la psychanalyse, and, as the final stage of this evolution, you will see in the article La clinique psychanalytique a way of presenting clinical practice itself that is fully aligned with it. Perhaps I will give you some idea of what a presentation such as this can lead to.

The collection as a whole is certainly quite striking. In it, you can see practitioners of analysis trying to put their minds in order. The understanding they manage to have of their own experience does not seem to give them full and complete satisfaction. On the other hand, however, this only orients or penetrates their practice with any depth when they conceive of how their own experience in this realm is not something that would truly have consequences for the actual patterns of their intervention, for the direction they give to analysis, nor, by the same token, for its outcomes. In merely reading them, one can misrecognise this, even though it has always been said that analytic theory and practice cannot be separated, dissociated, one from the other. Once people start conceiving of analysis in a certain direction it is inevitable that it will also be led in a certain direction, if the theoretical direction and the practical outcomes can likewise be but glimpsed.

To introduce the question of the object relation, and precisely the question of its legitimacy, or of the groundlessness of its being placed at the centre of analytic theory, I shall have to recall for you at least briefly what this notion owes, or doesn't owe, to Freud himself. I shall do so first of all because this is indeed a sort of guide rope for us, and almost a technical delimitation that we have imposed on ourselves, based on this Freudian commentary.

Likewise, this last year I have sensed some questioning arising from you, worries even, as to whether I would be taking Freud's texts as my point of departure. When it comes to the object relation, it is undoubtedly very hard to begin with Freud's texts themselves, because it's not to be found in them. I'm speaking, of course, about something that is hereby categorically asserted to be a deviation from analytic theory. So, I'm going to have to begin with recent texts and with a criticism of their positions. However, that we shall ultimately have to refer to Freud's positions is not in doubt, and by the same stroke we cannot avoid bringing up, even very rapidly, what revolves around the very notion of object in those fundamental themes that are strictly Freudian.

We cannot do so, here at the point of departure, in a developed way. It is precisely at the end that we will be joining up with this, when we will have to spell it out.

So, I simply want to provide a brief reminder, which wouldn't even be conceivable were it not for the three years of collaboration we have under our belt, and had you not already met this theme of the object in various different guises here with me.

Freud does, of course, speak about the object. The final section of the Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality is called Die Objektfindung, The Finding of an Object. The object is being implicitly spoken of whenever the notion of reality comes into play. It is spoken of in yet a third way whenever the ambivalence of certain fundamental relationships is implied, namely the fact that the subject turns himself into an object for the other party, the fact that there is a specific type of relationship in which an object's reciprocity with a subject is a plain and even constituting factor.

I would like to accentuate more firmly the three ways in which notions relating to the object become apparent to us. This is why I'm alluding to one of the points in Freud's writings to which we can refer in order to demonstrate, to articulate, the notion of object. If you go to this chapter in the Three Essays you will see something that was already there at the time he was drafting the Entwurf, a text that I remind you has only been published by a sort of historical accident, for not only was Freud not minded to publish it but, furthermore, it was published against his will. None the less, we find the same wording in connection with the object back in this first projection of his psychology. Freud insists that any way by which man may find the object is only ever subsequent to a drive tendency[2] in which what is at issue is a lost object, an object that would have to be found again.

Here, the object is not regarded in the same terms as in the new-fangled theory, where it is said to be a fully satisfying object, a type-object, the object par excellence, a harmonious object, the object that grounds man in a corresponding reality[3], in the reality that is proof of maturity – the infamous genital object. It is quite striking to see how, when he is laying out the theory of instinctual development, such as it can be isolated in the first analytic experiences, Freud indicates that it is grasped along the path of a search for the lost object. This object that corresponds to an advanced stage in the maturation of instincts is the object of the first weaning, found again. It is the object that was initially the point of attachment to the infant's earliest satisfactions. It is a re-found object.

It is quite clear that discordance is established by the bare fact of repetition. Nostalgia binds the subject to the lost object, through which every searching effort is exerted. It brands this re-finding with the stamp of a repetition that is impossible, precisely because it is not the same object and never can be. The primacy of this dialectic places a fundamental tension at the heart of the subject–object relationship, which ensures that what is sought out is never sought out in the same way as what will be found. It is through a search for a satisfaction that is both passée and dépassée, past and outgrown, that the new object is sought out and found, and seized elsewhere than the very spot at which it is being sought out. A fundamental distance is introduced by the essential conflictive element that any search for the object entails. This is the first form in which this notion of the object relation appears in Freud's work.

It is here that we ought to resolve to lay the stress squarely on what I've been underscoring. I would say that to articulate this in terms that would be philosophically developed would be at cross-purposes. I'm not doing this, and intentionally so, because I'm setting it aside for our return to this theme. For some of you these terms already carry a meaning by way of certain items familiar to you from philosophy. I'm underscoring the distance that lies between, on the one hand, the subject's relationship to the object in Freud's work and, on the other, what preceded it in a certain conception of the object as a corresponding object, the object expected in advance, coapted to the subject's maturation. This full distance is already implicit in what contrasts a Platonic perspective – the perspective that grounds each apprehending, each recognition, upon the reminiscence of a type that is in some sort preformed – with a profoundly different notion. It is the same distance that lies between modern experience and experience in Antiquity, and it is set out by Kierkegaard in the register of repetition, the repetition that is forever sought out but essentially never satisfied insomuch that, of its very nature, it is not reminiscence by any stretch of the imagination. It is always repetition as such, and thus impossible to assuage. It is in this register that Freud's notion of re-finding the lost object is located.

We shall take this textual reference on board. It is crucial that it should have survived in Freud's first report on the notion of the object. It is essentially with a notion of the subject's profoundly conflictive relation with his world that things are set out and clarified. How could it be otherwise since, already at that time, it was essentially a matter of the opposition between the reality principle and the pleasure principle?

If pleasure principle and reality principle were not extricable, one from the another – I would further say, each implying the other and each including the other in a dialectical relation, as Freud consistently established – then the reality principle would be constituted only by what is imposed, for its satisfaction, on the pleasure principle. It would merely be its extension.

Correlatively, while the reality principle does imply, in its dynamic and in its fundamental search, the fundamental tension of the pleasure principle, it is no less the case that between the two – and this is the essential factor in what Freudian theory brings us – there is a wide gap that there would be no cause to single out were the one merely the continuation of the other. Indeed, the pleasure principle tends to become a reality in profoundly unrealistic formations, while the reality principle implies the existence of an organisation, a structuration, that is different and autonomous, and which entails that what it grasps may well be something fundamentally different from what is desired. In itself this relation introduces another term into the very dialectic of subject and object, a term that is here posited as irreducible.

Just as the subject we saw earlier was something that was founded in its primordial requirements as something that is fated forever to make a return, and even an impossible return, so too in the opposition between reality principle and pleasure principle do we have the notion of a fundamental opposition between reality and what is sought by the drive tendency. In other words, the notion of the satisfaction of the pleasure principle, insomuch as it is always latent, subjacent to any world-building exercise, is something that always tends to become more or less of a reality in a loosely hallucinatory form. The fundamental possibility of this organisation that is subjacent to the ego, that of the subject's drive tendency as such, is to be satisfied in an unreal realisation, in an hallucinatory realisation. Here, with hallucinatory, we have the other term on which Freud squarely lays the accent in the Traumdeutung, in The Interpretation of Dreams, where there is the first full and articulated formulation of the opposition between reality principle and pleasure principle.

These two positions are not, as such, articulated one to the other. The fact that Freud presents them as distinct marks out well enough how the development is not centred around the relationship between subject and object. Each of these two terms finds its place at a different point in the Freudian dialectic, for the simple reason that in no case whatsoever is the subject–object relationship central.

This relationship becomes apparent only in a way that may seem to be sustained directly, without any gap. It is within this ambivalent relationship, or in a kind of relationship that has since been labelled pregenital – referring to relations of seeing/being seen, attacking/being attacked, passive/active – that the subject experiences these relationships that always imply, in a way that is more or less manifest, his identification with the partner of this relationship. That is to say, these relations are lived through in a reciprocity – the term is acceptable in this instance – of ambivalence between the subject's position and the partner's position.

Indeed, at this level a relationship is introduced between subject and object that is not only direct and seamless but which literally equates them. It was this relationship that provided the pretext for the foregrounding of the object as such. This relationship of reciprocity between subject and object, which warrants being termed a mirror-relation, already in and of itself raises so many questions that, in an attempt to resolve them, I introduced the notion of the mirror stage into analytic theory.[4]

What is the mirror stage? It is the moment at which the infant recognises his own image, but it is far from being purely and simply the connoting of this one phenomenon in child development. It encompasses everything that the child learns from being captivated by his own image, and precisely everything of the distance that lies between his inner tensions and those that are brought out in this relation to his identification with the image. This is still something that has served as a theme, as a central point, in the foregrounding of this subject–object relation as, so to speak, the phenomenal scale to which may be referred, in a valid and satisfactory manner, what had hitherto been presented in terms that were not only pluralist but strictly speaking conflictive.

It introduces an essentially dialectical relation between the different terms, except that some thought – and one of the first to accentuate this, though not as early on as might be believed, was Karl Abraham – that they ought to be trying to refocus everything that had thus far been introduced concerning the subject's development.

Until then, the subject's development had always been introduced in a way that was seen retroactively, as a reconstruction, based on a central experience, that of the conflictive tension between conscious and unconscious. This conflictive tension is created by the fundamental fact that what is sought by the drive tendency is obscure, that what is consciously acknowledged therein is first and foremost a misrecognition, and that it is not along the path of consciousness that the subject recognises himself. There is something else, and there is a beyond-zone. By the same stroke, this beyond-zone thereby poses the question of its structure, its origin and its meaning, in being fundamentally misrecognised by the subject, beyond the reach of his cognisance.

This is the perspective that was abandoned on the initiative of a number of figureheads, and then in trends of significance within analysis. They refocused everything in accordance with an object the terminal point of which is not the same as our point of departure. Our point of departure leads backwards in time, so as to understand how this terminal point is arrived at. Moreover, this terminal point can never be observed. This ideal object is literally unthinkable. They, on the contrary, conceived of it as a sort of focal point, a culminating point, onto which a whole series of experiences, elements and partial notions of the object would converge. This conception became prevalent from a particular time onwards, and especially from the moment that Abraham formulated it, in 1924, in his theory of libidinal development. For many, this theory grounds the very law of analysis and everything that occurs within it. It grounds the system of coordinates within which they situate the entire analytic experience, along with the experience of this infamous corresponding object that is ideal, terminal and perfect. They propose this object in analysis as the one that in and of itself marks out the achieved goal, namely the normalisation of the subject.

In itself alone, the term normalisation ushers in a slew of categories that are utterly foreign to the point of departure of analysis.

By the admission of those who have gone down this path – I think I can offer no better illustration of what is at issue than what they have certainly worded in very precise terms – what they regard to be furtherance in analytic experience is the fact of having pushed to the fore the subject's relations with his surroundings.

The accentuation they give to the surroundings amounts to a reduction of everything that analytic experience yields. There is a kind of reverting to the altogether objectifying position that posits, at the forefront, the existence of a particular individual and a relation that more or less corresponds, that is more or less adapted, to his surroundings. This is something that is spelt out in the collective work we were speaking about, on pages 761 to 773 [of the original French edition], in the following terms.

After having underscored that what is at issue in the furtherance of analysis is the accentuation of the subject's relations with his surroundings, we read in passing that this is especially relevant in the little Hans case study. We are told that Hans's parents seem to be lacking a personality of their own. Nothing compels us to subscribe to this opinion. The important matter is what follows. It was before the outbreak of the 1914 war, at a time when Western society was more self-assured and didn't think to second-guess its longevity; since 1926, the emphasis has been, on the contrary, on anxiety and the organism's interaction with its surroundings; so it was that society's foundations were shaken, the anxiety of a changing world was lived through on a daily basis, and individuals saw themselves differently. This was also the time when physics was trying to find itself, with relativism, uncertainty, and probability seeming to undermine the self-confidence of objective thought.

It seems to me that this reference to modern physics as the foundation of a new rationalism speaks for itself. What is important is that it is being oddly confessed, in a roundabout way, that psychoanalysis is envisaged as a kind of social remedy. This is what is pushed to the fore as the driving feature behind its furtherance. It is of no matter whether this is well founded or otherwise, because these are items that don't appear to us to carry much weight. What is instructive is the great casualness of the context in which these items are accepted.

This example does not stand alone, because what is specific to this collective work is how it communicates internally in a way that seems to be much rather composed of a kind of odd homogenisation than any articulation in the strict sense.

The first article to which I alluded earlier also marks out in a deliberate way the fully formulated notion that, all things considered, what will afford us the general conception of a scheme that enables us to understand, here and now, the structure of a personality is the point of view that we are told is the most practical and the most prosaic, that of the patient's social relationships. This last expression is emphasised by the author.

I shan't linger over other terms, which are confessional in nature – there arises a painful impression of something in motion, ungraspable, even artificial, but doesn't this depend on the very object of this discipline, which is an activity of which the variations over time no one dreams of contesting? Indeed, this is one explanation for the somewhat cloudy character of the different approaches that this point of view offers, but it's perhaps not an explanation that ought to be entirely satisfactory for us. I fail to see which objects of any discipline are not equally subject to variations over time.

Concerning the relationship between the subject and his world, it is asserted that there is a parallelism between the more or less advanced state in the maturation of instinctual life and the structure of the ego in a given subject at a given moment. To spell it right out, from a certain point on, this structure of the ego is considered to be the inner lining and, ultimately, the representative of the state of the maturation of instinctual activities. There is no more difference, whether on the dynamic plane or the genetic plane, between the different stages of the ego's progress and the different stages of instinctual progression.

For some of you, these are terms that you might not find particularly questionable in and of themselves. No matter. This is not the issue. We will be seeing to what extent we may or may not take them on board. But their consequence is that setting this up at the heart of analysis presents as a typology in which there are those who are pregenital and those who are genital.

This is written – Pregenitals are people with egos that are [. . .] weak. For them, the ego's coherence depends strictly upon the stability of object relationships with a significant object. This is where we can start to ask questions. Later, in passing, we might see where this unexplained notion of a significant object leads in the other texts, namely the absolute lack of differentiation and discernment about what is significant. The technical notion that this implies is the bringing into play, and by the same stroke the emphasising, within the analytic relationship, of pregenital relations, those that typify this pregenital individual's relation with his world. We are told – The loss of these relationships, or of their object (which amounts to the same thing since the object exists only by virtue of its relationship to the subject), may bring about functional disturbances of the ego, such as depersonalisation or psychotic disorders. Here we uncover the spot where a test is being sought that would vouch for this deep fragility in the ego's relationships with its object. The subject makes every effort to maintain at all costs his object relationships, making all sorts of adjustments to this end, changing the object by using displacement or symbolism in such a way that the choice of a symbol, quite arbitrarily charged with the same affective values as the original object, makes it possible for him not to be deprived of an object relationship. For this object, onto which the affective value of the original object is displaced, the term auxiliary ego is fully justified.

This explains the following – The genital type, on the other hand, possesses an ego whose strength and healthy functioning do not depend upon the possession of a significant object. While, for the first group, the loss of a person of great subjective importance – to take the most straightforward example – may endanger the whole personality, for the second group, however painful the loss may be, it does not constitute a threat to the solidity of their personality. The latter individuals are not dependent upon an object relationship. This is not to say that they can easily do without all object relationships – which, after all, is unrealisable in practice, so many and so varied are such relationships – but simply that the integrity of their being is not at the mercy of the loss of one significant object. This is where, from the standpoint of the connection between the ego and its object relationships, we find the difference between this and the former types of personality.

Much further on, we read – It may well be that, as in all neuroses, normal development seems to be halted by the subject's finding it impossible to achieve a resolution of the last structural conflict of the infantile phase. Such a resolution normally results in that happy adaptation to the world which we call the genital object relationship and which gives the observer the impression of a harmonious personality and, in analysis, what seems a sort of crystalline clarity of mind that is more an ideal than a reality. But this difficulty in resolving the oedipal conflict is very often the result not only of the problems involved in that conflict [. . .].

Crystalline clarity. We can see where this author is able to lead us with the perfection of the objectal relation.

Whereas the drives in their pregenital form present a need for a possession that cannot be controlled or limited by conditions and has in it a destructive element, in their genital form they are really tender and loving, and while such subjects may not show themselves to be oblative, that is, disinterested, and the object selected may be fundamentally just as narcissistic a choice as in the earlier cases; nevertheless, they are capable of understanding and adapting themselves to the object situation. Moreover, the inner structure of their object relationships shows that the happiness of the object is essential to the happiness of the subject. The convenience, the desires, and the needs of the object are taken into consideration to the highest degree.

This is enough to open up a very serious problem. Is it important to draw distinctions within maturation, which is neither a path, nor a perspective, nor a plane? Indeed, we cannot help but ask what is meant by a normal end to childhood, to adolescence and to maturity.

However, an essential distinction does need to be drawn between the establishing of a reality – with all the problems it poses in terms of adapting to something that resists, to something that refuses, to something that is complex, to something that in any case implies the notion of objectivity, as the most elementary experience shows us – and what is being aimed at in these same texts as a notion that is loosely implicit, and which is opened up by the contrasting term objectality, the plenitude of the object. Besides, this confusion is spelt out because the term objectivity can be found in the text as what typifies this form of achieved relation. There is certainly a distance between, on the one hand, what is implied by a certain construction of the world regarded as more or less satisfying at such-and-such an era that is effectively determined outside of any historical relativity, and, on the other, this relationship with the other party in its affective register, indeed its sentimental register, including the fact of taking his needs, happiness and pleasure into consideration. This certainly carries us much further, because what is at issue is the constitution of the other as such, insomuch as he speaks, insomuch as he is a subject.

We shall have to come back to these texts, whose authors plop out one gem after another. It's something that requires more than just quoting, even when coming out with the comic remarks that they themselves suggest quite readily enough, without, for all that, making the necessary progress.

This extraordinarily simplistic conception of the notion of instinctual development in analysis is far from universally accepted.

Texts like those by Glover, for instance, will refer you to a very different notion of the exploration of object relations, and which are even named and carefully defined as such. When you read Glover's texts, you will see that what essentially characterises the stages of the object throughout the different phases of individual development is an object that is conceived of as having an utterly different function.

Analysis insists on introducing a functional notion of the object that is quite different from that of something that simply corresponds, that simply coapts the object to a particular demand from the subject. The object has an altogether different role here. It is, as it were, placed against a backdrop of anxiety, insomuch as the object is an instrument for masking off, for fending off, the fundamental backdrop of anxiety that characterises the different stages in the development of the subject's relation to the world. This is how the subject needs to be characterised at each stage.

As we near the end of today's talk, I should cast some light on what I am asserting by means of an illustrative example. It will be enough to punctuate Freud's classic and fundamental conception of phobia.

Freud, and all those who studied phobia both with him and after him, could not fail to note that there is no direct relation between the object and the purported fear that tinges this object with its crucial mark, constituting it as such as a primal object. On the contrary, considerable distance lies between the fear at issue – and which may be a primal fear in some cases but not so in others – and the object that is constituted in relation to this fear in order to keep fear at a distance. This object encloses the subject in a circle, a bulwark wherein he shields himself from these fears. The object is essentially linked to the sounding of an alarm signal. It is an outpost against an established fear. This fear furnishes the object with its role, its function, at a point that is determined by a certain crisis of the subject, but which, for all that, is neither a typical crisis nor a developmental crisis.

This modern notion, as it were, of phobia is something that is more or less legitimately asserted – though we shall also have to criticise it – at the origin of the notion of object such as it is promoted in Glover's papers and in the way of conducting analysis that is characteristic of his thought and technique.

We are told that the anxiety at issue is castration anxiety, and until recently this has seldom been contested. Nevertheless, it is remarkable that things have got to the point that the desire for reconstruction, in the genetic sense, has gone so far as to try to make us deduce the very construction of the paternal object from something that would be seen as its sequence and culmination, namely the burgeoning of primal constructions that are phobic and objectal. There is a report by Mallet on phobia that goes in precisely this direction, curiously reversing the trail that effectively allowed us to trace back from the phobia to the notion of a protective function which the phobic object holds in relation to anxiety.

In another register, it is no less remarkable to see what has become of notions of the fetish and fetishism. I'm introducing this today to show you that, if we take them from the object-relations perspective, fetishes are seen to fulfil a function that in analytic theory is also articulated as a protection against anxiety and, oddly enough, against the same anxiety, that is to say, castration anxiety. This doesn't seem to be the same angle from which fetishes are purported to be more particularly bound to castration anxiety in so far as it is linked to the perception of the absence of a phallic organ in the female subject, and to the negation of this absence. What matter. You cannot fail to see, here too, that the object has a certain function of complementation in relation to something that presents as a hole, even an abyss, in reality.

The question is whether there is a relation between the two, whether there is something in common between these fetishes and phobic objects.

However, in posing such questions in such terms, perhaps, without declining to broach these problems on the basis of the object relation, we ought to find in the phenomena themselves the opportunity and the starting point for a critique that – even if we submit to the interrogation that is pressed on us regarding the type-object, the ideal object, the functional object, indeed all these forms of the object that you may presume in mankind – does effectively lead us to tackle the question in this light. But then, let's not content ourselves with uniform explanations for a variety of phenomena. Let's focus our opening question upon what constitutes the essential functional difference between a phobia and a fetish, in so far as both are centred on the same backdrop of fundamental anxiety, where both one and the other are called upon by the subject as a protective measure, as a security measure.

It is precisely this that I have resolved to take as my point of departure to show you where we start from in our experience in order to reach these same problems. Indeed, this needs to be posed, not in a mythical fashion, nor in an abstract fashion, but in a direct fashion, in the way the objects are presented to us.

It is insufficient to speak about the object in general, or about an object that, by goodness knows what property of magical communication, would have the function of regularising relationships with every other object, as though the fact of having come to be a genital individual would be enough to resolve each and every question. For example, one such question is what one particular object might be for a genital individual, an object that doesn't strike me as having to be any the less enigmatic from the essentially biological viewpoint that is foregrounded there, an object of everyday human experience, namely a coin.

This object does not pose in and of itself the question of its object value. Doesn't the fact that, in a certain register, we might lose the coin as a means of exchange – or any other kind of regard for the exchange of any item whatsoever of human life transposed into its commodity value – introduce in umpteen different ways the question of what has effectively been resolved in Marxist theory by an altogether coterminous, though not synonymous, term, namely the fetish? In short, there is the notion of the fetish object and, if you like, the screen object. Likewise, we can only wonder why its rightful value is still not being accorded to the function of the constitution of an altogether singular reality on which, right at the start, Freud shed a truly piercing light, namely the notion of screen memories as what are especially constitutive of the past of each and every subject as such. All these questions deserve to be taken in themselves and on their own terms.

They should also be analysed in their mutual relations, because it is from these relations that the necessary distinctions between different planes can emerge, which will enable us to define, in a way that hangs together, why a phobia and a fetish are two different things.

What relation is there between the widespread use of the word fetish and the precise employment of the term to designate a sexual perversion? We are hereby introducing the subject of our next talk, which will be on phobias and fetishes.

It is along this path back to the experience that we will be able to establish anew the term object relations and restore its true value.

THE THREE FORMS OF THE LACK OF OBJECT

What is an obsessional?
The imaginary triad
Phallicism and the imaginary
Reality and Wirklichkeit
Mr Winnicott's transitional object

This week, with you in mind, I did some reading. I've been reading what psychoanalysts have written on what is going to be our subject this year, namely the object, and more specifically the genital object.

The genital object is, to call it by its name, woman. So, why not call it by its name?

I rewarded myself, therefore, by reading a number of texts on female sexuality. It would be more important for you to do this reading than for me. It would make you more at ease when it comes to understanding what I've been led to tell you on this subject. And then, what I have read is very instructive from yet further points of view, principally from the following. Human stupidity gives an idea of the infinite, said Renan. Well, I have to say that, had he lived in our times, he would surely have added – as do the theoretical ramblings of psychoanalysts.

Don't believe that I'm equating them with stupidity. I'm not. Rather, they belong to the realm of what may afford an idea of the infinite. Indeed, it is exceedingly striking to see what extraordinary difficulties the minds of different analysts have had to cope with in the wake of Freud's altogether sharp and astonishing statements.

What did Freud, ever on his own, contribute on this subject? What I shall tell you today will probably not go beyond this. Freud's contribution here is that the idea of a harmonious object that of its very nature would bring about the subject–object relationship is at absolute variance with experience. I won't even say analytic experience, but the common experience of relations between man and woman.

If harmony in this realm were not a problematic thing, there would be no analysis at all. Nothing is more precise than Freud's formulations on this matter. In this realm there is a wide gap, something that doesn't work out, though this doesn't mean that it suffices to define it. Freud positively affirms that things don't work out. You will find this affirmation in Civilization and Its Discontents and in one of the New Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis.

This leads us back, then, to asking ourselves about the object.

I remind you that what is commonly forgotten in regard to the notion of the object is nowhere more greatly accentuated than in the contours through which the experience and the expounding of Freudian doctrine locate and define this object.

The object first presents in a quest for the lost object. The object is always a re-found object, the object caught up itself in a quest. This stands in categorical opposition to the notion of an autonomous subject, which is what the idea of an object that would bring about a subject–object duality leads to.

Likewise, I underscored last time the notion of an object that is hallucinated against a backdrop of anguishing reality. This is a notion of the object such as it arises in the exercise of what Freud calls the primary system of pleasure. In complete contrast to this, in analytic practice there is the notion of the object that ultimately boils down to the real. It's a matter of re-finding the real. This object stands out, not against a backdrop of anxiety this time, but against a backdrop of common reality, as it were. The terminal point of the analytic search is to realise that there is no reason to hold this in fear. Fear is a term to be distinguished from the term anxiety.

Lastly, the third term under which the object becomes apparent when we trace it in Freud is that of imaginary reciprocity, namely, in any relationship with the object, the place of the term that is in the relation is simultaneously occupied by the subject. Identification with the object thus lies at the root of any relationship with the object.

In truth, this last point has not been forgotten, but it's clearly the point to which object-relations practice in the new-fangled analytic technique is most attached, resulting in what I shall call an imperialism of identification. Since you can identify with me, and since I can identify with you, out of the two of us the ego that best adapts to reality is surely the better model. Ultimately, the furtherance of the analysis would be dragged, in a pure stripping back, towards an identification with the analyst's ego. To show the extreme deviation that such partiality in the steering of the object relation can condition, I would like to illustrate this by recalling how practice with obsessional neurosis has been particularly exemplary in this regard.

As most of you here accept, obsessional neurosis is a structuring notion that can be expressed more or less as follows. What is an obsessional? All in all, he is an actor playing his part, carrying out a certain number of acts as though he were dead. It's a way of shielding himself from death. The game he plays is in some sense a lively game that consists in showing that he is invulnerable. To this end, he practises a sort of subduing that conditions his every approach to others. This can be seen in a sort of exhibiting of how far he can go in this practice that has every aspect of a game, including its illusory aspects. He exhibits how far this little other, which is his alter ego, his own double, can go, and does so before an Other who witnesses the spectacle in which he himself is a spectator. Therein lies the very possibility of the game and all the pleasure he takes in it. However, he doesn't know what place he occupies, and this is what is unconscious as far as the obsessional is concerned. He does what he does to distractive ends. He is able to glimpse this, and is well aware that the game is not being played where he is, which is why almost nothing of what occurs has genuine importance for him. But that he should know where he beholds all of this from is another matter.

Who, ultimately, calls the shots? We know that he does, but we will make countless mistakes if we don't know from where these shots are called. Hence the notion of the object, and of one significant object for this subject.

It would be quite wrong to believe that this object can be designated in any of the terms of a dual relationship. You are going to see now where this leads with the notion of the object relation that is developed by the author in question. It's quite clear that in this very complex situation, the notion of object is not given immediately because it takes part in an illusory game, a game of aggressive retaliation, a cheating game, which consists in steering as close as possible to death while keeping out of range of every blow, because the subject has in some sense killed his desire in advance, mortifying it, so to speak.

The notion of object is infinitely complex here, and deserves to be accentuated from one instant to the next so that at least we may know which object we are talking about. We shall try to furnish this notion of the object with a uniformity, which will allow us to find our way in our vocabulary.

This is a notion that, I won't say steals away, but rather presents itself as something difficult to circumscribe. To bolster our comparison, let's say that it's a matter of demonstrating something that the subject has articulated for the other spectator that he is, unknowingly, and at the site where he positions us as the transference advances.

I urge you to take up the case of the obsessive reported by the author I've been speaking about in order to see what to his mind constitutes the furtherance of the analysis. You will see that the way of handling the object relation in this case consists in doing something analogous to what would happen if you were to witness a circus routine where Auguste and Chocolat administer each other a series of simultaneous, alternating slaps.[1] It would consist in stepping down into the arena and forcing oneself to brave the fear of being smacked. In actual fact, it is the obsessional subject's aggressiveness that leads him to land each slap and makes the relation with him in the consultations an aggressive one. Whereupon the Ringmaster rolls up and says – Look. This is all quite unreasonable. Pack it in. Swallow your cane, each of you. That way you'll have it in the right place. You'll have interiorised it. Indeed, this is one way of resolving the situation and securing an outcome.

You can sing a little tune to this, the enduring song by N*, who was something of a genius. Those of you who never saw him when he was performing in one of the Parisian cabaret clubs cannot possibly form an idea of what he was capable, simply clowning around with a hat.[2] However, one will never understand a single thing, either about what here I am calling the somewhat sacred character of what we would be witnessing on such occasions, or about the forced exhibiting, however dark it may appear, but nor perhaps will one understand what the object relation means, strictly speaking, until, between the lines, there appears the profoundly oral character and backdrop of the imaginary object relation. This also enables us to see what can be narrowly and rigorously imaginary in a practice that is unable to escape from the laws of the imaginary, from this dual relationship that it takes as real, because in the end the culminating point of this object relation is the fantasy of phallic incorporation.

Why phallic? Not only does experience not follow the ideal notion that we may have of its accomplishment, but furthermore this notion only highlights its paradoxes all the more, to the extent that the full accomplishment of the dual relationship as such brings to the fore, the closer one gets to it, the imaginary object known as the phallus, as a privileged object. This is what I'm introducing today in the step I'm trying to get to you take.

The notion of object relations cannot be dealt with, cannot be understood, cannot even be put into practice, if one doesn't include the phallus as a third-party element. I won't call it a mediating element, because that would involve taking a step that we haven't yet taken together. I'm calling this to mind today, writ large in the following diagram which I gave you at the end of the last academic year as both a conclusion to the analysis of the signifier with which we carried out our exploration of psychosis, and as an introduction to what I'm putting forward this year concerning the object relation.[3]

The imaginary relationship, whichever it may be, is moulded on a certain relation that is effectively fundamental – the mother–child relation, with everything that is problematic therein. This relation certainly gives us the idea that a real relationship is at issue, and indeed this is the point to which all analysis of the analytic situation is currently heading. They have been trying ultimately to reduce it to something that can be conceived of as the development of mother–child relationships, and what thereafter in the early stages bears the traces and the reflections of this initial position.

It is impossible, however, even for those authors who have turned this into the base of the whole analytic genesis in the strict sense, to bring in this imaginary feature without what we may term the phallicism of the analytic experience revealing itself as a key point at the heart of the notion of the object relation. This is demonstrated by experience, and by the evolution of analytic theory. In particular, I will be trying to show you in the course of this lecture the impasses that result from every attempt to reduce this imaginary phallicism to anything whatsoever that is given in the real. Indeed, when one seeks the origin of the entire analytic dialectic in the absence of the trinity of terms – symbolic, imaginary, and real – ultimately one can refer only to the real.

To offer you a final remark, to put the final touch to my description of how the dual relationship is being conducted in a certain orientation and theorisation of the analytic experience, I shall again make reference to the leader article in the collective work I spoke to you about.

When the analyst, entering the obsessional's imaginary game, is insistent in making him acknowledge his aggressiveness, that is to say, in making him situate the analyst in the imaginary relationship, the same that earlier I described as that of reciprocations, we find in this text something that is offered as testimony of the subject's refusal, his misrecognition of the situation. This is the fact that he never wants to express his aggressiveness and only does so by way of a slight irritation provoked by the analyst's technical rigidity. The author confesses that he insists on perpetually bringing the subject back to the theme of aggressiveness, as though it were the central significant theme. He adds, tellingly, that in the end everybody knows that irritation and irony are aggressive by nature. Is it really so obvious that irritation is characteristic of aggressive relationships? We do know, however, that aggression can be provoked by any other feeling, and that for example it is not ruled out that a feeling of love may be the basis of a reaction of aggression. As for saying that a reaction like that of irony is aggressive by nature, this doesn't seem to me to be compatible with what everybody knows, namely that far from being an aggressive reaction, irony is above all a way of questioning. It's a mode of question. If there is an aggressive element, it is secondary to the structure of the element of questioning that there is in irony.

This shows you the kind of reductive perspective that such a conception of the object relation culminates in. Anyway, with this, I resolve not to speak to you any further on this matter.

On the other hand, we have now been led to the fundamental question as to relations between anyone and anything. We have to begin with this question because we are going to have to return to it. It will be our end point. The whole ambiguity of the question that arises around the object can be summarised as – is the object real or not?

We arrive at this question both along the path of the expanded vocabulary that we are using here – symbolic, imaginary, and real – and through the most immediate intuition.

When they speak to you about the object relation purely and simply along the lines of a point of access to the real, an access that the terminal point of analysis should constitute, what does this represent for you, as a spontaneous intuition? Is the object the real, or not? Is the object what is found in the real?

It's worth taking the trouble to ask oneself this, even without going into the problematic of phallicism that I'm introducing today, that is, without taking into account a truly prominent point in analytic experience, a major object around which the entire dialectic of individual development revolves, along with the entire dialectic of an analysis. We shall be seeing in greater detail that phallus and penis are not to be conflated. When in the 1920s and 1930s the notion of phallicism and of the phallic period fell into place around a great ruckus that occupied the whole of the analytic community, what was at stake was to draw a distinction between the penis as a real organ, with functions that can be defined by certain real coordinates, and the phallus in its imaginary function. Even if there were no more than that, still it is worth taking the trouble to ask ourselves what the notion of the object means.

It cannot be said that this object is not a supervalent object in the analytic dialectic, an object that the individual has an idea of as such. While it has never been formulated that the singling out of this object is, strictly speaking, conceivable solely on the plane of the imaginary, this represents no less how the notion of phallicism entails the extrication of this category of the imaginary. It will leap out at you from every line of what Freud contributed at a particular date, and from the responses of Helene Deutsch, Melanie Klein and Ernest Jones in particular.[4]

Before we move into this, however, let's ask ourselves what is meant by the relationship, the reciprocal position, of the object and the real. There is more than one way to broach this question because as soon as we do broach it we realise that the real carries more than one meaning. Some of you, I think, will let out an immediate sigh of relief – At last he's going to speak to us about the notorious real that so far has stayed in the shadows. Indeed, it should come as no surprise to us that the real is something that lies on the fringes of our experience.

This position in relation to the real is quite amply explained by the screen of our experience, the conditions of which are so artificial, contrary to what we are told when it is presented as being such a straightforward situation. None the less, we cannot do otherwise than to refer to the real when we theorise. What do we mean when we invoke the real? It is highly unlikely that each of us has the same notion of it at the outset, but it is also plausible that each of us is able to reach certain essential distinctions and dissociations to be applied to the handling of the term real, or reality, if we look closely at how it is used.

When one speaks about the real, one may be driving at several things. What is at issue first of all is the whole of what effectively occurs. This is the notion of reality that is implied in the German term Wirklichkeit, which advantageously discerns a function in reality that French can isolate but poorly. It is what implies in itself any possibility of effect, of Wirkung. It's the mechanism as a whole.

I shall just share a few reflections here in passing, to show the extent to which psychoanalysts have remained captive to categories that are utterly foreign to everything that their practice ought, in all appearance, to have introduced them to – with ease, I daresay – with respect to this very notion of reality. While it is conceivable, for a mind steeped in the tradition of mechanodynamics that reaches back to the eighteenth-century attempt to devise Man a Machine, with La Mettrie, that everything that happens at the level of mental life should require that we relate it to something that is posited as matter, how could this possess the slightest interest for an analyst? In what way could this possess the slightest interest when the very principle through which the analyst's technique and function is practised plays out through a succession of effects that are hypothetically accepted, if analyst he is, as having their own specific order? If he follows Freud, if he conceives of what directs the sense of the system as a whole, the perspective thereof that he must adopt is one of energetics.

Matter, this primitive Stoff, is so intriguing for the medical mind that people think they are actually saying something when they mindlessly assert that we, like all other doctors, posit an organic reality as the basis of everything that is brought to bear in analysis. Freud put is as simply as this. One just has to refer to where he said it and see the function it has. But in the end this remains a kind of need for reassurance. You can see analysts repeating it endlessly in their texts, like touching wood – In the end, it's quite clear that these are merely superficial mechanisms, and everything must ultimately be referred to things that perhaps we shall know one day, namely the basic matter of what lies at the origin of everything that happens. There is a kind of absurdity in this for an analyst, if indeed he accepts the realm of effectiveness he moves about in.

Allow me to draw a simple comparison to illustrate this. It's a little as though someone in charge of a hydroelectric power station on a wide river, the Rhine for instance, in an attempt to get you to understand what goes on in the machine, were to start going on about the time when the landscape was still untouched, when the Rhine flowed freely, and so on. However, it is the machine that is the source of the accumulation of energy, in this case electrical energy, which can thereafter be distributed and made available to consumers. What is accumulated bears the strictest relation to the machine, above all else. Saying that the energy was already there in a virtual state in the flow of the river doesn't get us anywhere. Strictly speaking, it means nothing, because energy only starts to concern us in this instance from the moment it begins to accumulate, and it only accumulates from the moment the machines are set running in a certain way. Yes, they are kept going by a sort of permanent propulsion that comes from the river's flow, but referring to this flow as though it were the primal organisation of this energy is an idea that can only occur to someone who is utterly foolish. It amounts to conflating this energy with a notion that strictly speaking belongs to the realm of Mana. The realm of energy, even force, is quite different. Well, the same foolishness is to be met in anyone who, by any means possible, seeks out the permanence of what is ultimately accumulated as the element of Wirkung, of a possible Wirklichkeit, in something that has been there in some kind for all eternity.

In other words, this kind of urge that we have to conflate the Stoff, or primal matter, or forward thrust, or flow, or tendency, with what is really at stake in the exercise of analytic reality represents nothing less than a misrecognition of symbolic Wirklichkeit. The conflict, the dialectic, the organisation and the structure of the elements that are assembled and composed, lend what is at issue an altogether different energetic scope. Keeping up this urge to speak of this ultimate reality as though it existed elsewhere than in this exercise itself amounts to misrecognising the specific reality that we move about in. I may verily qualify this reference as a superstitious one. It's a sort of legacy of the organicist postulate, which in the analytic perspective can hold absolutely no meaning whatsoever. I'm going to show you that it carries no more meaning in the realm where Freud appears to be touching upon it.

A different use of the notion of reality is made in analysis, which is far more important and has nothing to do with the previous one. This other question of reality is the one that is brought into play in the twofold principle of the pleasure principle and the reality principle. Here, something utterly distinct is at issue, because it's quite clear that the pleasure principle is not something that is carried through in a way that is any less real than the reality principle. I even think that analysis is designed to demonstrate the contrary. Its use of the term reality is quite different.

There is a rather striking contrast here. While this use initially proved to be exceedingly fruitful, with the furtherance of analysis the terms of this primary system and secondary system in the realm of the psyche turned out to be more problematic, but in a way that was tremendously elusive. To perceive the distance that has been covered between the first use of the opposition of these two principles and the point we have now reached, through a certain sliding, we almost need to refer – and we do once in a while – to the child who says that the emperor is wearing no clothes. Is this child a simpleton? Is he a genius? Is he a cheerful soul? Is he a brute? No one will ever know. He is surely a fairly liberating fellow.

Well, this happens once in a while. We see analysts coming back to a kind of primitive intuition, realising that everything people have been saying explains nothing. This is what occurred to Mr Winnicott in a short article he wrote to speak about what he calls Transitional Objects – we should think of these as objects in transition – and Transitional Phenomena.

Mr Winnicott simply notes that as we start becoming more interested in the mother's function and start deeming her to be absolutely primordial and decisive in the infant's apprehension of reality, that is, as we start replacing the impersonal and dialectical opposition between the reality principle and the pleasure principle with something to which we have given actors, subjects – they undoubtedly are exceedingly model subjects, who look far more like bit parts or imaginary puppets, but this is what we've come to – the pleasure principle starts to be identified with a particular relation to an object, namely the maternal breast. The reality principle, meanwhile, starts to be identified with the fact that the child has to learn to go without the breast.

Mr Winnicott has noted quite rightly that if all goes well – because it is important that all should go well – we are to make all that goes badly divert into a primordial anomaly, into frustration, this term which is becoming the key term in our dialectic. Winnicott notes that for things to turn out well, namely for the infant not to be traumatised, everything should happen as though the mother operates by always being there at just the right moment, that is, precisely by coming to lay out in just the right place, at the moment of the infant's delusional hallucination, the real object that fulfils him. Thus, to start with, there isn't any kind of distinction in the ideal mother–child relationship between the hallucination of the maternal breast, which arises in principle from the notion that we have of the primary system, and the encounter with the real object at issue.

Therefore, if all goes well, the infant has no means of distinguishing between what belongs to the realm of the satisfaction that in principle is rooted in hallucination – which is bound to the exercise and functioning of the primary system – and the apprehension of the real that effectively fulfils and satisfies him. What is at issue, then, is for the mother gradually to teach the child to tolerate these frustrations, and by the same stroke to perceive, in the form of a certain inaugural tension, the difference that lies between reality and illusion. This difference can be brought to bear only along the path of disillusionment, when every now and then reality does not coincide with the hallucination that has arisen from desire.

Winnicott simply notes, first of all, that in this dialectic it is inconceivable that anything whatsoever could be elaborated that would go further than the notion of an object that strictly corresponds to primary desire. The wide variation of objects, as much fantasmatic as instrumental, which crop up during the development of the field of human desire, is strictly unthinkable in this dialectic once you start embodying them in two real actors, namely the mother and the child. Second, it is a fact of experience that, even in the youngest infants, we see these objects appearing which Winnicott calls transitional, because we cannot say on which side they lie in this reduced and embodied dialectic between hallucination and real object.

All objects in the infant's play are transitional objects. The infant doesn't need to be given toys in the strict sense, because he turns anything that falls in his hands into a transitional object. And we do not challenge the infant in regard to subjectivity or objectivity just here where there is the transitional object. It is of a different nature, the limit of which Winnicott does not cross by naming it thus. We shall simply call these objects imaginary.

In articles that are certainly very tentative, full of digressions and confusion, we can see all the same that their authors are invariably led back to these objects when they seek to explain the origin of a fact like the existence of sexual fetishes. They are led to see, as far as they can, what the common points are between the infant's object and the fetish, which comes to the forefront of objectal requirements on account of the great satisfaction that there can be for a subject, namely sexual satisfaction. They are always on the look out for any somewhat preferential handling on the part of the infant of some trifling object – a handkerchief pilfered from his mother, a corner of a blanket, some incidental piece of reality left within reach of his clasp – and which appears during this period that, despite here being called transitional, does not constitute an intermediate period but a permanent period in the child's development. They are thereby led almost to conflate these two kinds of object, without asking any questions about the distance that can lie between the eroticisation of the fetish object and the first appearance of the object as an imaginary object.

What is forgotten in this dialectic – a forgetting that of course calls upon these forms of supplementation that I'm accentuating in connection with Winnicott's article – is one of the most essential mainsprings of the entire analytic experience, and has been so since the very beginning, namely the notion of the lack of object.

We can never do without a notion of the lack of object as a central matter in our concrete practice of analytic theory. The missing object is not a negative, but the very mainspring of the subject's relationship with the world.

From the start, analysis, the analysis of neurosis, has begun with the altogether paradoxical notion of castration, which we may say has still not been fully developed.

We believe we are still speaking about it in the same way it was spoken of in Freud's time. This is utterly mistaken. We speak about it less and less, and in this we are wrong. What we have been speaking about much more is the notion of frustration. There is yet a third term, which is starting to be spoken of. More precisely, we are going to see how this notion has necessarily been introduced, by what path and by what requirements. This is the notion of privation.

On no account are these three things equivalent. To distinguish between them I would like to make a few remarks simply to try to help you first to understand what this is.

We should begin with the one that is most familiar to us by use, namely the notion of frustration.

What difference is there between a frustration and a privation? Let's take this as our point of departure, because Jones has gone so far as to introduce the notion of privation and to say that these two notions are experienced in the same way in the psyche. This is something that is tremendously brazen. It's quite clear, however, that we shall have to refer to privation to the extent that while phallicism, the requirement of the phallus, is, as Freud says it is, the major point of the entire playing out of the imaginary in the conflictive progress that the analysis of the subject describes, when it comes to a very different thing from the imaginary, namely the real, we can speak only of privation. This is not where the phallic requirement is brought to bear, because one of the things that appears most problematic is how a being presented as a totality can feel deprived of something that by definition this being does not have. We shall say, therefore, that privation is essentially something that of its nature as a lack is a real lack. It's a hole.

The notion that we have of frustration, simply by referring to the use that is effectively made of these notions when we speak about them, is the notion of detriment. It is an injury, a harm done, and from the way we are used to allowing it to play out in our dialectic we can see that it is only ever an imaginary detriment. Frustration is, in essence, the domain of revendication. It concerns something that is desired and is not held to, but rather which is desired without reference to any possibility of satisfaction or acquisition. Frustration is, in and of itself, the domain of unbridled demands, of lawless demands. The crux of the notion of frustration, insomuch as it is one of the categories of lack, is an imaginary detriment. It is to be located on the imaginary plane.

On the basis of these two remarks it is perhaps easier for us to see that the essential nature of castration, its Wesen, has been neglected and abandoned far more than it has been dealt with in depth.

Freud introduced castration in a way that coordinated it fully with the notion of primordial Law, of the fundamental Law that there is in the incest prohibition and in the structure of the Oedipus complex. If we think from where we are now about the meaning of what Freud first stated, it was by taking a kind of mortal leap into experience that he placed so paradoxical a notion as castration at the heart of the major, decisive and shaping crisis of the Oedipus complex. We can only remark on this after the event, because it certainly is remarkable that we think only of not speaking about it. Castration can only be classified in the category of symbolic indebtedness.

With symbolic indebtedness, imaginary detriment, and real absence – the hole – we have what allows us to locate these three elements that we shall call the three terms of reference for the lack of the object.

For some, this will undoubtedly seem to be something that cannot be taken on board unreservedly. They would be right in that, in reality, for it to be valid we are going to have to cling firmly to the central notion of this having to do with categories of the lack of object. I'm saying lack of object and not object because if we position ourselves at the level of the object we shall be able to ask ourselves what the object is that lacks in each of the three cases.

This is most immediately apparent at the level of castration. What lacks at the level of castration – in so far as it is constituted by symbolic indebtedness, something that is recognised by law and which lends it both its support and its inverse, namely punishment – is quite clearly not, in our analytic experience, a real object. Only in the Manusmṛti is it said that he who has slept with his mother must cut off his own testicles and, cupping them in his hand, walk in a westerly direction until he drops down dead.[5] Until further notice, we have observed such things only in exceedingly rare cases that have nothing to do with our experience and which appear to us to require explanations that still belong to a very different realm from that of the structuring and normalising mechanisms put at stake in our experience.

Here, the object is imaginary. The castration at issue is always the castrating of an imaginary object. It was this commonality, between the imaginary character of the object of castration and the fact that frustration is an imaginary lack of the object, that made it easier for us to believe that frustration was something that could allow us to proceed more easily to the heart of these problems. Yet it is by no means sure that lack, object, and even a third term that we shall call agent, stand on the same level within these categories. In fact, the object of castration is an imaginary object, and this is what ought to make us ask what is meant by this phallus that it took so long to identify as such.

The object of frustration, on the other hand, is well and truly real, even though frustration itself is wholly imaginary. The infant, the choice subject of our dialectic of frustration, is always missing a real object. This will help us to perceive something that is obvious – and which requires a slightly more metaphysical handling of the terms than people usually have when referring to precisely those criteria of reality we were speaking about earlier – namely, the object of privation is never anything but a symbolic object.

This is absolutely clear. How could something not be in its place, not be in a place where, precisely, it is not? From the point of view of the real this means absolutely nothing. Everything that is real is always and necessarily in its place, even when it is being interfered with. The property of the real is first and foremost that of carrying its place around with it on the soles of its shoes. You can disrupt the real as much as you like, it remains the case that, after our bodies have been blown apart, they will still be in their place, their place of fragments. The absence of something in the real is purely symbolic. An object is missing from its place to the extent that we would have defined it by law as having to be there. There is no finer reference for this than the following. Think of what happens when you ask for a book in a library and you're told that it's missing from its place. It might be just alongside, but it is no less the case that it's missing from its place. It is, in principle, invisible. This means that the librarian lives entirely in a symbolic world. When we speak of privation, a symbolic object is at issue, and nothing else.

This might appear somewhat abstract, but you will see how useful this will be to us hereafter when it comes to detecting those sleights of hand whereby mock solutions are given to false problems, in other words, those sleights of hand whereby, in the ensuing part of the dialectic that is debated in an effort to break away from what appears to be intolerable, namely the utterly different development in men and in women of what is called sexuality, in analytic terms, desperate bids are made to bring these two terms back to a single principle. Yet perhaps from the very first there was something that permits of explaining and appreciating in a very clear and straightforward fashion why their respective development will be so different.

I simply want to add something that is also going to have a certain scope, and this is the notion of an agent. Here I'm making a leap that would mean having to come back to the imaginary triad of mother, child and phallus, but I don't have time for that. I simply want to complete the picture. The agent will also play a part in the lack of object.

Regarding frustration, we have the paramount notion that the mother plays this part. But is the agent of frustration symbolic, imaginary or real? And what is the agent of castration? Is it symbolic, imaginary or real? What is the agent of privation? Is it ultimately something that has no real existence whatsoever, as I said earlier? These are questions that at the very least warrant the posing.

Nearing the end of this session, I am going to leave these questions open. While the answer could perhaps be gone into here, even deduced, in an altogether formal manner, either way it would be unsatisfactory at the point we've reached because the notion of agent is something that lies completely outside the framework of what we have confined ourselves to today. Today we have dealt with a first question concerning the relations between the object and the real. We have stayed within the categories of the imaginary and the real, whereas the agent plainly belongs to another realm.

You can see nevertheless that the question of qualifying the agent at each of these three tiers is a question that is plainly connoted by this initial construction of the phallus.

THE SIGNIFIER AND THE HOLY SPIRIT

The body image and its signifier
The power station of the Id
Signifier, signified and death
The signifying transmission of the object
Its imaginary discordance

Yesterday evening you heard an exposé by Madame Dolto on the body image. Circumstances were such that I was unable to go beyond a general statement of how well I thought of it. Had it fallen to me to speak about it, it would have been to say where it stands in relation to what we are doing here, that is, all in all, teaching. This is something I am loath to do in a context of scientific work that really is of a very different kind, and I'm not upset at not having had to speak about it.

If we take as our point of departure this body image in the way it was presented to us yesterday evening, I think that, to situate it in relation to what we are doing in this seminar, you are all quite well enough aware of something that is obvious above all else, namely that this image is not an object.

When an object was spoken of yesterday, it was in an attempt to define stages of development, and the notion of object is indeed important in this regard. It is still no less the case, however, not only that the image of the body is not an object, but also that it cannot even become an object. This simple remark, which no one stated except indirectly, will better allow you to situate the body image in contrast to other imaginary formations.

In the analytic experience we do indeed deal with objects that can lead us to pose the question as to their imaginary nature. I'm not saying that these objects are imaginary, but rather that this is the question we are asking here. It is the central point at which we position ourselves in order to introduce at the clinical level what is of interest to us in the notion of the object. This doesn't mean that we subscribe to the hypothesis of the imaginary object, nor does it mean that it is our point of departure. Actually, it is so scarcely our point of departure that this is precisely what we are questioning.

You are already familiar with this possibly imaginary object in the way it is evinced in the analytic experience. To anchor your ideas about it, I have taken two examples which I said I would be focusing on – the phobia and the fetish.

You would be wrong to believe that these objects have already yielded their secrets. Far from it. Irrespective of the exercise, the acrobatics, the contortions, the fantasmatic genesis, which people have given themselves over to, it still remains rather mysterious that during certain periods of children's lives, whether they are male or female, they feel they have to be afraid of lions, despite the lion not being an object they commonly meet in their experience. It is difficult to conjure up its form, or any kind of primitive feature that would, for example, be inscribed in the image of the body. One may try to, one may do all one can, but even so a residue remains. The residues in scientific explanations are invariably what are most fruitful for our consideration. In any case, we certainly won't make any progress by skirting round them.

Similarly, you have been able to note how, across the board, the number of sexual fetishes remains fairly limited. Why so? Apart from shoes, which play such a stunning role that one may wonder why more attention is not paid to this, we find scarcely more than garters, stockings, brassieres and the like, all of which cling to the skin. Chief among them, however, is the shoe, and there too there is a residue. How could one be a fetishist in the time of Catullus?[1]

We shall ask ourselves whether these objects are imaginary. How might we conceive of their kinetic value in the economy of libido? Can we do so only on the basis of indicating what might emerge from a point of origin? Ultimately this always has to do with the notion of an ectopia with respect to a certain typical relation. Do these objects arise from a typical relation of so-called stages that follow on one from the next?

Whichever the case may be, if these are the objects you were hearing about yesterday evening, then it's clear that they represent something that puts us in quite a bind. You have only to consider the interest generated in the audience, and the extent of the discussion, to appreciate how enthralling this is. On first approach, we could say that these objects are constructions that order, organise and articulate a certain lived experience. What is altogether striking however is the use that is made of this – and one doesn't doubt for a second its effectiveness – by the operator, Mme Dolto on this occasion. This is quite certainly something that can be situated at the outset, and in a fully comprehensible way, only on the basis of the notions of signifier and signified. Mme Dolto uses this object, or what is supposed to be such, this image, as a signifier. It is as a signifier that the image comes into play in her dialogue. It is as a signifier that it represents something. This is particularly apparent in the fact that not one of them is supported on its own. It is always in relation to another of them that each one assumes its crystallising value that orients and penetrates the subject at stake, namely the infant.

So, here we are, brought back once again to the notion of the signifier.

Since here it's a matter of teaching, and since there is nothing more important than misunderstandings, I would like to begin by saying that I have observed, both directly and indirectly, that a few things I said last time when I was speaking about reality were not understood.

I said that psychoanalysts have such a mythical notion of reality that it overlaps the notion that for decades has been hindering any progress in psychiatry. This is precisely the hindrance that one might have thought psychoanalysis would deliver them from, namely that of seeking out reality in something whose character would be more material. To make myself understood, I gave the example of the hydroelectric power station, and I said that it was as though someone who is involved in whatever changes the station might undergo, its up-scaling or downscaling, its shutdowns and repairs, always thought they could reason in a valid way about what is to be done with it by referring to the prime matter that comes into play to set it running, namely the downward flow of water.

Whereupon someone came up to me to say – what are you going to get out of that? You can well imagine that for the engineer this run of water counts for everything. You speak of energy accumulated in the power station, but this energy is no less than the transformation of the potential energy that is given in advance at the site where the power station is to be located. When the engineer has measured the height of the water upstream in relation to the outflow point, he can make his calculation. Everything is already given at the level of the potential energy. The power of the hydroelectric plant is already determined by prior conditions.

This objection calls for a number of remarks. The first is that having to speak to you about reality, I started by defining it as Wirklichkeit, as the efficacy of the system as a whole, in this instance the psychical system. I then wanted to specify for you the mythical character of a certain way of conceiving of this reality, which I laid out for you by means of the example of the power station. I didn't manage to get to the third point, which is a yet further perspective from which the theme of the real can present, namely the real that is there before we are constantly reckoning with it.

Of course, this is precisely yet another way of considering reality. Considering what is there prior to when a certain symbolic functioning is brought to bear is what is most substantial in the mirage harboured in the objection that was levelled at me. In truth, on no account am I denying that there is something that was there before. For instance, before the advent of the I, there was something else. The Id was there. It's simply a matter of finding out what this Id is.

So, in the case of the power station, I'm being told that what was there before is, effectively, energy. I never said any different. But energy and natural reality are worlds apart, because energy only begins to be taken into account once you start measuring it. And you only dream of measuring it once these power stations are up and running. Thenceforth, you have to make numerous calculations, one of which is indeed the energy that you will have at your disposal. This notion of energy is effectively constructed upon the necessity imposed by a civilisation of production that seeks to balance the books when it comes to the labour necessary to obtain from it this available remuneration of efficacy.

For instance, you always measure this energy between two reference points. There is no absolute energy of the natural reservoir. There is an energy of the reservoir in relation to the lower elevation to which the flowing liquid will travel when you have added a spillway to this reservoir. But the spillway all by itself will not allow for any calculation of energy. The energy will be calculable in relation to the lower elevation.

However, the question does not lie here. The question is that certain natural conditions have to be realised in order for it to be even faintly worthwhile calculating the energy. Any difference in elevation in running water, even if these are mere brooks or even driblets, will always potentially hold a certain value of energy in reserve, but this is of strictly no interest to anyone. To spell it right out, there has to be something in nature that presents the different materials that will come into play in the running of the machine, which are in a certain fashion privileged and, quite frankly, signifying. There have to be, in nature, certain privileged things that present themselves as useable, signifying and measurable, to enable the plant to be installed. On the path of a system that is taken to be signifying, this is obviously something that on no account is to be contested.

What is important is the comparison I'm making with the psychical system. Let's see now how it takes shape.

Freud was led by the notion of energetics to designate a notion that we have to use in analysis in a way that would be comparable with the notion of energy. This is a notion that, just like energy, is entirely abstract and consists solely in the fact that it can posit, in analysis, yet in a virtual way, a simple bid for a principle designed to allow a certain leeway in thinking. This is strictly the energy that was introduced by the notion of equivalence, that is, the notion of a common measure between manifestations that present as being qualitatively very different. This notion of energy is precisely the notion of libido.

Nothing is less anchored in a material underpinning than the notion of libido in analysis. It is marvelled at, in the Three Essays on Sexuality, how small a modification was made necessary in Freud's hypothesis – the first time, in 1905, speaking about the biological underpinning of libido – by the discovery of the sex hormones. There is no marvel here. It means that, in either case, when it comes to libido, Freud attaches no importance to this reference to a chemical factor, strictly speaking. Freud spells this out. Whether there is one libidinal substance or several – one whose presence produces a male sexual excitation and another substance which produces a female one – he says that for us it is a matter of indifference whether there is a single sexually exciting substance in the body or two or countless numbers of them. Whichever is the case, analytic experience makes it necessary for us to think with a single libido. In this way, he locates libido on a plane that is, if I may say so, neutralised, as paradoxical as the term may seem.

Libido is this something that will link the behaviour of two beings, for example in a way that will ascribe to them the active position or the passive position. However, Freud tells us that in every case, even in the passive position, we take this libido as having active effects. Indeed, to adopt a passive position, a certain activeness is required. Thus, Freud comes to indicate that, ipso facto, libido takes on an aspect that presents only in this effective and active form, and is thus invariably rather akin to the masculine position. He goes so far as to say that only the masculine form of libido is within our reach.

How paradoxical all this would be, were it not merely a notion that is there simply to allow us to embody and to support the particular type of liaison that occurs on what is strictly speaking the level of the imaginary. It is what binds the behaviour of each living being in the presence of another living being by what are called bonds of desire, that is, all the yearning that is one of the essential mainsprings of Freudian thought when it comes to organising what is at issue in any line of behaviour in sexuality.

We tend to regard the Es as an agency that bears the strongest relation to the drive tendencies, the instincts and libido. But what is the Es? And to what does the comparison with the power station allow us to compare it? Well, precisely to the power station as seen by someone who has absolutely no idea how it works. The uninstructed person who sees it might indeed think that it is the genie in the current who has started playing around inside, transforming water into light or force.

The Es is what, through the intermediary of the Other's message, is liable to become I.[2] This is the best definition there can be of the Es.

If analysis has brought us something, it is the following. The Es is not a physical reality, nor is it merely what was there before. The Es is organised and articulated as the signifier is organised and articulated.

This is also true for what the machine produces. All the force that is already there can be transformed, with the slight difference, nevertheless, that it is not only transformed but accumulated as well. This is even what is essentially interesting in the fact that the plant is a hydroelectric power station and not simply a hydraulic pumping station, for example. Of course, there is all this energy, but nevertheless no one can challenge the fact that when the plant has been constructed there is a palpable difference, not only in the landscape, but in the real.

The plant was not constructed through the intervention of the Holy Spirit. More precisely, it was constructed through the intervention of the Holy Spirit, and if you have any doubt about this, you're wrong.

I'm producing this theory of the signifier and the signified precisely to remind you of the presence of the Holy Spirit, which is absolutely essential for the furthering of our understanding of analysis.

Let's take this up at a different level, at the level of the reality principle and the pleasure principle.

In what respect is there an opposition between the two systems, primary and secondary? If you stick to what defines them when they are looked at from the outside, you can say the following. What occurs at the level of the primary system is governed by the pleasure principle, that is, by the tendency to return to rest, while what occurs at the level of the reality system is defined purely and simply by that which forces the subject into what is called exterior reality, conducting him to make a detour. Yet nothing in these definitions gives us a sense of what in practice will emerge from the conflictive and dialectical character of the use of these two terms, simply in the concrete use that you make of them on a day-to-day basis. You never fail to make use of them in this fashion, with each of the two systems, endowed as they are with a particular indication that is in some way its own specific paradox. This paradox is often eluded, but is never left out in practice.

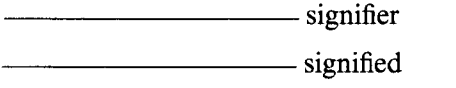
The paradox of the pleasure principle is that what presents at this level is linked, as indeed is pointed out to you, to the law of a return to the state of rest, to the tendency towards rest. Nevertheless, what is striking, and this is why Freud put it in a categorical way in his text, is that he introduced the notion of libido because pleasure, in its concrete sense, is linked not only to rest but to yearning, to the elevation of a desire. The word in German is Lust, with the ambiguous meaning that Freud underscores, both pleasure and yearning,[3] which are indeed two things that can appear contradictory but which are no less efficaciously linked in experience.

A no lesser paradox is found at the level of reality. Just as at the level of the pleasure principle there is, on one side, the return to rest, but on the other, yearning, so too at the level of reality is there not only the reality that one bumps into, but also the principle of edging, of taking a detour through reality.

This appears more clearly if, correlatively to the existence of these two principles, we bring in the two terms that bind them together in a way that allows for their dialectical functioning, namely the two tiers of speech such as they are expressed in the notions of signifier and signified.

I have already placed the course of the signifier, or of concrete discourse, for example, in a kind of parallel superposition over the course of the signified, in which and as which the continuity of lived experience presents itself, the flow of tendencies within a subject and between subjects.



This presentation[4] is all the more valid given that nothing may be conceived of, not only in speech or in language but in the very functioning of everything that presents as a phenomenon in analysis, unless we accept the essential possibility of a perpetual sliding of the signified under the signifier, and of the signifier over the signified. Nothing in the analytic experience can be explained except in reference to this fundamental schema.

This schema entails that what is the signifier of one thing may at any moment become the signifier of something else, and that what presents in the subject's yearnings, tendencies and libido, is always branded with the mark of a signifier. In so far as it concerns us, there is nothing else. There might be something else in the drive and in yearning that is not branded in any way by the signifier, but we have no access to it. Nothing is accessible to us unless it is branded by this mark of the signifier, which is introduced into natural movement, into desire, or into the particularly expressive term demand to which the English language has recourse as a primal expression of appetite, of exigency, even though it is not marked by laws that are specific to the signifier. Thus, yearning becomes what is signified.

The intervention of the signifier poses a problem that earlier led me to remind you about the Holy Spirit. The year before last, we saw what this means for us and what it means in Freud's thought and teaching. This Holy Spirit is, on the whole, the coming into existence of the signifier.

This is undoubtedly what Freud brings us under the term death instinct. What is at stake is the limit of what can be signified, which can never be reached by any living being, save in exceptional cases because we meet it only in the last-gasp writings of a certain philosophical experience. This is all the same something to be found virtually at the limit of man's reflection on his life as what allows him to glimpse death as the absolute and unsurpassable condition of his existence, as Heidegger puts it. Man's existence in the world, at any rate his potential relations with the signifier as a whole, is bound very precisely to this possibility of the suppression, the bracketing off, of everything that is lived.

What lies at the bottom of the existence of the signifier, of its presence in the world, is something that we will put there, and which is this efficient surface of the signifier as something where it reflects in some way what may be called the last word of the signified, that is, of life, of lived experience, of the flux of emotions and libido. It is death, insomuch as this is the support, the base, the intervention of the Holy Spirit through which the signifier exists.

Is this signifier, which has its own laws that may or may not be recognised in any given phenomenon, what is designated here in the Es? We ask this question, and we answer it. To understand anything of what we do in analysis, we have to answer in the affirmative.

The Es that is at issue in analysis is the signifier that is already there in the real, the uncomprehended signifier. It's already there, but it's a signifier, and not some confused and primitive property of goodness knows what pre-set harmony, this being loosely the hypothesis that is always hauled out by those I would unhesitatingly describe as feeble-minded.

Foremost among these is a certain Dr Ernest Jones. I'll be telling you presently how he tackles the issue, for example, of the early development of women and their infamous castration complex, which has posed an unsolvable problem to all analysts whenever it rears its head.

The error is to start off from the idea that because there are, as one says, needle and thread, so there are also girl and boy, and so there can be the same pre-set harmony between them, such that should some difficulty arise, it can only be due to some secondary disorder, some defence process, or some purely accidental and contingent occurrence. When one imagines that the unconscious means that whatever lies in one subject is designed to perceive what must respond to it in another, one is simply presupposing the notion of a primitive harmony.

This notion can be contrasted with Freud's altogether straightforward remark in his Three Essays on Sexuality concerning what is such an important theme in child development in respect of these sexual impressions, namely that it's a great pity that things are not laid out in such a way that guiderails leading to man's open access to woman[5] would be installed and signposted in advance. On no account is this an encounter in which the only obstacles are those that may crop up along the way. On the contrary, Freud asserts that the subject's infantile sexual theories, those that will leave their mark on the entire development and history of the relation between the sexes, are linked to the first maturity of the genital stage that occurs before the full development of the Oedipus complex, namely the so-called phallic phase.

This phase is called phallic not in the name of a joining of some sort of fundamental equality at the level of energetics, which is there solely for the convenience of thought. It's not on account of there being only one libido. Rather, it is because this time, on the imaginary plane, there is a single primary representative of the genital state and stage, and this is the phallus as such.

The phallus is neither wholly nor merely the full male genital apparatus. The phallus is excepted, says Freud, from the other part of the male genitals, the testes, say. The erect image of the phallus is what is crucial here. There is only one. There is no other choice but a virile image or castration.

I'm not enshrining Freud's term. I'm telling you that this is the starting point that Freud offers us when he performs this reconstruction. In relation to everything that came before, the Three Essays did indeed set off in search of natural references for the idea which had been uncovered in analysis, but what analysis underscores is precisely that there are a whole host of accidental occurrences that are far from being as natural as all that.

Furthermore, we posit what I'm laying out here as the principle behind the analytic experience, namely that it begins with the notion that there is something of the signifier already installed and already structured. A power station is already up and running. You are not the one who has made this power station. It is language, which has been functioning here for as long as you can remember. Literally, you cannot remember further back. I'm speaking about the history of the whole of humanity. For as long as there have been functioning signifiers, subjects have been organised in their psychical systems by the specific play of the signifier. This is precisely what means that the Es of what is already given, which is something you will seek out in the depths, is not as natural as all that, and even less so than images. Indeed, the existence in nature of the hydroelectric power station, constructed through the intervention of the Holy Spirit, stands in stark contrast to the notion of nature.

The analytic position inheres in this scandal. When we approach a subject, we know that already in nature there is something that is his Es and which, ipso facto, is structured in accordance with a signifying articulation that leaves its mark – its imprints, its contradictions, its profound difference from natural coaptations – on everything that is brought to bear on this subject.

I thought I ought to remind you of these positions, which strike me as fundamental. I note that I placed the signifier behind this ultimate reality, which is completely veiled with respect to what is signified. Moreover, the use of the signifier also entails the possibility that nothing of what is signified exists. This is none other than the death instinct, the awareness that life is completely obsolete and improbable. Here we have a whole host of notions that have nothing to do with any kind of living exercise, because any living exercise consists precisely of making one's own little way in existence by falling exactly in line with all those who have come before us.

The existence of the signifier is bound to nothing other than the fact – for it is a fact – that discourse exists and is introduced into the world against a backdrop that is more or less familiar or misconstrued. Yet it is curious all the same that Freud was led by the analytic experience not to be able to do otherwise than to spell this out by saying that if the signifier functions, then it is against the backdrop of a particular experience of death.

This experience has nothing to do with any kind of lived experience. If our commentary on Beyond the Pleasure Principle two years ago was able to show something, then it was that what is there at issue is a reconstruction, which is prompted by the fact of certain paradoxes that in experience are inexplicable, that is to say, by the fact that the subject is led to behave in an essentially signifying fashion, repeating indefinitely something that for him is, strictly speaking, deathly.

Conversely, just as this death is reflected here at the bottom of the signified, so there is a whole series of things in the signified, things that are there but which have been imprinted by the signifier. These are precisely the things that are at issue, namely certain elements that are linked to something that is just as profoundly engaged in the signified, and this is the body. There are a number of elements, of accidental occurrences of the body, that amount to experiential givens. Just as in nature certain natural reservoirs are already there, so too in the signifier there are certain elements that are taken up in the signifier in order to furnish it with, as it were, its first weapons. These elements are things that are ungraspable in the extreme, and yet they are irreducible. Among them is the phallic term, the pure and simple erection. The upright stone is one such example. The notion of the erect human body is another. Thus, a number of elements are each linked more or less to bodily stature, and not merely to the lived experience of the body. They constitute the first elements, and are effectively borrowed from experience, but completely transformed by the fact that they are symbolised. Symbolised means that they are introduced into what characterises the bond of the signifier as such, the signifier being something that is articulated in keeping with its own logical laws.

I led you back to the first of these logical laws in connection with the death instinct, at the very least getting you to play the game of odds-and-evens, in order to remind you that what these laws finally boil down to – that is, the pluses and minuses and their groupings in twos and threes within a temporal sequence – is that there are ultimate laws that are the laws of the signifier. These laws are of course implicit, wherever you start off from, but it is impossible not to encounter them.

Let's come back now to where we left things last time, namely at the level of the analytic experience.

The central object relation, the one that is dynamically creative, is that of lack. At the level of the analytic experience, every Findung of the object is, Freud tells us, a Wiederfindung.

One oughtn't to read the Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality as though it were a book written in one go. Admittedly, not a single one of Freud's major works went unrevised – they all include added notes – but there are very few textual modifications. The Traumdeutung, for instance, was expanded without anything of its original balance being altered. However, the first thing you have to bear in mind should you read the first edition of the Three Essays is that you won't get over it, so to speak, because you won't recognise any of what you think of as the familiar themes of the Three Essays from your usual reading of the book, that is to say, with the additions that were made many years later, chiefly in 1915. Everything that has to do with the pregenital development of libido could be conceived of only after the appearance of the theory of narcissism. At any rate, it was never included in the Three Essays before the modification of everything that comprised the sexual theory of childhood, with its major misunderstandings that consist, in particular, in Freud's telling us that the child has no notion of coition or of begetting. This is their essential failing. That this should have also been repeated after 1915 is due largely to the fact of a notion that only saw light of day after the final edition of the Three Essays in 1920, in the 1923 article on Die infantile Genitalorganisation.[6] This crucial element of genitality in development remains beyond the confines of the Three Essays, which don't quite come to this. Their progress, in this research on the pregenital relation as such, can only be explained by the importance of sexual theories and the libido theory itself.

The chapter entitled The Libido Theory concerns the narcissistic notion, along with the discovery and origin, and even the very idea, of the theory of libido. Freud tells us that we can account for all this when we possess the notion of an Ich-libido as a reservoir of libido that constitutes objects. He adds that we can do no more than peep at this reservoir over its walls. In sum, it is in the notion of narcissistic tension as such, that is to say, in a relation between man and image, that we may form the idea of a common measure. At the same time, we have an idea of the central reserve from which any objectal relation is established insomuch as it will be fundamentally imaginary. In other words, one of these essential articulations is the subject's fascination with the image. All things considered, this is an image that is only ever an image that he bears within himself. This is the last word on the theory of narcissism as such.

So, everything that thereafter took its bearing from this, heading in the direction of acknowledging an organising value in fantasies, is something that is backed up, not at all by the idea of a pre-set harmony, of a natural inclination between object and subject, but on the contrary by something that first and foremost presupposes an experience, laid out for us in the Three Essays in their original version, that revolves entirely around a diphasic development. This two-stage temporal development of child sexuality hinges on the fact that the re-finding of the object will always be marked by the fact of the latency period, of the latent memory that persists throughout this period. Freud spells this out. The result is that the first object, the mother, is remembered in a way that has not been able to change. It is, as he puts it, unverwendbar, unutilisable. The object, which will only ever be a re-found object, wiedergefunden, will bear the mark of the initial style of this object. This will introduce an essential and fundamentally conflictive division into this re-found object and into the very fact of its re-finding. Thus, Freud's first dialectic in the theory of sexuality is introduced around an initial notion of the discordance between the re-found object and the object that is sought.

This fundamental experience supposes that throughout the latency period the object is preserved in the subject's memory, but unbeknown to him. That is to say, during the latency period, there is a signifying transmission of an object that thereafter divides, becomes discordant, and plays the role of a disturbing force in all the subject's subsequent object relations. It is within this frame that, at certain moments, in certain choice articulations, during certain phases of this evolution, the strictly imaginary functions are uncovered. Everything that falls within the remit of pregenital relations is taken up within this parenthesis. This notion of an imaginary layer is introduced into a dialectic that is first and foremost, in our vocabulary, essentially a dialectic of the symbolic and the real.

This introduction of the imaginary, which has since become such a prevalent notion, only comes about, first, with the article on narcissism, which is not articulated into the theory of sexuality until 1915, and then, second, with its formulation in connection with the phallic phase, which doesn't happen until 1920. However, at the time this was formulated in a categorical way, it seemed disturbing and threw the entire analytic audience into a state of bewilderment. Things are such that the dialectic that at the time was termed pregenital – and not, I note, preoedipal – is situated in relation to the Oedipus complex.

The term preoedipal was introduced in connection with female sexuality, ten years later. In 1920, however, what is at issue is the pregenital relation, which is situated in the emergence of experiences that are preparatory to the Oedipal experience but which only come to be linked up in this latter experience. It is on the basis of the signifying articulation of the Oedipus complex that we are able to behold the signifying material of these images, these fantasies, which do indeed arise from a certain experience of contact between signifier and signified. In such experience, the signifier has drawn its material from somewhere in the signified, from a certain number of living and lived relations. This past is grasped retroactively, enabling us to structure this imaginary organisation that we meet first and foremost as having a paradoxical character. It is paradoxical in that it opposes, far more than it accords with, any idea of a regular harmonious development. On the contrary, it is a critical development, in which from the very first the objects, as they are called, of the different oral and anal phases, are already taken to be something other than what they are. They are objects that have already been worked over. Yet people have been working with these objects in such a way that it is impossible to extract their signifying structure.

This is what people have been referring to with all these notions of incorporation, notions that organise them, dominate them, and enable them to be linked up.

How ought this experience to be arranged? As I told you last time, we should be arranging the entirety of the experience around the notion of the lack of object.

I showed you the three different tiers of this lack, which for us are essential when it comes to understanding all that occurs whenever there is a crisis, an encounter, or an efficient action in the search for the object, which in and of itself is essentially a critical notion of search. These tiers are castration, frustration and privation. Their central structure, what they amount to as lack, is essentially three distinct things.

In the coming lessons we are going to position ourselves at the precise point where the new-fangled theory and current practice are entrenched. The analysts of today have been reorganising the analytic experience upon the tier of frustration, while neglecting the notion of castration, which, along with the Oedipus complex, was Freud's original discovery. Next time I shall take as my point of departure an example that I chose at random in volumes III and IV of The Psychoanalytic Study of the Child, published in 1949. It's a presentation by Mrs Anneliese Schnurmann, one of Anna Freud's pupils.

Mrs Schnurmann was able to observe the fairly sudden emergence of a phobia in one of the young boarders at Anna Freud's Hampstead Nursery. We are going to read this observation, which is one among umpteen others, and we shall see what we can understand in it. We shall also see what has been understood by she who reports the observation with what seems to be exemplary fidelity. That is to say, it does not exclude a certain number of pre-established categories. However, what has been gathered together is ample for us to have a notion of temporal succession. We shall see how, through a number of points of reference, the phobia will appear and then disappear. We are going to see a privileged imaginary creation in this subject, which prevails for a certain while, and which has a whole series of effects on the subject's behaviour. We shall have to see whether it really is possible for the author to spell out what is essential in this observation when she takes as her sole point of departure the notion of frustration, in the way it is currently conceived, that is, as related to the privation of a privileged object that is the object of the stage to which the subject has arrived when the privation appears. This is a loosely regressive effect, which can even be progressive in some cases – and why not? But can a phenomenon like phobia be understood by merely appearing, by merely being located, in a particular chronological order? Don't things become clearer when we refer to the three terms I have set out? This is what we are going to see.

I shall now simply underscore what these three terms mean. In castration, there is a fundamental lack that is located, as indebtedness, in the symbolic chain. In frustration, lack can only be understood on the imaginary plane, as an imaginary detriment. In privation, lack is purely and simply in the real, as a real gap or limit.

When I say that in privation the lack is in the real, certainly this only holds interest when we see that on no account does this mean that it is something that is in the subject. For the subject to reach privation, he already has to symbolise the real, to conceive of the real as being something other than what it is. The reference to privation, as it is set out here, consists in positing – before we can say something sensible – that all of this does not come to pass as it does in the idealist dream where we can see the subject in some sense obligated in the genesis of the psychical system as it is laid out for us.

In the current analytic conception of psychogenesis, the subject is like a spider who has to spin the entire web herself. There, each subject has to envelop himself in the silk of his cocoon. He has to make his entire conception of the world emerge from himself and his images. In this psychogenesis, the subject secretes from himself his successive relations, in the name of goodness-knows-what pre-set maturation with the objects that will somehow manage to be the objects of this human world of ours. So it is, in defiance of how often analysis makes it apparent that giving oneself over to such an exercise is impossible, because the partisans of this conception only latch on to those aspects that support it. Moreover, each time they get in a muddle, it seems to them that it is merely a difficulty of language. In fact, this is simply a manifestation of the error they are in. Somatognosis, the image of the body as a signifier, shows this well enough.[7]

The problem of object relations can be posed in the right way only by positing a framework that must be regarded as fundamental to the comprehension of this object relation. The framework, or the first of these frameworks, is that in the human world the structure, the point of departure for objectal organisation, is the lack of the object. We have to conceive of this lack of object across its different stages in the subject, not merely at the level of the symbolic chain, the beginning and end of which are beyond his grasp, nor merely at the level of frustration, though he is indeed poised at this level, where his lived experience is thinkable for him. We also have to consider this lack in the real, because when we speak of privation here, it's not about feeling deprived.

Privation as a feeling of being deprived of a central reference that we need, to such an extent that everyone makes use of this, is simply the trick of making privation equivalent to frustration, which is what Dr Ernest Jones does. Privation is not the equivalent of frustration. Privation is in the real, and quite outside of the subject. For the subject to apprehend privation, he must first symbolise this real. How is the subject led to symbolise it? How does frustration introduce the symbolic order? This is the question we shall be asking, and it will allow us to see that the subject is neither isolated nor independent. The subject is not the one who introduces the symbolic order.

It is quite striking that yesterday evening no one spoke about a major passage in what Mme Dolto offered us, namely that according to her the only children who become phobic are those, of either sex, whose mother happens to have endured a disturbance in the objectal relation with her own parent of the opposite sex. Here we are introduced to a notion that certainly brings in something very different from the relationships between mother and child, and indeed this is why I have set out for you the trio of mother, child and phallus.

For the mother, there is nearly always this requirement of the phallus on the side of the child. The child symbolises, sometimes more, sometimes less, the phallus. As for the child, who has his own relationship with his mother, he knows nothing about it, because if there is one thing that surely must also have been apparent to you yesterday evening when the body image was being spoken of in relation to this child, it's that, if this image is even accessible to him, is this how the mother sees her child? This is a question that was never raised.

Similarly, at what moment is the child in a position to realise that what his mother desires in him, saturates and satisfies in him, is her phallic image? What possibility is open to the child of having access to this relational element? Is this something that belongs to a kind of direct effusion, or even a projection? Doesn't this amount to supposing that any relationship between subjects is of the same kind as the relationship between Mme Dolto and her child? I'm stunned that no one asked her, she who sees all these body images, whether there is anyone else, apart from analysts – of her school, at that – who happen to see in the child such elements and such images. Yet this is the important point.

How are we to conceive of the way in which the child, male or female, is induced or introduced to this imaginary discordance that means that, for the mother, the child is far from being just the child? The child is also the phallus. This is something that falls within the scope of experience, because certain elements can be extracted from experience which show us, for instance, that there needs already to be a period of symbolisation in order for the child to have access to this, or even that in certain cases the child has broached the imaginary detriment in a way that is in some sense direct – not his detriment, but the mother's detriment with respect to this privation of the phallus. This really is essential in development. Is an imaginary here being reflected in the symbolic? Or, on the contrary, is a symbolic element appearing in the imaginary? These are the crucial points in relation to which we ask ourselves the question of phobia.

So as not to fall short of your expectations, and in order to shed some further light, I will tell you what is in question in the threefold scheme of mother, child and phallus. It's a different question from the question of phobia, and it will certainly take us a long way.

Why in fetishism does the child come more or less to occupy the position of the mother in relation to the phallus? Or why, on the contrary, in certain highly particular forms of dependency in which anomalies can present with every appearance of normality, does the child also come to occupy the position of the phallus in relation to the mother? What leads him to this? It does indeed seem that this mother–phallus relation is not afforded to the child in a spontaneous and direct fashion. Does everything happen simply because he watches his mother and notices that what she desires is a phallus? Apparently not. We shall be coming back to this.

A phobia, when it develops, is not at all of the same kind. It has nothing to do with this liaison that the infant establishes between the phallus and the mother by putting something of his own into it, and rather a great deal. A phobia is something else. It's another type of solution to the difficult problem introduced by the relationships between child and mother. I showed you this last year. For there to be the three terms of the trio – it was in a closed forum – there has to be an organisation of the symbolic world, and this is called the father. The phobia belongs rather to this realm. It has to do with this circumscribing bond. At a particularly critical moment, when no path of any other nature is open for solving the problem, the phobia constitutes a call for rescue. It's an appeal to a singular symbolic element.

In what way is it singular? Let's say that it appears always to be exceedingly symbolic, that is, exceedingly far from any imaginary apprehension. When it is called to the rescue of a solidarity that it is essential to maintain in the gap introduced by the appearance of the phallus in the orientation between mother and child, the element that intervenes in the phobia has a truly mythical character.

agent	lack of object	object
	castration symbolic indebtedness	imaginary frustration imaginary detriment	real privation real hole	symbolic

This is the chart at which we have arrived, and which allows the issue of the object such as it arises in analysis to be spelt out with precision.

The lack of rigour in this matter, the confusion that analysts have shown, has resulted in a curious slippage.

Analysis partakes of a sort of scandalous notion of man's affective relations. I think I have already underscored on several occasions what at the start gave rise to so much outrage in analysis. It was not so much that it highlighted the role of sexuality, and that it played its part in the fact that this has become commonplace – in any case, these days no one dreams of taking offence at it – rather, it was precisely that at the same time as introducing this notion, and far in excess of this, it introduced the notion of a paradox, of an essential difficulty, that is inherent, so to speak, in the approach to the sexual object.

It is peculiar indeed that since then we have slid from this to a harmonic notion of the object.

To take measure of the distance that lies between this notion and what Freud spelt out with the greatest rigour, I chose a sentence from the Three Essays on Sexuality. Even those who are the least informed with respect to object relations have remarked that it may quite readily be seen that in Freud's writings there are many things pertaining to the object – object-choice, for example – but that the notion of object relations on its own is neither highlighted nor cultivated, nor brought to the fore of the question. Here is Freud's sentence that can be found in the article Drives and Their Fates – The object of the drive is that [. . .] through which the drive is able to achieve its aim. It is the most variable aspect of a drive, not originally connected with it, but merely appropriated by it on grounds of suitability to provide satisfaction. One might also say that it's about the possibility of satisfying the drive. It's a matter of satisfaction insomuch as the position that the pleasure principle takes as the goal of the drive tendency is that of arriving at its own satisfaction.

So, the notion that there is no pre-set harmony between object and drive tendency is spelt out. The object is literally bound to the drive tendency only by conditions that are its own. In short, one gets by as best one can. This is not a doctrine. It's a quotation. But it's one quotation among others that motion in the same direction, and it's one of the most significant. What is this conception of the object that is at issue here? Along what winding paths does it lead us before we manage to conceive of its effective impact?

We have already managed, thanks to a number of points that have also been spelt out by Freud, to give some depth to the notion that the object is only ever a re-found object, based on a primary Findung. This means that the Wiederfindung, the re-finding, is never satisfactory. What is more, drawing on further characteristics, we saw on the one hand that this object is inadequate, and on the other that it steals away, partially, from any conceptual grasp. This is now leading us to take a firmer grip on the fundamental notions, and in particular to revise the one that has been placed at the centre of latter-day analytic theory, that of frustration.

To what extent has it been turned into something necessary? To what extent, too, ought it to be revised? It's up to us to critique it so as to make it both usable and, to spell this right out, coherent with what constitutes the grounding of analytic doctrine, which is still fundamentally Freud's thought and teaching. I have underscored for you many times now that the notion of frustration is quite marginal in Freud's thinking.

I reminded you of what presents at the outset in what is given – castration, frustration and privation. Marking out the differences between these three terms is going to be productive.

What is involved in castration?

Castration is essentially linked to a symbolic order qua already established, which as such comprises a long coherence in which the subject can on no account be an isolated given. The liaison between castration and the symbolic order is evinced as much in each of our earlier reflections as in the straightforward remark that, from the very first, Freud yoked castration to the central position he gave to the Oedipus complex as the essential articulation of any development in sexuality. The Oedipus complex already bears within it, and fundamentally so, the notion of Law that is absolutely ineradicable. I think that the fact that castration stands at the level of symbolic indebtedness will appear amply confirmed and even amply demonstrated by this remark, which has been weighed up and supported through each of our earlier reflections.

What is the object that is at issue, or that is brought into play, in the symbolic indebtedness established by castration? As I indicated last time, it is an imaginary object, the phallus as such. At least this is what Freud asserts, and this will be my point of departure today in order to push the dialectic of frustration a little further.

Frustration holds the central position on this chart. In itself, this does not harbour anything that should throw us out of kilter or off track. By laying the emphasis on the notion of frustration we do not stray very far from the notion that Freud placed at the heart of analytic conflictedness, this being the notion of desire. What is important here is to grasp what is meant by frustration, how it was introduced, and what it refers to.

Clearly, insomuch as it is placed to the fore in analytic theory, the notion of frustration has been linked to the earliest age of life. It has been linked to research into traumas, fixations and experiential impressions that in themselves are preoedipal. This does not imply that they lie outside the scope of the Oedipus complex but rather that in some sense they provide its preparatory ground, its base and foundation. They model it in such a way that certain inflexions are prepared within it, and they will furnish those aspects through which the Oedipal conflict will be led to reorient, in a more or less pronounced way, in a direction that is loosely atypical or heterotypic.

What, then, is the pattern of relationship with the object that is in play in frustration? Clearly it introduces the question of the real. Indeed, along with the notion of frustration we can see a whole host of other notions being placed to the fore in the subject's conditioning and development. These notions have been conveyed in a language of loose quantitative metaphor. People speak about satisfactions, gratifications, and a certain number of well-adapted benefits that correspond to steps in the young subject's development. Furthermore, when it more or less reaches saturation point, or on the contrary when it comes up short, this is considered to be an essential feature.

I think that just making this remark is enough to open our eyes to the evidence, when we consult the texts, and to see what step has been taken in this research, guided by an analysis of this fact of a basic shift of interest within the analytic literature. This can already be seen fairly easily, at least for those who are sufficiently familiar with these three notions to be able to recognise them with ease. You will see in one article from the analytic literature, in which you can recognise this element of the conceptual articulation of the matter quite straightforwardly, that the thrust of it bears on certain real conditions that we are supposed to be able to ascertain in a subject's history through the analytic experience. In the first analytic observations, it is on the whole apparent that any such foregrounding of this element of interest is absent, in the sense that it is articulated differently.

So, here we are led back to the level of frustration regarded as a sort of feature of a real impression, experienced by the subject during a period when his relationship with this real object, whatever it might be, is habitually focused on the so-called primordial image of the maternal breast. It is essentially in relation to this primordial object that what just now I called its first aspects and first fixations will take shape in the subject. Faced with these aspects and fixations, descriptions have been made of the various typical instinctual stages, which are characterised by the imaginary anatomy of the subject's development that they offer us. This is where the relationships of the oral stage and the anal stage have been articulated, with their various subdivisions – phallic, sadistic, and so on. Each of these bear the mark of the element of ambivalence whereby the subject's position partakes of the other's position, where the subject is twain, where he participates always in a dual situation without which any comprehensive assumption of his position is not possible.

By simply limiting ourselves to this, let's see where it takes us. We are, therefore, in the presence of a subject that is in this position, which is a position of desire. Let's take it in the form it is given to us, as the breast qua real object. Here we are led to the heart of the question of what this relationship is, this most primitive of relationships, between the subject and the real object.

You know the extent to which the theoretician-analysts have found themselves in a sort of discussion that is teeming with all manner of misunderstanding. After Freud spoke of a lived stage of autoeroticism, some preserved this autoeroticism as the primal relationship between the infant and the primordial maternal object, while others objected that it was difficult to refer to a notion that seems to be founded on the fact that the subject that it implies is acquainted only with himself, given how a good many features from direct observation seem to run athwart the idea that in this instance there are no effective relations with an object. We conceive of these features as necessary when it comes to explaining the development of relations between child and mother. Furthermore, what could be more overtly exterior to the subject than this something for which he feels the most pressing need, and which is the first nourishment par excellence?

In truth, it seems that there is a misunderstanding here, begotten essentially by a kind of confusion, whereby the discussion comes to a standstill, culminating in formulations that are so diverse that simply to list them would take up considerable time. This is why I can't do so straightaway, because we need to make some headway in the conceptualisation of what is at issue here. I shall simply remind you of the theory we have already spoken about, Alice Balint's theory.

This theory seeks to reconcile the notion of autoeroticism, such as it is set out by Freud, with what seems to impose on the reality of the object that confronts the infant during an altogether primary stage of his development. This culminates in the strikingly articulated conception that Mr and Mrs Balint call Primary Love. According to them, this is the only form of love in which egoism and altruism are perfectly reconcilable, allowing of a perfect and fundamental reciprocity between what the infant requires of the mother and what the mother requires of the infant, a perfect complementarity between the two poles of need.

This conception runs quite contrary to all clinical experience, in that we are constantly dealing with the evocation, within the subject, of the mark of each truly fundamental discord that may have arisen.

The theory of this so-called primary love, which would be perfect and complementary, contains in its very wording the hallmark of this discord. Alice Balint tells us, in Love for the Mother and Mother Love, that where relations are natural, that is, in the wild, the child is always carefully maintained in contact with its mother.[1] In other words, this always happens elsewhere, in dreamland, in the Garden of the Hesperides, there where, as everyone knows, the mother always carries the child on her back. Such a strict complementary notion of love, destined in and of itself to find its reciprocity, constitutes an evasion that is so scarcely compatible with an accurate theorisation that ultimately it has to be admitted that this is, therefore, an utterly ideal stance, if not an idealist one.

Actually, I have taken this example only because it serves as an introduction to what is going to be the driving element in our critique of the notion of frustration. It's clear that this is not quite the image of fundamental representation that is given to us in a theory like, say, Mrs Melanie Klein's. Here, too, it's amusing to see from what angle the theoretical reconstruction that she proposes comes under attack, especially given that object relations are at issue.

It so happened that a Bulletin fell into my hands reporting on the activities of the Belgian Psychoanalytic Association. On its contents page are the same authors who are to be found in the collection I dealt with in my first lecture, and which I said is oriented around a shamelessly optimistic and contestable view of the object relation, this being the main thrust of the two volumes. In this Bulletin for a slightly more restricted audience, things are broached with greater nuance, as though it were the lack of assurance that was giving rise to a mild shame on their part, and they were allowing it to show through in places where certainly it becomes apparent, when one becomes aware of it, that this is of greater merit.

So, we find in this Bulletin an article by Messrs Pasche and Renard that reproduces the same critique of the Kleinian positions that they delivered at the Geneva congress. It is quite striking to read them reproaching Melanie Klein for a developmental theory that, according to these authors and their criticisms, would place everything within the subject in a preformed fashion. The whole Oedipus complex, its whole possible development, would already be included in what is given instinctually, and the different elements, which would already be potentially articulated, would just have to sprout from it. In the way the authors frame the comparison, which is how it is for some in the biological theory of development, the full-grown oak would already be wholly present in the acorn. Nothing would come to such a subject from the outside. From the outset, he possesses his primitive aggressive drives – the prevalence of aggressiveness is indeed manifest when comprehended within Melanie Klein's perspective – and then, through the intermediary of shocks that he feels from the outside, from the maternal field, in return for these aggressive drives, there is a progressive construction of something that we are told can only be received as a sort of full-grown oak, namely the notion of the totality of the mother. On this basis, the so-called depressive position is established, which can arise in any experience.

Without taking each of these criticisms into account one after the next, as would be necessary to appreciate their rightful worth, I would simply like to underscore what they paradoxically culminate in as a whole, which constitutes the crux and the core of this article.

The authors seem to be fascinated by the question of what, in development, is brought in from the outside. What they think they can read in Melanie Klein's work is that this is already given at the start in an internal constellation, such that it would come as no surprise that the notion of an internal object should thereafter be foregrounded so prevalently. The authors come to the conclusion that they think can be drawn from the Kleinian contribution, namely the notion of a full-grown oak that follows hereditary patterns, which they say is very difficult to represent in one's mind. So, they say – The child is born with certain inherited instinctual drives into a world which he does not yet perceive but which he recalls, and which later he will not have to create simply from within himself and from nothing else but a series of chance discoveries, but a world he will come to recognise.

I think that for most of you the Platonic character of the wording will not escape your notice. This world that one has only to recall, and which will be established in accordance with a certain imaginary preparation, to which the subject already corresponds, is something that surely represents a critique of the position. However, we are going to have to test out not simply whether this critique goes against everything that Freud wrote, but whether we cannot already glimpse how the authors themselves stand far closer to the position for which they reproach Melanie Klein. For they are the ones who indicate, in the subject, in the state of the full-grown oak, ready to appear on cue, all the elements that will enable the subject to be counted throughout a series of stages that can be called ideal only to the extent that they are precisely the subject's memories, very precisely his phylogenetic memories, and which furnish them with their norm and type.

Is this what Mrs Melanie Klein intended? It is strictly unthinkable to maintain as much. If there is indeed one thing that Mrs Melanie Klein gives us an idea of – and, moreover, this is the thrust of the authors' critique – it is surely that the first situation is far more chaotic. At the start, it is truly anarchic. What characterises the origin is the noise and fury of the drives. The question, therefore, is much rather how something like an order can be established on this basis.

That there is something mythical in the Kleinian conception is absolutely beyond doubt. It's quite certain that the contradiction that is introduced by a myth that the authors do not locate very well, though it does resemble the Kleinian phantasy, is wholly on the beam. Of course, these phantasies only have a retroactive character. During the construction of the subject we see them being projected back onto the past from points that can themselves be very early. But how is it that these points can be so early? How is it that Mrs Melanie Klein can take a toddler of fairly advanced age, of two-and-a-half, and like the Pythia reading in a mantic mirror, a divinatory mirror, is able to read retroactively in his past nothing less than the Oedipal structure? There is some reason behind this.

Doubtless there is some manner of mirage here, and of course she is not to be followed when she tells us that the Oedipus complex was already there in the very forms, fragmented as they are, of the penis roaming around amid the brothers and sisters on the inside of the entire field that is defined as the interior of the mother's body. But that this articulation should be detectable in a certain relation with the child, and that it should be articulable very early on, is something that certainly poses us a fruitful question.

That this theoretical articulation, which is in some sense a purely hypothetical articulation, should allow us to provide at the outset something that might better satisfy our idea of natural harmonies, nevertheless does not conform to what experience shows us.

I think that this is starting to indicate for you the angle from which we can introduce something new in the confusion that remains at the level of the primordial mother–child relation.

I believe that this confusion is due to not having taken a central notion, the true centre, as the point of departure. Frustration is not the starting point. It's a matter of finding out how the child's primary relationships are situated. A great deal can be clarified if we approach things in the following way, which is that in this frustration there are from the very start two facets that will bracket it to the very end.

On one side, there is the real object. And as we are told, the object can affect the subject before he has formed the least idea of it. This object is real, and the subject is affected in his direct relations. It is only as a function of this periodicity, in which holes and deficiencies can appear, that a certain pattern of relation will be established that on no account necessitates admitting that for the subject there would be a distinction between me and not-me. This is so, for instance, in the autoerotic position, in Freud's understanding of it, namely that strictly speaking there is no constitution of the other, nor initially of any fully conceivable relationship.

On the other side, there is the agent. Indeed, the object is instantiated only in relation to lack. In this fundamental relation that is a relation of lack, the notion of agent is something that should enable us to introduce a formulation that from the very first is utterly crucial when it comes to the way in which the overall position is situated. In this instance, the agent is the mother.

To show you this I just have to remind you of what we have been studying these last few years, namely what Freud spelt out concerning the altogether principial position of the infant with regard to repetitive play, and especially the game that Freud seized upon so swiftly in the child's behaviour.

The mother is something other than this primal object. She does not appear as such at the start but, rather, as Freud underscores, on the basis of this first play, that of clutching an object that in itself is perfectly insignificant, which has no biological value whatsoever. On that occasion it was a spool, but it could equally be anything else that a six-month-old child could send over the edge of his cot in order then to retrieve it anew. This presence–absence pairing, which is articulated by the child at a very early age, connotes the first constitution of the agent of frustration that lies at the origin of the mother. We can write the symbol of frustration S(M).[2]

The mother is spoken of as introducing a new element of totality that ushers in a stage of development known as the depressive position, which is characterised less by its opposition to the sort of chaos of fragmented objects that typifies the previous stage than by the connotation of presence–absence.

This presence–absence is not only set out as such objectively, it is articulated as such by the subject. As we have already spelt out in our studies from last year, this presence–absence is articulated by the subject in the register of appeal. The maternal object is called upon when it is absent, and rejected when it is present, all within the same register of appeal, by modulating his voice.

Of course, this essential scansion of the appeal is far from being something that gives us the entire symbolic order from the start, but it does show us how it is first broached. It allows us to discern something else, an element that is distinct from the real object relation and which will thereafter afford the subject the possibility of establishing a relation to a real object, with its scansion, its marks, and the traces that remain of it. This is what affords the possibility of a link between this real relationship and a symbolic relationship as such.

Before I show you this in a more manifest fashion, I simply want to highlight what is entailed by the mere fact that in the child's relations the presence–absence opposition is introduced into this relationship with the constituting person. What is introduced here in the child's experience is that he tends, quite naturally, to drop off to sleep at the moment of frustration. So, the child is situated between the notion of an agent, which already participates in the order of symbolicity, and the contrasting couple of presence–absence, the plus–minus connotation, which gives us the first element of a symbolic order. This element is not sufficient to constitute a symbolic order by itself alone because a sequence is required thereafter. This is a sequence that will be grouped as such, but already in the opposition between plus and minus, between presence and absence, there is the virtual origin, the virtual begetting, the possibility, the fundamental condition, of a symbolic order.

The question now is how we are to conceive of the moment when this primordial relationship with the real object can change tack and open up to a more complex relationship. What, in truth, is the turning point at which the mother–child relation opens up to further elements that will introduce what we have called a dialectic? I believe that we can formulate this in schematic fashion by asking the following question – what happens if the symbolic agent, the mother as such, who is so essential to the child's relationship with the real object, no longer responds? What happens if she no longer answers the child's call?

Let's provide the reply ourselves. Whereas the symbolic structuration makes her the present–absent object in keeping with the child's appeal, from the moment she is in decline she becomes real.

Why so? Until then she existed within this structuration as an agent, distinct from the real object that is the infant's object of satisfaction. However, outside of this structuration, she becomes real. In a sense, she now replies merely as she pleases. She becomes something that also ushers in the start of the structuration of reality as a whole, and thereafter she becomes a power.

Correlatively, the object positions switch around. So long as a real relationship is at issue, the breast – let's take this as an example – can be made to be as enticing we may wish. Yet as soon as the mother becomes a power and, as such, real, the child will depend on her in the most manifest way for access to those objects that hitherto were purely and simply objects of satisfaction, but which now become objects that are gifted by this power. And so, in the same way, though no more than has thus far been the case for the mother, these objects are liable to enter a presence–absence connotation, but in dependence on this real object, this power that the maternal power is. In short, they are objects in the sense we intend here, not metaphorically, but objects that can be clasped and possessed. As for the notion of not me, of non-ego, it's a matter of observing whether it enters first via the image of the other or via what can be possessed. What the child wants to keep beside him are objects that from this moment forth no longer really need to be objects of satisfaction so much as objects that are the mark of the value of this power, this power that may not respond and which is the power of the mother.

In other words, the positions have switched. The mother has become real and the object has become symbolic. The object now stands above all as a token of the gift from the maternal power. Thenceforth, the object possesses its satisfying property in two different realms. It is doubly a possible object of satisfaction. It satisfies a need, as surely it did before, but it also symbolises an auspicious power.

This is exceedingly important because one of the most cumbrous notions in all analytic theory, now that it has become, as one slogan has it, genetic psychoanalysis, is the notion of the omnipotence of thought, of all-powerfulness. This has been imputed to everything that is most foreign to us. Is it conceivable that the child should have some notion of all-powerfulness? He does perhaps possess the essential part of it, but this doesn't mean that the all-powerfulness at issue is his own. That would be absurd. Entertaining as much leads into dead-ends. The all-powerfulness at issue is the mother's.

At the moment I'm describing for you, that of the mother becoming real, it is she who is all-powerful and not the child. It's a decisive moment, when the mother passes into reality from an utterly archaic symbolisation. At that moment, the mother can give anything at all, but that the child should possess a notion of his all-powerfulness is quite erroneous and utterly unthinkable. Not only does nothing in his development indicate that he should possess such a thing, but indeed practically everything that interests us in this development and in the mishaps that crop up along the way serve to show us that this notion of his all-powerfulness and the failures it might meet do not amount to anything in the question. What counts, as you will see, are the shortcomings and the disappointments that affect maternal all-powerfulness.

This investigation might strike you as somewhat theoretical, but at the very least it has the advantage of introducing essential distinctions and of making openings that are not those that are commonly put to use. You are going to see now what this leads us to and what we can already indicate therein.

Here, then, is the child in the presence of something that he has made a reality as a power. What hitherto stood on the plane of the first presence–absence connotation all of a sudden passes over to something that can refuse, yet which harbours everything the subject may need. And even if he has no need of it, it becomes symbolic from the moment it depends on this power.

Freud tells us that in the world of objects there is one that has an utterly and paradoxically decisive function, namely the phallus. This object is defined as imaginary. In no case whatsoever is it possible to conflate it with the penis in its reality. Strictly speaking, it is its form, its image, in erection. This phallus has such a decisive role that both its presence and the yearning to which it gives rise, its instantiation in the imaginary, turn out to be more important – so it seems – for those members of humanity who lack one, namely women, than for those who can be sure that they possess the reality thereof, namely men, and whose entire sexual life is nevertheless subordinated to the fact that imaginarily they well and truly assume the use of it, and do so as licit, as permitted.

This is a given. Let's consider now our mother and child, who for Michael and Alice Balint form but a single totality of needs, just like Jean Cocteau's Mortimer couple who have but one heart between them. Nevertheless, here on the blackboard I'm keeping them apart in two circles that do not intersect.

Freud tells us that among a woman's essential missing objects is the phallus, and that this bears the closest relation to her relationship with her child. This is for the simple reason that if woman finds satisfaction in her child, it's precisely insomuch as she finds in him something, the penis, that more or less succeeds in calming her need for the phallus, that saturates this need.[3] Should we fail to take this into account we misconstrue not only Freud's teaching but also something that is manifest in experience from one instant to the next.

So, here we have mother and child in a certain dialectical relation. The child expects something from his mother and he also receives something from her. In this dialectic, we cannot avoid introducing the following. Let's say, roughly speaking, in the way the Balints word it, that the child wants to be loved for what he is.

The question is this. What happens, to the extent that, for the mother, the image of the phallus is not fully reducible to the image of the child? What happens in this double vision, this division of the so-called primordial desired object? Far from being harmonic, the mother's relation to the child is doubled, on the one hand by the need for a certain imaginary saturation and, on the other, by what is effectively there in terms of real, effective relations with the child at a primordial, instinctive level, which ultimately remain mythical. For the mother, there is always something that remains irreducible in what is at stake. Ultimately, if we follow Freud, the child, as real, symbolises the image. More precisely, the three terms are here in the fact that the child, as real, should take on for her the symbolic function of her imaginary need.

All sorts of variations can emerge here. All sorts of situations that have already been structured exist between child and mother. Once the mother has been introduced into the real in the state of a power, the possibility opens up for the child of an intermediary object as such, as a gift-object. The question is, at what point, how, and by what mode of access, can the child be introduced directly to the symbolic–imaginary–real structure in the way that it has been produced for the mother? In other words, at what point can the child enter – and assume in a way that is, as we shall see, loosely symbolised – the imaginary situation, which is also real on account of what the phallus is for the mother? At what point can the child to a certain extent feel himself dispossessed of something that he demands from the mother in noticing that it is not he who is loved but something else, a particular image?

There is something that goes further here. The child makes this phallic image a reality upon his own self, and this is where the narcissistic relation strictly speaking intervenes. When the child grasps sexual difference, for example, to what extent will this experience come to be articulated with what is offered him in the presence of the mother and her actions when this third imaginary term is recognised, which for the mother is the phallus? Furthermore, the notion that the mother lacks this phallus, that she herself is desiring not only of something other than him but desiring tout court, that is, afflicted in her power, will be more decisive for the subject than anything else.

Last time I told you about the Observation of a Phobia, the phobia of a young girl. I'm going to tell you right away what interest this holds.

Given that it was wartime, and that the author is a pupil of Anna Freud, conditions were such that the child could be observed from beginning to end, and by a fine observer. She's a fine observer because she understands nothing. And she understands nothing because Anna Freud's theory is wrong. Consequently, this brings her face-to-face with the facts in a state of astonishment that constitutes the fruitfulness of the observation.

So, everything is noted down from one day to the next. The young girl – at the age of two years, five months – having noticed that boys have a widdler, as it is put in the observation on little Hans, sets to conducting herself throughout a whole period from a position of rivalry. She does all she can to be able to do the same as the little boys do. The child had been separated from her mother, not just because of the Blitz but because her mother had lost her husband at the start of the war. Her mother would come to see her, since contact is not excluded, and the presence–absence was regular. When she came, the games she played with her child were games of teasing approach. She would sidle up to her slowly and hesitatingly. You can see her function as symbolic mother. Everything was going very well. The child had the real objects she wanted when her mother was not there, and when the mother was there she played her role of symbolic mother. So, the young girl discovers that boys have a widdler. Sure enough, something happens. She wants to imitate them and to be given a boy's bicki to urinate with. A fuss ensues, but which is entirely without consequence.

Now, the observation is presented as an Observation of a Phobia, and indeed one night the child was to wake up seized with terror at the presence of a dog in her bed that wanted to bite her. She asks to change beds, saying she should be put in another one. This observation of the phobia carries on for a while.

Does the phobia follow the discovery of the absence of the penis? Why are we asking this? We ask this question because the dog is clearly a dog that bites the genitals. We know this insomuch as we are going to analyse the child, that is, insomuch as we are going to follow and comprehend what she tells us. Her first sentence of any length and articulation – this is a child with a slight retardation – is to say, Doggie bite naughty boy leg, and this was at the height of the phobia.

You can see the relationship between the symbolisation and the object of the phobia. Why is it a dog? We shall speak about this presently, but what I want to note right away is that the dog is there as an agent that takes away what initially was more or less accepted as absent.

Are we going to cut corners and say that what is at issue in the phobia is merely a passage to the level of Law? That is to say, is this merely the intervention of an element that, as I was saying earlier, is endowed with power so as to account for what is absent, and absent on account of having been bitten off?

The schema that I'm trying to set out for you today motions in this direction and allows us to get over the hurdle by taking a look at this item that seems exceedingly cursory. Dr Ernest Jones tells us very succinctly that, after all, for the child the superego is perhaps merely an indirect vent, while the anxieties are primordial, primitive and imaginary, and in some sense he there reverts to a sort of artifice. It's the return for a moral contravention. In other words, it's culture as a whole with all its prohibitions. It's something fallen by the wayside that serves only to shield what is most fundamental, namely the anxieties in their uncontained state which in some sense find some relief there. There is something accurate in this, namely the mechanism of phobia. But the mechanism of phobia is the mechanism of phobia, and to extend it, as does Monsieur Pasche at the end of the article I was telling you about, to the point of saying that the mechanism of phobia is something that ultimately explains the death instinct, for example, or even that dream images are in a certain respect the subject clothing his anxieties and, as it were, personalising them, amounts always to reverting to the same idea, a misrecognition of the symbolic order in the notion that it is merely a kind of clothing, a kind of praetexta over something more fundamental. Is this what I want to tell you by drafting in this Observation of a Phobia? No, it is not.

What is interesting in the observation is that it indicates with precision the mother's absence one month prior to the outbreak of the phobia. Certainly, the time it took for the phobia to burst forth was much longer. Four months pass by following her discovery of her aphallicism, but something else had to happen in this interval. First, her mother had to go to the hospital for an operation. The mother is no longer the symbolic mother. She has bowed out. She comes back, and she plays again with her child, and as yet nothing occurs. Then she comes back in very poor health . . . leaning on a stick. She no longer has the same presence, and is not her cheerful self. Nor can there be any resumption of the relations of approach and withdrawal that were a sufficient ground for the whole attachment with the child, and which used to be played out on a weekly basis. And so it was at that moment, in a third period, much later in time, that the phobia was to break out.

So, thanks to the observers, we find out that the Oedipus complex comes not from the aphallicism, from the second break in the alternating of the mother's coming-and-coming-back as such, but that it also required that the mother should appear as someone who could lack. Her lack was inscribed in the child's reaction and behaviour, that is, she was very sad and had to be reassured, but there was no phobia. It was when she saw her mother again, weak and leaning on a stick, weary and unwell, that the very next day the dream of the dog erupted and the phobia set in. Nothing in the observation is more significant and more paradoxical than this, except for one point that I shall tell you about now.

We are going to speak again about the way the therapists tackled the phobia, given what they thought they had understood. I simply want to point out the question that arises when considering the antecedents to the phobia. From what moment is the phobia necessary, and why is it sufficient? It is when the mother lacks the phallus that something is determined that is balanced out in the phobia. This is another question that we shall look at next time.

There is another point that is no less striking. Later, after the phobia, the Blitz comes to an end and the mother takes back her child and remarries. The young girl finds herself with a new father and a new brother, her stepfather's son.[4] The brother she has suddenly acquired is older than her, by about five years, and he gives himself over to all kinds of games, both adoratory and violent, including the request that they expose themselves to each other naked. He does something to her that is clearly linked to his interest in the young girl insomuch as she is a-penian. Whereupon the psychotherapist shows some astonishment – why, this might have been a fine occasion for a relapse of the phobia!

Indeed, the environmental theory on which Anna Freud's therapeutics is founded has it that discord sets in to the extent that the ego is more or less informed of reality. Would the presence of the man-brother, a character who is not only phallic but also penis-bearing, be an occasion for a relapse? Far from it. There is not a trace of mental disturbance and she has never been in finer shape.

Moreover, we are told exactly why this is. It's that she is clearly favoured by her mother over the boy. Nevertheless, the father is someone who is sufficiently present to introduce a new element, which we haven't yet spoken about, but which is essentially linked to the function of the phobia, namely a symbolic element beyond the relations of the mother's power or powerlessness. This is the father properly speaking, himself bringing out from his relations with the mother the notion of power. In short, he is substituted for what seems to have been saturated by the phobia, namely what is feared in the castrating animal as such that has proven in all its necessity to have been the essential element of articulation that enabled the child to come through the deep crisis she had entered when faced with maternal powerlessness. The child then finds her need saturated by the maternal presence and, what is more, by something else.

Does the therapist manage to see this something else with any clarity? This relationship in which she is already the brother's girl brings with it all sorts of pathological possibilities. We can glimpse here, in a different aspect, that she has wholly become something that is worth more than the brother. She is to become the girl-phallus which is spoken about so often. It will be a matter of finding out to what extent thereafter she might not be implicated in this imaginary function. But for the time being no essential need is to be filled by the articulation of the phallic fantasy, because the father is there and he suffices for this. He suffices to maintain enough distance between the three terms of the mother–child–phallus relationship for the subject not to have to give of her own self. She doesn't have to put anything of her own into it to maintain this distance.

How is this distance maintained? Along what path? Through what identification and by what artifice? This is what we shall start to tackle next time by looking again at this observation, which will enable us to move into what is most characteristic of preoedipal object relations, namely the birth of the object as a fetish.

V

ON ANALYSIS AS BUNDLING AND THE CONSEQUENCES THEREOF

A presupposition about the drive
The essence of the anaclitic relationship
The fetishist solution
Fever pitches of perversion
A phobic subject's transitory perversion

The analytic conception of object relations has already become something of an historical reality. What I've been trying to show you takes this up in a sense that is in part different and in part the same, but the mere fact that here it is being inserted into a different whole lends it a different signification.

At the point we've reached it is only right to punctuate with some emphasis how the object relation has been placed at the centre of a conception of analysis held by a group who have been pushing this increasingly to the fore. On recently rereading some of their articles I saw that this formulation, which over the years has been gathering pace and assurance, has now culminated in something that is being very assertively voiced.

It so happens that in a few articles I expressed the ironic wish that someone might truly set out the notion of the object relation in the way it is being reckoned in a certain orientation. This wish has since been amply fulfilled by more than one person, and while a formulation has been given by Bouvet, who introduced it in connection with obsessional neurosis in a way that rather softens it down, others too have made an effort at precision.

The article by Messrs Pierre Marty and Michel Fain on the Importance du rôle de la motricité dans la relation d'objet, which was published in the January–June 1955 issue of the Revue française de psychanalyse, offers us a vivid example of the dominant conception. I'm going to summarise this work for you, with the forewarning that when you read the article things will certainly strike you as going much further than in the few words I can utter here.

The relationship between the one analysing and the one being analysed is conceived of at the start as a relationship that is established between a subject, the patient, and an external object, the analyst. To put it in our vocabulary, the analyst is here conceived of as real. The whole tension of the analytic situation is conceived of on the basis of this couple being, in itself alone, a driving element of the analytic development. Between a subject, whether or not he is on the couch, and the external object that is the analyst, there can in principle be established and manifested only what is called the primitive drive relationship, the relationship that is normally manifested – this is the presupposition of the development of the analytic relationship – through motor activity.

It is on the side of faint traces that are carefully observed during each stage of the subject's motor reaction that, in this article, we find the last word of what happens at the level of the drive, which is in some sense to be localised and vividly felt by the analyst. Insomuch as the subject is forced to contain his movements through the relationship that is established by the analytic convention, it is at this level that what is manifested, namely the drive in the course of its emergence, is localised in the analyst's mind.

The situation is at bottom conceived of as something that can be exteriorised only in an erotic aggression. This doesn't become manifest, because it has been agreed that it will not become manifest, but it is desirable that its reception should spring up, so to speak, from one moment to the next. It is precisely to the extent that, within the analytic convention, due to the fact of the fundamental rule, the motor manifestation of the drive cannot occur, that we shall be allowed to perceive what interferes in this situation, a situation that is considered to be a constituting one. It is very precisely formulated for us that a relationship with an internal object is superposed onto the relationship with the external object. This is how it is expressed in the article I've just cited. The subject has a certain relationship with an internal object, which is invariably considered to be the person who is present but captured somehow in the subject's pre-established imaginary mechanisms, thus becoming the object of a fantasmatic relationship. It is insomuch as discordance is introduced, between this imaginary object and the real object, that the analyst will be weighed up and gauged from one instant to the next, and that he in turn will model his interventions. Since according to this conception no one else comes into play in the analytic situation besides those who are there, one of the two authors – who in this respect is followed by all the rest in the ensuing discussion – is led to highlight the notion of neurotic distance that the subject imposes on the object. The fantasmatic internal object, at least in the suspended position it holds in the way it is experienced by the subject, will be reduced to the real distance that is the distance between subject and analyst. It is to this extent that the subject will make his analyst a reality as a real presence.

The authors stretch this quite far. I've already alluded several times to the fact that one of these authors, admittedly during an aspirant phase of his career, had spoken of the crucial turning point in one analysis as the moment when the person he was analysing had been able to smell him. This was no metaphor. It wasn't about sensing him psychologically. It was the moment when the patient smelled his odour. I must say that the wafting in of this relationship of subodoration is one of the mathematical consequences of such a conception of the analytic relationship.[1] In this restrained position, within which a distance – here conceived of as active and present in relation to the analyst – has gradually to become real, it is quite certain that one of the most direct modes of relation is most surely this remote apprehending that is yielded by subodorating.

I am not merely taking up a single example here. This has been repeated many times. It seems that within this group they are tending more and more to give pivotal importance to modes of apprehending such as these.

Here, then, is how the analytic position is being regarded in this situation, which is the situation of a real relation between two protagonists in a closed space, where they are separated by a kind of conventional barrier and where something has to be made real. I'm talking about the theoretical formulation of things. We shall see afterwards what practical consequences this has.

First, it is quite clear that such an exorbitant conception cannot be pushed to its ultimate consequences. On the other hand, if what I've been teaching you is true, then even when the practitioner shares this conception, the situation in which he operates cannot for all that really become what this conception stipulates. It is not enough, of course, just to conceive of it as such for it to be so. It will be pulled out of shape due to how it has been conceived of, but what it really is nevertheless remains what I've been trying to express for you by means of my diagram, which makes the symbolic relationship and the imaginary relationship intervene and crisscross, one serving in some sense as a filter to the other. The situation is not annulled, however much it is misconstrued, and this shows quite clearly the insufficiency of their conception. But conversely, the insufficiency of this conception can have consequences on the way that the whole situation is seen through to a successful end.

This is a special example, which I'm going to highlight for you today, to show what this can effectively lead to, but here already we have a situation that is conceived of as a real situation, in which there is an operation of reducing the imaginary to the real. A certain number of phenomena occur through this operation, which allow for a situating of the different stages at which the subject has remained more or less stuck, or fixated, on this imaginary relationship. In this way the various positions are exhausted, which are essentially imaginary positions, foremost among them being the pregenital relation which becomes increasingly essential to what is explored in the analysis.

There is just one thing that receives no elucidation whatsoever in this conception of the analytic situation, and this is no small matter because everything lies therein. This thing can be expressed as follows. It is not known why, in this situation, nothing is said of the fact of the function, strictly speaking, of language and of speech in this position. On no account does this mean that it can be bypassed. Furthermore, what we shall also see coming to light is the special value that is given to the simple impulsive verbalisation, to these sorts of plea to the analyst along the lines of – Why won't you answer me? You will see this being punctuated most precisely in what the authors say and in the bits of text they quote. A verbalisation only holds any importance for them in so far as it is impulsive, that is, in so far as it is a motor manifestation.

In what will this operation culminate, this operation of setting the distance with regard to the internal object, and with which technique is expected to comply? Our diagram enables us to form a conception of this.

The line a–a' concerns the imaginary relationship, which refers the subject – who is more or less discordant, decomposed, and exposed to fragmentation – to the unifying image of the little other, a narcissistic image. On the line S–A, the subject's relationship with the Other is produced, though this is not yet a solid line because it needs to be established. This Other is not merely the other party who is there, but is literally the locus of speech. This is so inasmuch as, already, structured in the speaking relationship, this big Other stands beyond the other that you apprehend imaginarily. This supposed Other is the subject as such, the subject in which your speech is constituted because it is able not only to greet it and to perceive it, but to respond to it. It is on this line that everything belonging to the transferential realm is established, with the imaginary playing its role as a filter, and even as an obstacle. Of course, in every neurosis, the subject already has, as it were, his own set functioning. His set functioning in relation to the image serves him when it comes both to hearing and to not hearing what is there to be heard in the locus of speech.

Let's say no more than the following. What happens if all our effort and interest is focused solely on the imaginary relation that lies here in this transversal position in relation to the advent of speech? What happens if everything is misrecognised when it comes to the relationship between the imaginary tension and what has to be made a reality, what has to be brought to light, with respect to the unconscious symbolic relation – because here lies precisely the whole analytic doctrine in a potential state, and because there is something here that must allow this symbolic relation to be realised as history as much as an avowal? What happens if we abandon the notion of the imaginary relationship functioning in relation to this impossibility of symbolic advent that constitutes neurosis, and if we fail to take them into account constantly in their mutual functioning? Well, what one can in principle expect to hear is what the authors who hold this conception speak of in terms of distance with respect to this object, which is precisely set to one certain end. Should we turn our interest to this distance only in order to abolish it, were such a thing possible, we would come to a certain result that indeed has already been borne out by subjects who have come into our hands after having passed through this style of apprehension and test. One thing is absolutely certain, which is that in at least a certain number of cases, these being precisely cases of obsessional neurosis, this way of situating the development of the analytic situation entirely within a pursuit of the reduction of this notorious distance – a distance they consider to be typical of the object relation in obsessional neurosis – leads to what may be called paradoxical perverse reactions.

We are now seeing phenomena that are quite out of the ordinary, which scarcely existed in the analytic literature before this technical mode was brought to the fore. I'm thinking for example of the precipitated outbreak of a homosexual attachment to an object, one that is in some sense quite paradoxical in the subject's relationship, which even lingers there in the manner of a kind of artefact, a thing that has crystallised around objects that are lying around within his reach. This can display for some time a somewhat durable persistence.

None of this is astonishing if we refer to the imaginary triad.

At the point to which matters were brought last time, you were able to see a line of research being sketched out concerning the imaginary triad of mother–child–phallus. This was for us to stay at the level of a prelude to the bringing into play of the symbolic relationship that will be wrought only with the fourth function, that of the father, which is introduced through the dimension of the Oedipus complex.

The triangle is itself preoedipal. I stress that this is only being isolated here in an abstract way. It is of interest to us in its development only to the extent that it is subsequently taken up in the quartet that is constituted by the paternal function entering the fray, on the basis of what we may call the child's fundamental disappointment. This happens when he recognises – we have left open the question of how – not only that he is not his mother's sole object, but also that his mother's point of interest is the phallus, in a way that has greater or lesser accentuation depending on the case. On the basis of this recognition, he is to realise in a second moment precisely that she is deprived of this object, that she lacks it. This is the point we reached last time.

I showed you this with reference to the case of a transitory phobia in a very young girl, which is highly favourable to the study of phobia because it stands on the frontier of the Oedipal relationship. We were able to see this frontier in the wake of a double disappointment. First, there is an imaginary disappointment, which is the child's ascertaining the phallus that she lacks. Next, in a second moment, comes the perception that her mother, who is on the frontier between the symbolic and the real, also lacks the phallus. Then comes the child's appeal for this unsustainable relationship to be sustained. The phobia breaks out with the intervention of the fantasmatic creature, the dog, which steps in as the one that is responsible for the whole situation, strictly speaking. It bites. It castrates. It is owing to the dog that the whole situation is thinkable and symbolically liveable, at least for a provisional period.

What position is possible when, on this occasion, the yoking of the three imaginary objects is broken? There is more than one possible solution, and a solution is always called upon, whether the situation is normal or abnormal.

What happens in the normal Oedipal situation? It is through the intermediary of a certain rivalry, punctuated in the subject's relations with the father, that something will be established that will mean that the subject will find him- or herself being conferred this phallic might, in various ways depending on the subject's position as a boy or as a girl. For the boy, this is altogether clear. The conferring of this phallic might happens within certain limits, which are precisely those that introduced the subject to the symbolic relationship.

I told you the other day that, for the mother, the child as a real being is captured as a symbol of her lack of object, of her imaginary wish for the phallus. The normal outcome of this situation is that the child receives, symbolically, the phallus he is in need of. But for him to be in need of it, it was necessary for him first to be threatened by the castrating agency, which is originatively and essentially the paternal agency. It is within a constitution on the symbolic plane, on the plane of a sort of pact of entitlement to the phallus, that this virile identification is established, which lies at the base of a normative Oedipal relationship.

I will slip in a side-remark here concerning the originative formulations that come from Freud's pen when introducing the distinction between the anaclitic relationship and the narcissistic relationship. They are somewhat peculiar, and even paradoxical.

In the libidinal relationship in adolescents, Freud tells us that there are two types of love. There is anaclitic love, which bears the stamp of a primal dependence on the mother, and the narcissistic love object, which is modelled on the image that is the subject's own self-image, the narcissistic image. It is this image that we have been striving to develop here by showing its root in the specular relation to the other party.

The word anaclitic, even though we owe it to Freud, is ill wrought, for in Greek it really doesn't have the meaning that Freud gives it, this being indicated by the German word Anlehnung. It's a relationship of propping against. Furthermore, this gives rise to all sorts of misunderstanding, some having pushed this propping against so far as to turn it into something that is ultimately a kind of defensive reaction. But let's leave this aside. In fact, when one reads Freud, one can see that this is well and truly about the need for a prop and for something that indeed asks only to open out on the side of a relationship of dependence.

If we press further, we shall see that there are peculiar contradictions in the two contrasting formulations that Freud provides for these two modes of relationship, the anaclitic and the narcissistic. Rather curiously, with regard to the anaclitic relationship he is led to speak of a need to be loved much more than a need to love. Conversely, and altogether paradoxically, the narcissist all of a sudden appears in a light that surprises us. Indeed, Freud is drawn to an element of activity that is inherent to the highly particular behaviour of the narcissist. He appears to be active insomuch as he always misrecognises the other party to a certain degree. Freud adorns him, in contradistinction to the anaclitic type, with the need to love, and gives him its attribute, which suddenly and paradoxically turns this into a sort of natural site for what in another vocabulary we would call the oblative, which cannot help but disconcert.

I think we will have to come back to this, but once again, it is in the misrecognition of the position of intersubjective elements that these paradoxical perspectives find their origin and, by the same stroke, their justification.

What is called the anaclitic relationship – there where it is of interest, that is, in its persistence in the adult – is always conceived of as a sort of pure and simple survival, or prolongation, of what is called an infantile position. In his article on Libidinal Types, Freud refers to this position as neither more nor less than an erotic position, which shows very well that this is the most open position. Its essence will be misconstrued if one fails to notice the following. It is precisely in so far as, in the symbolic relationship, the male subject acquires, is invested with, the phallus as such, as belonging to him and as being legitimately wielded by him, that he becomes the bearer of the object of desire for the object that succeeds the maternal object. This object that succeeds the maternal object is the re-found object, marked by the relationship with the primal mother, which in the normal position of the Oedipus complex – this is how it is, in principle, from the first in what Freud expounded – will invariably be the object of the male subject, namely woman. The position becomes anaclitic in so far as it is upon him, upon the phallus of which he is now the master, the representative, the custodian, that woman depends.

The relationship of dependence is established in so far as, identifying with the other party, with the objectal partner, the subject knows that he is indispensable for this partner. He knows that he is the one who has satisfied her, and he alone, because in principle he is the sole custodian of this object that is the mother's object of desire. It is commensurate with an achievement of the Oedipal position that the subject finds himself in the stance that, from a certain standpoint, may be qualified as optimal with respect to the re-found object, the successor to the primal maternal object, and in relation to whom he will become the indispensable object, knowing himself to be indispensable. One portion of the erotic life of subjects who partake of this libidinal aspect is wholly conditioned by the need, once it has been experienced and assumed, of the Other, of the maternal woman, in so far she needs to find the object in him, this object being the phallic object. This is what forms the essence of the anaclitic relationship in contradistinction to the narcissistic relationship.

This is a mere parenthesis designed to show how useful it is always to bring into play the dialectic of the relationship between these first three objects and the fourth term that encompasses them and binds them into the symbolic relationship, namely the father. This term introduces the symbolic relationship and, with it, the possibility of transcending the relationship of frustration or lack of object, thereby shifting up into the relationship of castration which is something altogether different. That is to say, it introduces this lack of object into a dialectic, into something that gives and takes, that instates, invests and confers the dimension of a pact, of an interdiction, of a law, and in particular the incest prohibition.

Let's come back to our topic. What happens when, in the absence of the symbolic relationship, the imaginary relationship becomes the rule and the measure of the entire anaclitic relationship? Well, exactly the following. When discord, when non-binding or the destruction of bonds, come about for whatever reason in the progressive development of historical incidents in the child's relationship with the mother in respect of the third-party object – the phallic object that is both what woman lacks and what the child has uncovered as lacking for the mother – there are other modes by which this coherence can be re-established. There are imaginary modes, which are atypical.

For example, there is the child's identification with the mother. On the basis of an imaginary displacement in relation to the maternal partner, the child will make the phallic choice in her place, will assume for her the clinamen towards the phallic object as such.

The scheme that I'm giving you here is none other than the scheme for fetishist perversion. This is one example of a solution, if you like, but there is a more direct path. In other words, further solutions exist to access this lack of object. Already, on the imaginary plane, this lack of object constitutes the human path to a realisation that cedes man to his existence, that is, to something that can be called into question. This is already something different from the animal realm and from all possible animal relationships on the imaginary plane. This imaginary access to the lack of object is achieved under certain conditions that will in some sense be punctuated, and which are extra-historical, which is how the fever pitch of perversion always presents.

Perversion has the property of bringing about a certain mode of access to what lies beyond the image of the other that typifies the human dimension, but it does so only in such moments as are always produced by the fever pitches of perversion, moments that are syncopated within the subject's history. There is a kind of convergence or build-up towards such moments, each of which can be significantly qualified as a passage à l'acte. During this passage à l'acte, something is brought about that is both a fusion and a point of access to what lies beyond, which is strictly speaking the trans-individual dimension that Freud's anaclitic theory formulated as such. Freud's theory teaches us to call by the name Eros the union of two individuals, each of whom is torn away from himself and, for an instant that is more or less fragile and transitory, even virtual, finds himself a constituent of this unit. A unity such as this is brought about at certain moments in perversion, but what is specific to perversion is precisely that it can only ever be brought about in these moments that are not ordained symbolically.

In fetishism, the subject finds his object at last, his exclusive object, and says as much himself. It is all the more exclusive and perfectly satisfying in that it is inanimate. This way, at least, he will be calm in the knowledge that it will not disappoint him. To love a slipper is really to have the object of one's desires in easy reach. An object that is itself bereft of any subjective, intersubjective, or even trans-subjective property is more reliable. When it comes to bringing about the condition of lack as such, the fetishist solution is incontestably one of the most conceivable conditions within this perspective, and it is indeed transformed into a reality.

We also know – because what is specific to imaginary relationships is that they are always perfectly reciprocal, since this is a mirror relation – that in the fetishist we must expect to see arising from time to time the position, not of identification with the mother, but of identification with the object. This is effectively what we shall see being produced in the course of an analysis of a fetishist, for this position is as such what is invariably non-satisfying in the utmost. That for a short while the mesmerising illumination of the object that the maternal object was should be something that satisfies the subject is not enough for an entire erotic equilibrium to be established around it. Moreover, if he identifies with the object for this brief moment, he will effectively lose his primal object, namely the mother, and will reckon himself to be a destructive object for her. This perpetual game, this profound double vision, marks each and every apprehending of the fetishist manifestation.

This is so visible that someone like Phyllis Greenacre, who has sought seriously to look into the foundation of the fetishist relationship, tells us that it seems as though we are in the presence of a subject who is showing us with excessive speed his own image in two opposite mirrors. She comes out with it like that, without her really knowing why. It comes out of the blue, but right away she has the sense that this is how it is. The fetishist is never where he is, for the good reason that he has left his place. He has gone over to a specular relationship between the mother and the phallus, where he is both one and the other in alternation. This is a position that does not manage to stabilise unless there is some grasp of this unique symbol that is privileged yet at the same time impermanent, this being the precise object of the fetishism, that is to say, this something that symbolises the phallus.

It is therefore on the plane of relationships that, while they are not identical, are at the very least analogous, and which we can conceive of as being essentially perverse in nature, that the results will surely emerge, at least the transitory results, in the context of a certain way of handling the analytic relationship. This is what happens when this relationship is focused entirely on the object relation in so far as only the imaginary and the real are allowed to intervene, and when the whole focus of the imaginary relationship is set upon what is claimed to be real about the presence of the analyst.

This is what we are going to see now.

In my Rome report, I alluded to how this mode of the object relation is being used in analysis. I compared it to what I called a sort of bundling taken to the extreme as a psychological test.

This short passage perhaps went unnoticed, but I enlighten the reader in a footnote that specifies that bundling is a very precise practice, which still exists in these sorts of cultural islet where old customs have weathered well. Stendhal speaks of it as a kind of particularity of Swiss fantasists, also to be found in southern Germany, places that are not unimportant from the geographical point of view.[2]

This bundling is a conception of love relations. It is a technique, a pattern of relations between male and female that consists of the following. Under certain conditions, for instance when an associate comes into the group in a privileged way, it is allowed, as a show of hospitality, that someone of the household, generally the daughter, may extend to him the offer of sharing her bed, on the condition that there should be no contact between them. The word bundling comes from the fact that more often than not the daughter is wrapped in a bed sheet, such that all conditions of approach are possible save the final one. What could pass for a mere blithe and fanciful tradition that perhaps we might regret that we are not participating in – it could be amusing – warrants our attention because ultimately there is nothing artificial in saying that now, seventeen or eighteen years after Freud's death, the analytic situation has come paradoxically to be conceived of and formalised in this manner.

Fain and Marty's article reports on one session, noting down all the patient's movements insomuch as they manifest something of an oriented impulse that is more or less held back, at greater or lesser distance, from the analyst who is there, behind her back. There is something rather striking here. Their text came out after I wrote my report, which proves I forced nothing in saying that it is to this end, and to these psychological consequences, that the practice of analysis was being reduced within one particular conception.

We find these paradoxes in the habits and customs of certain cultural islets, for example there is a protestant sect of Dutch origin that someone has studied in depth, which has maintained very precisely the local customs linked to one religious unit, the Amish sect. Without doubt all of this emerges today in remnants that are not understood, but we can find their fully coordinated, deliberated and organised symbolic formulation across a whole tradition that may be termed religious and even symbolic. Everything we know about the practice of courtly love and the whole sphere in which it was localised in the Middle Ages implies a very rigorous technical elaboration of the approach to love that entailed a long practice of restraint in the presence of the loved object, aiming to make a reality of what lies beyond, which is what is sought in love and is specifically erotic. Once one has uncovered the key to all these techniques and traditions, one finds their points of emergence thoroughly formulated in other cultural spheres, because this is a realm of search in the realisation of love that has been set out with great deliberation on many occasions in the history of humanity.

We do not need to pose the question here of what is ordained and effectively reached. Nor is there any doubt that the fact that this aims at something that tries to go beyond physiological corner-cutting, if it may be expressed in this way, should hold a certain interest. This is not something that is being introduced without a reference that allows us to locate with precision both this metaphor and, at the same time, the possibility of integrating across various levels, that is to say, in a loosely conscious fashion, what they make of this use of the imaginary relationship as such. This relationship is perhaps itself employed deliberately. It is a use, as it were, of practices that may seem perverse to unworldly eyes, but which in reality are no more so than any other regulating of the approach to love in a defined sphere of customs and patterns, as they say. This is something that deserves to be indicated as a reference point, so that we may know where to situate ourselves.

Let's turn now to a case that is set out in the small Bulletin I mentioned last time, which reports questions posed in all sincerity, by the members of a particular group, with respect to the object relation. We have here from the pen of someone who has assumed a certain rank in the analytic community, Mme Ruth Lebovici, the observation of what she quite rightly calls a phobic subject.

This phobic subject, whose activity was already fairly restricted, has come to a state of almost complete inactivity. His most manifest symptom is the fear of being too tall, and he presents always with an extremely bent-over posture. Nearly everything has become impossible for him in his professional context. He lives housebound, but nevertheless has a mistress, fifteen years his senior and who was purveyed to him by his mother. It is within this constellation that the analyst takes him on and starts to broach the question with him.

The diagnosis of the subject is made with finesse. This diagnosis of phobia brooks no difficulty, despite the paradoxical fact that the phobogenic object in its foremost aspect does not seem to lie on the outside. Nevertheless, it does lie on the outside inasmuch as at one point we can see a recurring dream appear which is the model for an exteriorised anxiousness. In this particular case, the object is discovered only on a second approach. It is a phobic object that is perfectly recognisable in that it is marvellously illustrated by the substitute for the paternal image that utterly falls short in this case. Indeed, after a while, an image is obtained of a man in armour, who is equipped with a particularly aggressive instrument that is none other than a Fly-Tox pump sprayer for wiping out phobic objects – insects. The subject reveals that he harbours a fear of being pursued and strangled in the dark by this man in armour, and this fear is no small matter in the overall balance of this phobic structure.

The analyst who has this subject in her charge has published the observation under the title Perversion sexuelle transitoire au cours d'un traitement psychanalytique. Therefore, there is no forcing on my part when I introduce the question of the perverse reaction, since the author herself accentuates this as the focus of interest in the observation.

The author is ill at ease, to say the least. Not only is she ill at ease, but she has seen very clearly that the reaction she calls perverse – this is a label, of course – arose in precise circumstances in which she plays a part. The fact that she poses the question in relation to this moment proves she is aware that this is where the question lies. What happened? Having finally seen the phobogenic object come to light – the man in armour – she interprets it as being the phallic mother. Why the phallic mother when this is absolutely the man in armour with all his heraldic aspects? Throughout the entire observation, the questions that the author asks herself are set out with a fidelity that I believe to be beyond doubt, and in any case they are carefully underscored. In particular, the author asks herself whether perhaps one interpretation that she made was not the right one.

Indeed, soon after this interpretation, a perverse reaction becomes apparent and we are then engaged in nothing less than a three-year period throughout which the subject developed, stage by stage, a perverse fantasy. This consisted first in imagining himself being seen urinating by a woman who, greatly aroused, would then solicit him for sexual relations. Next, there was a reversal of this position, with the subject watching – sometimes while he would masturbate, sometimes not – a woman urinating.[3] Lastly, at a third stage, this position was effectively made a reality when the subject found in a cinema a small box room providentially equipped with a hole through which he could effectively watch the women in the toilets on the other side of the partition.

The author herself wonders whether her way of interpreting might have had a determining value in precipitating what at first assumes the appearance of a fantasmatic crystallisation of something that clearly forms part of the subject's composite elements, this being not the phallic mother but rather the mother in her relation with the phallus. But the key to this idea that a phallic mother is involved is given to us by the author when she wonders about the overall handling of the treatment, and observes that she was far more prohibitive than his mother had ever been. Everything shows that the entity of the phallic mother has been produced here by what the author herself refers to as her own countertransferential positions. If one follows the analysis closely, there can be absolutely no doubt about this. Concomitant with the development of this imaginary relationship, which of course developed from this analytic faux pas, let's see what is involved on the analyst's side.

First, the subject reports a dream in which, finding himself in the presence of a woman from his past for whom he claims to have had amorous inclinations, he finds himself impeded by the presence of another female subject who also played a role in his personal history in that he had once seen her urinate in front of him.[4] This happened late in his childhood, that is, in his teenage years. The analyst intervenes by saying – No doubt you prefer to turn your attentions to a woman by watching her urinate rather than make the effort of going after another woman who might be to your liking but who happens to be married. By means of this intervention the analyst thinks she is reintroducing the truth, but in a somewhat strained manner because the male character is only indicated in the dream through associations. That is to say, the supposed husband of the mother, the husband who would reintroduce the Oedipus complex, intervenes in a way that has every character of provocation, especially when we know that it was the analyst's husband who referred the subject to her. It is at this precise moment that a change of tack occurs, with the progressive turnaround of the watching fantasy which shifts from the sense of being watched to that of watching himself.

Second, as though that were not enough, in response to the subject's request to space out the frequency of the sessions, the analyst says – Now you're showing your passive positions, because you know full well that, whatever happens, you won't get that. From this point on, the fantasy crystallises completely, which proves that there is something more. The subject, who understands a great deal about his relations of impossibility when it comes to attaining the female object, ends up developing his fantasies within the treatment itself. He speaks of his fear of urinating on the couch, and so on. He starts to have these reactions that show a certain closing of the distance to the real object, such as peeping at the analyst's legs – which, moreover, she notes with a certain satisfaction. Indeed, there is something that lies on the edge of the real situation, as though we were witnessing the constitution of the mother who is, not phallic, but aphallic. If there is one thing that lies at the root of the fetishist position then it is very precisely that the subject comes to a standstill at a certain level in his investigation and observation of woman, inasmuch as she has or has not the organ that is called into question.

This position gradually leads the subject to say, My goodness, there's no solution but to sleep with my analyst. He tells her so. Realising that this is starting to get somewhat on her nerves, the analyst remarks, You're amusing yourself by taking fright at something you know full well will never happen. Then, she wonders anxiously, Was I right to say that?

Anyone can wonder as to what degree of mastery such an intervention might entail. This somewhat blunt reminder of the conventions of the analytic situation is utterly in accord with the notion that can be entertained of the analytic position as a real position. So, things are here brought to a head. It is immediately after this intervention that the subject makes a definitive passage à l'acte and finds the perfect location, the choice site in the real, namely the specific arrangement of a loo in a cinema on the Champs-Elysées. This time he really will find himself at the right real distance from the object of his observation, separated by a wall. This time he can observe the object not as a phallic mother, but well and truly as aphallic. Here he suspends for a certain while all his erotic activity, having found there such satisfaction that he declares that until the time of this discovery he had lived as an automaton, but that now everything has changed.

This is what things have come to. In summarising this observation I wanted simply to allow you to put a finger on how the notion of distance from the analyst-object as a real object, and the notion of so-called reference, can be something that is not without effect, and how, all things considered, these are perhaps not the most desirable effects.

I won't tell you how the treatment ends. It would have to be examined meticulously, so richly instructive is its every detail. The final session is eluded, the subject undergoing surgery on varicose veins. Everything is laid out here. The timid attempt to access castration and a certain liberty that can arise from it is even indicated. It is deemed that, after this, they've gone far enough. The subject goes back to his mistress, the same he had at the outset, fifteen years his senior, and since he no longer speaks about his tallness, the phobia is thought to have been cured. Unfortunately, now he thinks only of one matter – his shoe size. Sometimes his shoes are too big and he loses balance in them, sometimes they are too small and they pinch his feet. Thus, the change of tack, the transformation of the phobia, is complete. After all, why not regard this as the end of the analytic work? Either way, from the experimental standpoint there is something that is surely not without interest.

The summit of access to the supposedly correct distance from the real object is provided – seemingly with a sign of recognition among initiates – when the subject has a perception, in the presence of his analyst, of the odour of urine. This is deemed to be the moment at which the distance from the real object – throughout the observation we are told that this is the point at which any neurotic relationship fails – is finally accommodated within its exact scope. Of course, this coincides with the moment when the perversion reaches its height.

This is not strictly speaking a perversion – and the author is not unwilling to face up to this – but much rather an artefact. Such things, though they can be permanent or long-lasting, are nevertheless artefacts that are liable to be broken off or dissolved, and sometimes fairly abruptly. Thus, in this case, after a while the subject is caught by surprise by an usherette. This simple fact of being surprised by the usherette is enough to make him drop, there and then, his visits to the especially propitious site that the real had offered him at just the right moment.

Indeed, the real is always timely in offering everything one needs when finally one has been set, along the proper paths, at the proper distance.

THE PERVERSE WAYS OF DESIRE

VI

THE PRIMACY OF THE PHALLUS AND THE YOUNG HOMOSEXUAL WOMAN

Freud, the girl, and the phallus
The signifier Niederkommt
The lies of the unconscious
Serving the lady
Beyond the object

Today we are going to launch ourselves into a problem that, were we moving forward step by step, we ought normally to be meeting much further on in our disquisition. This problem is that of perversion, in inverted commas, the most problematic perversion there is from the perspective of analysis, namely female homosexuality.

Why am I proceeding in this way? Contingency is playing a part in this. But it is quite certain that we cannot examine the object relation this year without meeting the female object.

You know that the problem is not so much one of how we meet the female object in analysis. Analysis provides us with plenty for our edification when the subject of this encounter is not natural. I showed you this quite adequately in the first lessons from last term, reminding you that the female subject is always hailed, when encountered by a man, to a sort of re-finding that positions her from the first in this ambiguity between natural relations and symbolic relations. I've been trying to show you how the entire analytic dimension inheres in this ambiguity.

The problem now is to find out what the female object thinks about this, because what the female object thinks about it is even less natural than the way in which the male subject approaches her. What path does she take, from her earliest approaches to the natural and primordial object of desire that is the mother's breast? How does the female object enter this dialectic?

I am not calling the woman object today just for the sake of it. It's quite clear that this object must at some point start functioning, yet it assumes this position of object that is so scarcely natural because it's a position at one remove, which there is no interest in qualifying as such except in that it's a position that is taken by a subject.

Female homosexuality has been ascribed a particularly exemplary value in analysis as a whole for what it has revealed in terms of the stages and the stopping-points that can mark out woman's destiny on the path she wends.

What is natural or biological at the start is constant in carrying over to the symbolic plane, where it is a matter of its being taken on board by the subject who is herself caught in the symbolic chain. It is precisely here that woman is at issue, to the very extent that she is to make a choice that, whichever side it may come from, must, as the analytic experience teaches us, be a compromise between what is to be attained and what it has not been possible to attain. The fact that female homosexuality is met whenever the discussion bears upon the subject of stages, which the woman has to complete in her symbolic becoming, ought to lead us during this period to read a certain number of texts exhaustively, in particular those that come in succession from Freud's hand from 1923 onwards, the date of his article on The Infantile Genital Organisation.

In this text Freud posits as a principle the Primat des Phallus, the primacy of the assumption of the phallus. The phallic phase is the final stage in the childhood phase of sexuality and is typical for both boys and girls. The genital organisation is reached by them both, but in accordance with a type that makes the possession or the non-possession of the phallus the primordial differential element. At this level, the genital organisation is contrasted in either sex. Freud tells us that at this moment there is no realisation of male and female, but rather of what is endowed with the phallic attribute and what is not, the latter being deemed equivalent to having been castrated.

I will add, to spell out his thought clearly, that this organisation is the formula from an essential stage that brings to an end the first phase of childhood sexuality, which comes to a close with the entry into the latency period. I will further specify that this is founded, for one sex as much as for the other, upon a miscarriage, a Mißlingen.[1] This miscarriage is in turn founded upon an unawareness – not misrecognition, but unawareness – of the fertilising role of male semen and, on the other side, of the existence as such of the female organ.

These are very considerable assertions that require some exegesis if they are to be understood, for here we cannot be in the presence of something that may be taken at the level of real experience.

Indeed, an objection was raised, and in the deepest confusion, by authors who went into action in the wake of this assertion from Freud. A very great number of facts lead to the admission that in a certain number of experiences there is a revelation of the presence, perhaps not of the real role of the male in the procreative act, but certainly of the female organ, at least for girls. It can hardly be contested that in the early experience of young girls there is something that corresponds to vaginal localisation, with sensations and even precocious vaginal masturbation. This is the reality in at least a certain number of cases. On this basis, people set to wondering whether the predominance of the phallic phase ought to be attributed to the existence of the clitoris. They wondered whether this is due to the fact that libido, as they say – making this term the synonym of all erogenous experience – is initially focused exclusively on the clitoris or whether this might come about only after a displacement that must be both long and painful, necessitating a lengthy detour.

Freud's assertion can certainly not be understood in such terms. When it is couched in these terms, too many confused facts enable all sorts of objections to be levelled at it. I will allude to one such objection issued by Karen Horney, which is dictated by realist premises deeming that every misrecognition presupposes in the unconscious a certain acquaintance with the coaptation of the two sexes. This leads her to say that, in girls, the supervalence of the organ that as such does not belong to them in their own right can come about only against the backdrop of a certain denial of the existence of the vagina, which has to be accounted for. Based on these hypotheses, accepted as a priori, she ventures to trace back to a genesis of this phallic term in the girl. When we go into the details, we will see a kind of necessity that is borrowed from a certain number of theoretical premises, expressed in part by the author herself. She shows this very clearly through the very uncertainty of the ultimate fact to which this necessity is referred, for the facts upon which this primordial experience of the vaginal organ are based are exceedingly discreet and even reticent. What is at issue here is a sort of reconstruction that is required by theoretical premises that stem from having taken a wrong path in the understanding of Freud's assertion.

Freud's assertion is grounded in his experience. While it is advanced with care, even with a share of incertitude that is so characteristic of his presentation of this discovery, it is asserted none the less as primordial. It's a fixed point. The paradoxical assertion of phallicism is the very pivot around which the theoretical interpretation must be developed. This is what we are going to try to do.

Eight years later, in 1931, he writes something yet more considerable on Female Sexuality, which further extends his assertion of 1923. During the interval, an exceedingly lively discussion has taken place among his pupils which, such as it is reported by Karen Horney and by Jones, contains a crop of speculations. Thus, there is a veritable tangle of approximations here, which I've had to wade through over the holiday break. I must say that it has struck me as especially hard to give an account of this discussion without falsifying it, because what characterises it is assuredly how ill-mastered are the categories that are brought into play.

To give some account of this, and to get something of it across, there is no other means of proceeding but to master it, and to master it is already to alter its axis and nature completely. So, to a certain extent, this will not offer an accurate perspective of what is at issue, for this ill-mastered character is truly essential to the whole problem. It is truly correlative to the second goal of our theoretical examination this year, which is to show, in parallel with our exploration of the object relation, how analytic practice has been committing inflexibly to a deviation that cannot be mastered.

To come back to the precise incidence that concerns us today, it occurred to me this morning that one exemplary image could be isolated from this heap of doings, plucked from one of these articles.

All of the authors accept that in the young girl's detour in her development, when she enters the Oedipus complex she starts to desire a child from the father as a substitute for the missing phallus. The disappointment of not receiving a child from the father will play an essential role in making the young girl retreat from the identification with the father that she established on entering the Oedipus complex. All the authors accept in principle that this will lead her to take up once more the feminine position, along the path of the privation of the child that she desires from the father. So, one of these authors cites the example of an analysis of a child in order to show the degree to which this disappointment can come into play and impact upon the present, precipitating the motion of the Oedipus complex. This motion is exemplified as being essentially unconscious, so, in the course of the young girl's analysis, she was enabled to bring this image to light of day. Finding herself thereby greater enlightened as to what was going on in her unconscious, thereafter every morning she woke up to ask in a fury – Hasn't the child come yet?

This instance strikes me as exemplary of what is at issue in this deviation from analytic practice, which will be attendant throughout this year's theoretical exploration of the object relation. Here, we put a finger on how a certain pattern of understanding and tackling frustrations is in reality something that leads the analyst to a manner of intervention the effects of which not only appear doubtful, but positively opposed to what plays out through the process of analytic interpretation. It is plain to see that the notion we may form of a child from the father appearing at some point in the development as an imaginary object, as a substitute for this missing phallus, which plays an essential role in the young girl's development, cannot be brought into play at just any moment and in any old way. It can only be brought into play later, or else at a contemporary stage on the condition that the child, to the extent that the subject does have dealings with this child, has entered the interplay of a series of symbolic resonances that will concern what the subject has experienced in the past, at the phallic stage, namely everything that might be bound for this subject to possessive or destructive reactions at the moment of the phallic crisis, with all that this entails that is so problematic in the stage of childhood to which it corresponds. In short, everything that refers to the supervalence or the predominance of the phallus at one stage of the child's development only finds its point of impact retroactively.

The phallus can be brought into play only in so far as it becomes necessary at one moment or another to symbolise some event that may occur, whether this is the late arrival of a child for someone who is in an immediate relation with the child, or else the subject's question as to the possession of the child, which is to pose the question of the subject's own motherhood. But to bring in, at a different moment, something that does not intervene in the subject's symbolic structuration but rather bears a certain relation of imaginary substitution, precipitated then and there by speech on the symbolic plane, and which will be experienced by the child in an utterly different way, is tantamount to acknowledging it as having already been organised. It is tantamount to introducing it into some sort of legitimacy that literally acknowledges frustration as such at the heart of the experience, when in fact this is not how it is legitimately introduced.

Frustration cannot be legitimately introduced as such in interpretation unless it has effectively passed through at the level of the unconscious, as the correct theory tells us. This frustration is but an evanescent moment, which holds importance and a function only for we analysts, on a purely theoretical plane as an articulation of what has occurred. That it should become a reality for the subject is excluded by definition, because it is exceedingly unstable. Frustration only has any importance and interest in so far as it leads on to something else, to one or other of the two planes that I distinguished for you as castration and privation. The plane of castration is nothing less than what establishes, in its true order, the necessity of this frustration. It transcends it and instates it in a law that lends it a different value. Furthermore, this is what sanctions the existence of privation, because the idea of privation is inconceivable on the plane of the real. The idea of privation is effectively conceivable only for a being who is articulating something on the symbolic plane.

We can grasp this in those interventions that are in some way interventions of support, of psychotherapy, like, say, the intervention I mentioned briefly concerning the young girl who was in the hands of one of Anna Freud's pupils.

You will recall that this young girl presented the beginnings of a phobia that arose in connection with her experience of effectively being deprived of something. This privation occurred under conditions that were different from those within which the child found herself confined. Indeed, I showed you that the mainspring of the necessary displacement of the phobia on no account lay in this experience. This mainspring lies not in the fact that she doesn't have the phallus, but in the fact that her mother couldn't give it to her. Further still, the mother couldn't give it to her because she didn't have it herself.

The psychotherapist's intervention consists in telling her – and she is quite right – that all girls are like that. This might sound like a reduction to the real, but it is not. The child knows full well that she doesn't have the phallus. The psychotherapist lets her know that this is the rule, thereby making it pass over to the symbolic plane of Law. This way of intervening does indeed remain debatable from the standpoint of efficacy, because in truth the psychotherapist can only wonder whether it might have been effective or not in a certain reduction of the phobia. At that point it is clear that it was effective only in an extremely fleeting way. The phobia resumes with greater intensity, and will only subside once the child has been integrated into a complete family.

Why so? In principle, the child's frustration should seem to her even greater than before, for now she is confronted with a stepfather, that is to say, a male who enters the family dynamic, her mother having until then been a widow. And there is now an elder brother too. But in fact the phobia really does subside, because it literally no longer needs to make up for this absence of any specifically phallophore element in the symbolic circuit, that is to say, the absence of males.

These critical remarks bear above all on use of the term frustration. This use is in a certain sense legitimised by the fact that what is essential in this dialectic is much rather the lack of object than the object itself. Frustration corresponds very well, in appearance, to a conceptual notion. But what is at stake concerns the instability of the very dialectic of frustration.

Frustration is not privation. Why not? Frustration concerns something you are deprived of by someone else, from whom you might precisely have hoped to get what you were asking for. Thus, what is at stake in frustration is something that is less the object than the love of the one who can bestow this gift upon you, if and when it is given to you. The object of frustration is less the object than the gift.

Here we find ourselves at the origin of a dialectic that stands at one remove from the symbolic, and which itself fades away from one instant to the next because this gift is a gift that is still bestowed only as though it were free of charge. It comes from the other. What lies behind this other, namely the full chain in virtue of which the gift comes to you, is yet un-glimpsed. It is only afterwards that the subject will perceive this and notice that the gift is far more complete than at first appeared, in that it entails the entire human chain in the symbolic. But at the start of the dialectic of frustration there is merely the confrontation with the other and the gift that surfaces.

If this gift is bestowed as a gift, it will make the object itself vanish as an object. In other words, if the request is granted, the object will pass into the background. If, however, the request is not granted, the object will, in this case too, vanish and change signification.

What justifies using the word frustration? There is frustration only when the subject shifts into revendication, into the laying claim that this term implies, bringing in the object as though it were something that may be demanded by right. At such a moment, the object enters what may be called the narcissistic zone of the subject's appurtenances.

In either case, whichever should occur, the moment of frustration is an evanescent moment. It leads on to something that projects us onto a plane that is different from that of pure and simple desire. The request does indeed have something about it with which human experience is very familiar, which is that in itself it can never be truly granted as such. Whether it is granted or not, it will be annihilated, it will be wiped out, at the next stage, whereupon it projects onto something else – either onto the articulation of the symbolic chain of gifts, or onto this closed and absolutely inextinguishable register that is called narcissism, in virtue of which the object is for the subject both what is him and what is not him, with which he can never be satisfied, precisely in this sense that it is him and is not him at the same time. It is solely insomuch as frustration enters a dialectic, which by legalising it also situates it by lending it this dimension of something free of charge, that the symbolised order of the real can be established whereby the subject is able to instate certain permanent privations, for example, as existent and accepted.

In misconstruing this condition, these various authors usher in all sorts of ways of reconstructing what is given to us in the experience as an effect linked to the fundamental lack of object. A whole series of impasses are thereby introduced, which are always linked to the idea of wanting to deduce the entire chain of experience on the basis of desire regarded as a pure element of the individual, with all that this desire brings with it in terms of repercussions both in his satisfaction and in his disappointment. Now, this entire chain of experience can literally be conceived of and elaborated only if we first posit the principle that nothing is articulated, that nothing can be layered up in experience, so long as we have not posited beforehand the fact that nothing can be established and constituted as a properly analysable conflict until the subject has entered the realm of the symbol, the legal realm of the symbolic order, the symbolic chain, which is the order of symbolic indebtedness. It is solely on the basis of the subject's entry into an order that pre-exists everything that happens to him, every kind of happening or disappointment, that everything through which he broaches this – that is to say, what is called his lived experience, this confused thing that is there beforehand – takes on an order, an articulation, and assumes its meaning. And only as such can it be analysed.

Nowhere else can I better enable you to appreciate how well-founded is this reminder – which ought to be no more than a reminder – than in a few texts by Freud himself, and by going through them with fresh eyes.

Yesterday evening some people spoke of an uncertain aspect, sometimes a paradoxically wild aspect, to some of Freud's texts, even speaking in terms of chanciness. Yet others spoke in terms of diplomacy – though I can't see why. This has led me to choose one of his most brilliant texts, and I would almost say one of the most disturbing, but it is conceivable that it might appear to you to be archaic and even outmoded. I'm referring to The Psychogenesis of a Case of Homosexuality in a Woman.

I will remind you of its essential points of articulation.

It concerns a young woman from a Viennese family of good standing. For such a family in the Vienna of 1920 to send someone to Freud amounted to taking a fairly large step. To resolve to do so, something exceedingly peculiar had to have occurred. The daughter of the household – a beautiful and clever girl of eighteen, from a very high social class – has become a cause of concern for her parents because she has been running around after a woman ten years her senior, a certain society lady. It is specified through all sorts of details provided by the family that this dame du monde is perhaps from a world that could be qualified as a demi-monde – going by how such things were predominantly classified in the Vienna of the time[2] – and not altogether respectable.

The young woman's attachment to this lady, which as events unfold is revealed to be truly passionate, puts her in a rather vexed relationship with her family. We then learn that this vexed relationship was not unrelated to what brought about the situation in the first place. To spell it right out, this concerns the fact that it throws her father into a rage, which certainly seems to be a motivating factor, not for the continuation of the passion itself, but for going about it in the way she does. I'm referring to the calm defiance with which she pursues her attentions towards the lady in question, waiting for her in the street and making in part a show of her affair. Without her flaunting it publicly, all of this is enough for her parents, and especially her father, not to be in the dark about it. We are also told that the mother is someone who is not exactly easy-going, having been neurotic. She doesn't take the situation quite so badly, or at least not so seriously.

They come to Freud to ask him to sort this out. He lays out altogether pertinently the difficulties of putting in place a treatment when one has to meet the family's stipulations, and notes quite rightly that one cannot do analysis on demand. In truth, this leads onto something yet more extraordinary, which motions in a direction that will make apparent Freud's considerations on the analysis itself and which to some will seem altogether out-of-date.

Freud specifies that the analysis was not taken to its end, but that it did allow him to see a very long way, which is why he is sharing it with us. He reveals that the analysis certainly did not enable him to change much in this young woman's destiny, and to explain this he introduces an idea that is not unfounded, though it may seem old-fashioned, a schematic idea that ought rather to incite us to return to certain fundamental givens instead of finding more manageable ones. This idea is that there are two phases to an analysis, the first being the procuring of everything there is to know, the second the bringing down of resistances that still hold strong even though the subject does by now know a great deal.

The comparison he then introduces is not one of the least astounding. He compares the first stage to preparing one's luggage before a journey, today so complicated and hard to effect, and the second to setting off and making the journey. Coming from a man who has a phobia of railways and travel, this reference is all the same rather spicy.

A yet more considerable matter is that throughout this time he has the sense that, effectively, nothing is working. He does, however, see very clearly what has been happening, and throws light on a certain number of stages.

In the subject's childhood there was something that seems not to have passed off without a hitch, when she beheld in the elder of her two brothers the difference that would make of her someone who does not possess the essentially desirable object, the phallic object. Nevertheless, Freud says that the girl had never been neurotic, and came to the analysis without even one hysterical symptom. Nothing in the childhood history is noteworthy from the standpoint of pathological consequences. This is precisely why it is remarkable, clinically speaking, to see emerging so belatedly the flaring of an attitude that strikes everyone as being downright abnormal, that is to say, the peculiar position that she occupies with respect to the faintly denigrated lady.

The passionate attachment that she shows towards her culminates in the outburst that leads her to Freud's consulting room. For things to have reached such a point that Freud would be involved, something peculiar had surely occurred.

In her mild flirting with danger, the girl would go strolling with the lady practically beneath the windows of her own home and, one day, her father comes out and sees them. Since there are other people around, he casts a furious look at them, and goes on his way. The lady asks the girl who it was, and she replies that it was her father. He doesn't look happy. The lady becomes incensed at this. It is noted that hitherto she had always shown a very reserved, even cold, attitude to the girl. On no account had she encouraged the girl's attentions, and she was not especially keen on being embroiled in any complications. So she tells her that, under these conditions – the affair must now come to an end. In Vienna there are these little cuttings for the suburban belt of the railway, and just nearby was one of those small footbridges that crosses over. From there, the girl falls, niederkommt. She fractures a couple of bones, but pulls through.

So, Freud tells us that up until the moment when the attachment appeared, not only had the girl's development been normal, but indeed everything suggested that she had been evolving very well. After all, hadn't she shown at the age of thirteen or fourteen a deportment that presaged the most congenial bearing in the feminine vocation, that of maternity? She used to dote on a small boy, even befriending his parents. And yet, all of a sudden, this sort of motherly love, which seemed to make of her a model mother in advance, was to come to an abrupt halt, and it was then that she started to associate with women – for the affair in question is not the first – whom Freud qualifies as mature, that is to say, who seem to be substitute mothers.

Nevertheless, this pattern is not really valid for the last in the line, for she truly incarnated the dramatic affair around which the engaging of the analysis was to revolve, along with the problematic of a declared homosexuality. Indeed, the subject declares to Freud that she is prepared to give up neither anything of her ambitions nor her object-choice. She will do all it takes to deceive her family, and she continues to safeguard her bonds with the person for whom she is far from having lost the taste, the lady having been sufficiently touched by this extraordinary mark of devotion to have become far more amenable since then.

Freud makes three very striking sets of remarks with respect to this declared and maintained relationship, and gives them the value of a sanction that is explicative either with regard to what occurred before the treatment, for example the suicide attempt, or with regard to his own failure. The first set seems very pertinent. The second too, though perhaps not altogether as he intends. One of the distinguishing features of Freud's observations is that they always leave us a great deal of extraordinary clarity, even on items that have in some sense eluded him. I'm alluding to the Dora observation, which Freud came to see clearly at a later stage. He intervened in the Dora case when he was still misconstruing the bearing of her question towards her own sex, that is to say, her homosexuality. Here we can observe an analogous misconstruing, but one that is far more instructive because it runs much deeper.

Then there are other things that he tells us without taking full advantage of them and which are certainly not the least interesting, about what is at issue in the suicide attempt that crowns the crisis with an act of significance. It certainly cannot be said that the subject is not tightly bound to the tension that mounts until the bursting of the conflict and the catastrophic occurrence.

How does Freud explain this? He says that it is within the register of a normal orientation of the subject towards the desire to have her father's child that the originative crisis has to be understood, the same that led to her committing herself to something that goes right in the opposite direction. Indeed, we are told that there is a great reverse of position, and Freud attempts to spell this out. This is one of those cases where being let down by the object of desire gives rise to a complete swing-over. The subject identifies with this object and, as Freud lays out with precision in a footnote, this is equivalent to a kind of regression to narcissism. When I make the dialectic of narcissism essentially this relationship between ego and little other, I'm doing absolutely no more than highlighting what is implicit in each of Freud's ways of expressing himself.

What, then, is this disappointment that brings about the reversal? When in her fifteenth year the subject was committed to the path of taking possession of the imaginary object, of the imaginary child – and she was sufficiently occupied with this child for it to leave its mark on the patient's history – it so happened that her mother really did bear a child from the father. In other words, the patient acquires a third brother. Here, then, is the key point.

This also makes for the apparently exceptional character of this observation. It is rather unusual that the late arrival of a little brother should have resulted in such a profound reversal of a subject's sexual orientation. It is at this moment that the girl changes position, and so now we shall see how this is best to be interpreted.

Freud tells us that this has to be regarded as a reactional phenomenon. The term is not in his text, but it is implied because he supposes that her resentment towards her father is still being played out. This linchpin in the situation explains her entire manner of handling the affair. The girl is distinctly aggressive towards her father, while the suicide attempt, which follows her being opposed by the counterpart object of her attachment, is simply the counter-aggressiveness from the father. Her aggression against the father swings round onto her own self, combined with something that symbolically satisfies what is at issue, namely a sort of collapse of the entire situation onto its primal givens through a precipitation, a reduction, to the level of the objects that are truly at stake. In short, when the girl falls from the little bridge she performs a symbolic act, which is none other than the Niederkommen of a child during childbirth. This is the term used in German for dropping or whelping.

Thus we are brought back to the ultimate and originary meaning of the structure of the situation.

In the second set of remarks that Freud makes, he explains how the situation lay in a cul-de-sac in the treatment.

He tells us that to the extent that the resistance had not been conquered, everything that was said to the patient was received with great interest, but without her giving up her latest position. Nowadays we would say that she held all this on the plane of an intellectual interest. He employs a metaphor, comparing her reactions to those of a grande dame being shown museum pieces, peering through her lorgnette and saying, How nice!

Nevertheless, he notes that it cannot be said that there was an absence of any transference. He indicates with great perspicacity the presence of the transference in the patient's dreams. Parallel to her unambiguous declarations of her determination not to change anything in her deportment towards the lady, her dreams herald a remarkable re-flowering of this most congenial bearing, the arrival of some handsome and satisfying husband and the expectant advent of an object, the fruit of this love. In short, the idyllic and almost forced character of this spouse announced by the dream appeared in such conformity with the efforts undertaken together that anyone else but Freud would have pinned great hopes upon it.

Freud makes no mistake. He spies a transference here. It is the doubling of the kind of counter-ploy that she was carrying on in response to the disappointment with the father. Indeed, she had not been solely aggressive and provocative with him. She also made him concessions. It was just a matter of showing the father that she was deceiving him. Freud recognises that something analogous is going on in these dreams of hers, and that this is their transferential signification. She is reproducing with him the fundamental stance of the cruel game she has been carrying on with her father.

We must not fail here to come back to this kind of founding relativity, which is essential to what is involved in symbolic formation to the extent that there lies the fundamental line of what for us constitutes the field of the unconscious. This is what Freud expresses with great accuracy – its only wrong is to be a little over accentuated – when he tells us, beside the intention to mislead me, the dreams partly expressed the wish to win my favour; they were also an attempt to gain my interest and my good opinion – perhaps in order to disappoint me all the more thoroughly later on.

Here appears the leading edge of the intention that is imputed to the subject, of presently occupying this stance of captivating him so as then to make him tumble from on high, to make him fall from an even greater height on account of having been drawn yet further into the situation. There can be no doubting, when one hears the accentuation of this sentence, that it harbours what we call a counter-transferential action. It is correct that the dream is deceptive, but Freud does not retain just this. Immediately after, he enters into a discussion that is quite gripping to find in his writing, on how the typical manifestation of the unconscious can be deceptive. It is certainly true that he understands in advance the objections that will be levelled at him. If the unconscious too can lie, then what are we to trust? his disciples will ask. He offers them a lengthy explanation of how this can come about and how in the end it contradicts nothing in the theory.

This explanation is a little tendentious, but it still remains that what Freud foregrounds here in 1920 is exactly what is essential in the unconscious, namely the subject's relation to the Other as such. This relation implies as its basis the possibility of being brought about at this level of the lie. We are in the realm of lies and truth.

Freud spots this very well. What seems to escape his notice, however, is that this is a true transference. It is in the interpretation of the desire to deceive that the path is opened, instead of taking this as something that – let's put it somewhat crudely – is directed against him.

It was enough for him to come out with one sentence more, it's also an attempt to string me along, to captivate me, to get me to think her so pretty – and the young woman must be ravishing – for him not to be completely free in this business, just as with Dora. What he wants to avoid is precisely to have to affirm that what he has coming to him is the worst, that is to say, something in which he is the one who will be disillusioned. In other words, he is quite prepared to form his own illusions. In putting himself on guard against these illusions, he has already entered the game. He is making the imaginary game a reality. He turns it into something real because he is right in it.

Moreover, this doesn't miss the target because his way of interpreting the thing is to say to the young woman that her intention is precisely to deceive him just as she habitually deceives her father. This amounts immediately to cutting off short the imaginary relation that he has made a reality. In a certain respect, his countertransference could have served him well here, so long as it is not a countertransference, that is, so long as he doesn't believe in it, so long as he doesn't fall into it. To the extent that he has fallen into it and interprets too early, he brings the girl's desire into the real, when in fact it was no more than a desire, and not an intention, to deceive him. He fleshes out this desire. He operates with her just as the therapist intervened with the little girl, giving the thing a symbolic status. Here we have what lies at the heart of this slide into the imaginary that becomes much more than a trap. It becomes a calamity once it has been established doctrinally.

Here we are seeing a borderline example that is transparent. We cannot fail to recognise it because it's in the text. With his interpretation, he makes the conflict break out. He fleshes it out, when in fact what was at issue, as he himself senses, is to point out this mendacious discourse that is there in the unconscious. He tells her that all this is being done against him, and in effect the treatment doesn't go much further. He breaks it off. In wanting to unite, he has sundered.

But something far more interesting is accentuated by Freud, without him interpreting it, something of considerable scope, namely the nature of the young woman's passion for the person in question.

Indeed, it did not escape his notice that this is not a homosexual relationship like others, although in truth homosexual relationships display all the variety of heterosexual relationships, and perhaps even a few extra variations. Freud underscores quite admirably that this object-choice corresponds to a type that is specifically männliche, and explains what he means by this. He spells out in remarkable depth how this is platonic love in its most exalted aspect.

It's a love that asks for no other satisfaction but to serve the lady. It's truly a sacred love, so to speak, or courtly love in its most devotional form. He adds a few extra words like Schwärmerei, which has a very particular meaning in Germany's cultural history.[3] It is this exaltation that lies at the base of the relationship. In short, he pitches this love relation at the highest degree of symbolised love relationship, posited as a service, as an institution, as a reference. It is not merely something that is submitted to, like an attraction or a need. It's a love that, in itself, doesn't simply make do without satisfaction, but aims very precisely for this non-satisfaction. It instates lack in the relationship with the object as the very realm in which an ideal love can blossom.

Can you not see that there is something here that joins in a kind of nexus the three tiers of what I've been trying to give you a sense of in this entire process that goes from frustration to symptom? Take, if you will, the word symptom as equivalent to enigma, since this is what we have been examining. This is how the problem of this exceptional situation will come to be articulated. However, it is of interest only when taken in a register that is its own, which is to say that it is exceptional because it is particular.

At first we have the reference, which has been lived through, though in an innocent fashion, to the imaginary object, the child. Interpretation enables us to conceive of it as a child received from the father. As we have already been told, contrary to what one might believe, female homosexuals are subjects who have formed a staunch paternal fixation.

Why does a real crisis ensue? It is because the real object arises at this moment. It is indeed a child given by the father, but precisely to someone else, and to the person who is closest to her.

It is then that a great reversal is produced. Its mechanism is explained to us. I believe that it is of the utmost importance to perceive that in this case what was at stake had already been established on the symbolic plane. It was on the symbolic plane that the subject was satisfied by this child as a child that was given to her by her father, so that the presence of this real object would lead her back for a moment to the plane of frustration. It no longer has to do with something that satisfied her in the imaginary, something that already sustained her in the relation among women, with the full institution of the paternal presence as such, the father par excellence, the fundamental father, the father who will always be, for her, any man whomsoever who will give her a child. The presence of the real child, the fact that the object really is right there, materialised for a moment by the fact that her mother is the one who has the child, right beside her, leads her back to the plane of frustration.

What is most important in what happens next? Is it the swing-over which brings her to identify with the father? It is understood that this played its part. Is it that she herself becomes this sort of latent child that will effectively niederkommen when the crisis comes to a head? Perhaps we might find out how many months it took for this to happen, if we had the dates as we do for Dora. But this is not the most important matter. What is most important is that what is desired is something that lies beyond the beloved woman.

The young woman's love for the lady aims at something else besides her. This love that lives purely and simply in the realm of devotion, and which raises the attachment to its supreme degree, the subject's annihilation in the relationship, is something that Freud seems to restrict, and not without reason, to the register of male experience. Indeed, these things can be observed in a sort of institutionalised thriving that is sustained in a highly elaborated cultural relation. When the fundamental disappointment passes reflexively onto this level, and the subject finds there her way-out, it raises the question of what, in this register of love, is loved in the lady beyond herself, and calls into question all that is truly fundamental in everything that refers back to the attainment of love.

What is desired, strictly speaking, in the beloved woman is precisely what she lacks. And what she lacks in this instance is the primordial object, the equivalent of which the subject would find in the child, the imaginary substitute.

At this extreme, in the most idealised love, what is sought in the woman is what she lacks. And what is sought beyond her is the object that is central to the entire libidinal economy – the phallus.

A CHILD IS BEING BEATEN AND THE YOUNG HOMOSEXUAL WOMAN

Intersubjectivity and desubjectivation
The image as the cast of perversion
The symbolic aspect of the gift
Frustration, love and jouissance
Permutational schema of the case

We ended our talk last time by trying to summarise the case of female homosexuality presented by Freud. At the same time as sketching out its twists and turns, I adumbrated what might be called its structure. Indeed, this case would not hold a great deal more importance than being merely colourful were we not working through it on the basis of a structural analysis.

We need to look again at this structural analysis. It is solely on the condition of pushing such analysis further, and as far as possible, that it is worthwhile committing oneself to this path in psychoanalysis.

That the psychoanalytic theory is wanting is something that, so it seems to me, is there constantly to be seen. Moreover, there is no harm in reminding you that we are pursuing our effort here in order to respond to this want.

This want is palpable across the board. I recently beheld it coming alive in my mind on reading Miss Anna Freud's remarks pitted against those of Mrs Melanie Klein.

Doubtless Miss Anna Freud has backed down a bit since then, but she grounded the principles of her child analysis on remarks such as the following – the child forms no transference, or at least, forms no transference-neurosis, because children are still within the situation that creates the neurotic tension. There could be no transference, in the strict sense, for something that was in the course of being played out.

Then, in another remark, of the same nature but different, she says that the fact that children are still relating with their original objects of attachment calls for a change in position from the analyst, who enters the situation as a new person, on the current plane. This is purported to modify the analyst's technique profoundly.

In this respect, Miss Anna Freud pays homage to something of an inkling of the importance of the essential function of speech in the analytic relation. She says that the child will assuredly be in a different relation from that of the adult to speech, and so should be approached with the aid of play, which provides the means for the technique of child analysis. The child is in a position that does not allow the analyst to offer himself from the position of neutrality or receptivity, which strives above all to gather speech, to allow it to thrive, and, when the occasion presents, to echo it. I would say, therefore, that while it is not developed in this text, nor even conceived of, the analyst's engagement on a path that is different from the speech relation is nevertheless indicated there.

Mrs Melanie Klein argues, on the contrary, that nothing could be more congruent with adult analysis than child analysis, and that already, even at a very early age, what is at issue in the child's unconscious has nothing to do with the actual parents, unlike what Miss Anna Freud says. Between the ages of two-and-a-half and three, the situation has already modified to such an extent compared with what can be observed in the real relation, that what is at stake is a whole dramatisation that is profoundly alien to the actual situation of the child's familial relationship. This modification is illustrated by the example of a child who, being raised as an only child by an elderly aunt who lived far from his parents, leaving him in an altogether isolated and dual relation with this one person, none the less reconstituted a whole family drama with a father, mother, and even rival brothers and sisters. I'm quoting. It really is, therefore, a matter of revealing in analysis something that ultimately does not lie purely and simply in an immediate relation with the real, but rather is already inscribed in a symbolisation.

Are we to accept what Mrs Melanie Klein asserts? These assertions are based on her experience, and this experience is communicated to us in observations that sometimes push things into the realm of strangeness. One cannot fail to be struck by this kind of witch's cauldron, or soothsayer's crucible, at the bottom of which a whole wide imaginary world is bubbling away, the idea of the mother's body as a container, all the primordial fantasies present from the very first, in their tendency to become structured into a drama that seems to come preformed, this entire machine requiring the constant surfacing of the most aggressive primordial instincts if it is to keep turning. We cannot fail to be struck by how she vouches for a correspondence between this entire phantasmagoria and the clinical data that she handles here, and at the same time wonder just what we have before us. What can this dramatic symbolisation mean, which is found to be increasingly more complete the further back we go? It is as though the closer we get to the point of origin, the more the Oedipus complex is complete, articulated and ready to spring into action. This warrants at least the posing of a question.

This question looms up at every turn along the precise path I've been trying to lead you along, that of perversion.

What is perversion? Within a single psychoanalytic group we have been hearing the most discordant voices raised on this issue.

Some, thinking they are following Freud, say that we simply have to come back to the notion of the persistence of a fixation that bears on a partial drive. This fixation is purported to traverse unscathed the entire progress through the dialectic that tends to be established by the Oedipus complex. It is further purported that it does not undergo the transformations that tend to reduce the other partial drives into a movement that unifies them, ultimately culminating in the genital drive, which is the ideal unifying drive. What is at issue then in perversion is a sort of accident in the development of the drives. Translating in a classical way Freud's notion that perversion is the negative of neurosis, these analysts seek to turn perversion into something where the drive has not been elaborated.

Others, however, who moreover are not for all that the most discerning or the best, but who have been informed by experience and by something that truly does impress itself upon analytic practice, would try to show that, far from being this pure element that persists, perversion forms part of something that comes about via all the dramatic crises, fusions and de-fusions of a neurosis, presenting the same dimensional richness as a neurosis, along with the same abundance, the same rhythms and stages. They would then try to explain how perversion is the negative of neurosis by pushing forward formulas like the following – perversion is the eroticisation of defences, just like all these games through which analysis is pursued as a reduction of defences.

Fine by me. This offers an image. But, in fact, why is it that this can be eroticised? This is the whole question. Where does this eroticisation come from? Where does the invisible power lie that would project this colouration that here seems to come as something extraneous, a change in quality brought upon the defence, which strictly speaking should be regarded as a libidinal satisfaction? In truth, this thing is not unthinkable, but the least that can be said is that it has not been thought through.

It mustn't be believed that Freud never dared to give us a notion to be elaborated. I would further say that we have among Freud's writings an example that proves that his formula that perversion is the negative of neurosis is certainly not to be taken to mean what it has long been taken to mean, namely that what is hidden in the unconscious when we are faced with a case of neurosis is, in perversion, out in the open and, as it were, in a state of freedom. Freud is proposing something quite different in this formula. Perhaps, after all, it has to be taken in the same way as what is given to us in all these compressed formulas to which our analysis has to restore their true meaning. It is by trying first of all to follow him and to see, for example, how he conceives of the mechanism of a phenomenon that may be qualified as perverse, or even a categorical perversion, that we shall finally be able to perceive what he means when he asserts that perversion is the negative of neurosis.

Let's look at things a little more closely by taking up the study that was to gain a certain fame, Ein Kind wird geschlagen, subtitled, A Contribution to the Study of the Origin of Sexual Perversions.

It is characteristic of Freud that his attention should here be focused on a single sentence – which he turns into the title of his text – that is not a mere label but instead a phrase extracted directly from what patients declare when they broach the theme of their fantasies. These fantasies may roughly be called sadomasochistic, irrespective of the role and function they hold in any particular case.

Freud tells us that he is focusing his study on six cases, which are more or less obsessional neuroses, four women and two men. Behind this lies his experience of all the cases of which he does not have such a great understanding himself. So it seems that this is a sort of summary, an attempt to organise a considerable mass of experience.

When the subject declares to be bringing into the arena of the treatment something that is his fantasy, he expresses it in a form that is remarkable for its imprecision, for the questions that it leaves hanging and to which he replies only with great difficulty. In truth, at the start the subject is unable to give a satisfactory answer, for he can scarcely say a word more about the characteristics of this fantasy. Furthermore, he only does so with a sort of aversion, even abashment or shame.

There is something quite remarkable here, which is that whereas the masturbatory practices that are associated to a greater or lesser degree with these fantasies do not entail any sense of guilt, when it comes to wording these fantasies, not only does the subject very often show great difficulty, but furthermore it provokes in him a fairly considerable abhorrence, repugnance and culpability. The discrepancy between the fantasmatic or imaginary use of these fantasies and their spoken articulation is something that ought to make us prick up our ears. The subject's deportment here is already a signal that marks out a limit – it is not the same register mentally to play with the fantasy or to speak about it.

What does the fantasy A child is being beaten signify in these subjects? Freud is going to tell us what his experience has shown him. We won't get to the end of the article today. I simply want to throw some light on certain elements that directly concern the path to which I committed us last week when tackling the problem via The Psychogenesis of a Case of Homosexuality in a Woman.

According to Freud, the progress of analysis shows that what is at issue in this fantasy is something that has been substituted through a series of transformations brought to bear on other fantasies, which themselves had a fully comprehensible role at precise moments in the subject's development. It is the structure of these states that I would like to set out for you, so as to enable you to recognise in them something that seems to be altogether evident, so long as we keep our eyes open, at least with regard to the dimension into which we are trying to advance and which is summed up under the heading subjective structure. In other words, in order to restore its true position to what often presents in our theory as an ambiguity, even as an impasse and an antinomy, we shall be seeking each time to locate on which level of subjective structure a given phenomenon occurs.

Freud tells us that the subject's history – to the extent that it opens up under analytic pressure and allows the origin of these fantasies to be found again – is punctuated in three stages.

In the first part of his exposé, which we shall not be bringing to the fore right now, he informs us that he will be confining himself to the women, for reasons that he makes clear afterwards but which we shall leave aside for today.

The form taken by the first fantasy, which he tells us can be found when the facts are analysed, is the following – My father is beating the child whom I hate.

This fantasy is loosely tied to the appearance of a brother or a sister in the subject's history, a rival who happens to frustrate the child – through his presence and the care that is lavished on him – of her parents' affection. Here it is especially the father who is at issue. Without insisting on this point, we should not omit the fact that this concerns a young girl who is caught at a moment when the Oedipus complex has already been constituted and when the relationship with the father has been instated. The pre-eminence of the father's person in this altogether primal fantasy cannot be unrelated to the fact that this concerns a girl. But let's leave the explanation of this issue for a later date.

What is important is that here at the outset we are touching on an historical perspective that is retroactive. It is from a current point in the analysis that the subject formulates and organises a primal dramatic situation, and she does so in a way that is nevertheless inscribed in her current speech and her power of symbolisation at the present time. Thus, we find again, through the progress of the analysis, what presents as the primal thing, the deepest primordial organisation.

This entails the evident complexity of accommodating three characters – there is the agent of the punishment, there is the one who undergoes it, and there is the subject. The one who is undergoing the punishment is someone other than the subject, namely a child whom the subject hates and whom she thereby sees being stripped of the parental preference at stake. She thus feels privileged by the fact that the other is being stripped of this preference.

A tripartite dimension and tension is here implied. There is the subject's relation to the two others, whose interrelations are themselves dictated by an element that is focused by the subject. To accentuate things in one direction, it could be said that My father is beating my brother or my sister for fear I might not believe that I am the favoured one. A causality, or a tension, a reference to the subject who is captured as a third party in whose favour all of this is being produced, is something that animates and dictates the action directed onto the ancillary personage, the one who is undergoing the beating. The third party, who is the subject, is presentified in the situation as an onlooker under whose eye this must come to pass with the intention of making it known to her that something is being given to her, namely the privilege of preference, of precedence.

So, there is a notion of fear, that is to say, a sort of anticipation, a temporal dimension, a pre-tension that is introduced into the heart of this tripartite situation as its motor. And then there is the reference to the third party qua subject, insomuch as the subject is to believe or infer something from a certain deportment that is brought to bear on the ancillary object. In this instance, this object is taken as the instrument of the communication between the two subjects, which is ultimately a communicating of love, because what is declared for the central subject, this something that she receives, comes at the expense of the ancillary object. This something is the expression of her wish, or her desire, to be favoured and to be loved. Of course, the formation has itself been dramatised. It is already reactional in so far as it is the product of a complex situation, but the situation presupposes the tripartite intersubjective reference with all that it necessitates and introduces as a temporal punctuation. It presupposes the introduction of the ancillary subject, who is necessary.

Why so? This ancillary subject is the instrument, the mainspring, the medium, the means, by which the crossover from one subject to the other is made. All things considered we find ourselves before a full intersubjective structure in the sense that it is established in the culminated crossing-over of speech. The point is not that something should have been spoken, but rather that the intersubjective structure itself, in this ternary situation which is established in the primal fantasy, should carry the mark of the very same intersubjective structure that constitutes any culminated speech.

Let's shift now to the second stage.

In relation to the first, this second represents a scaled-down situation. Freud tells us that here is to be found, in a very particular way, a situation reduced to two characters. I'm following Freud's text, explaining it as best it can be. He describes this situation, without weighing it up, as a necessary and reconstructed step that is indispensable when it comes to understanding the full motivation behind what is produced in the subject's history. The second stage produces the fantasy – I am being beaten by my father.

This situation, scaled-down to two, excludes any other dimension but that of the relation to the agent who is doing the beating. There is something here that can give rise to all sorts of interpretations, but such interpretations will themselves remain marked with the greatest ambiguity. While the first fantasy harbours an organisation and a structure that sets out a direction that could be indicated by a series of arrows, in the second the situation is so ambiguous that for a brief moment one may wonder as to how far the subject might be participating with the one who is assaulting her and striking her. This is the classic sado-masochistic ambiguity.[1] To resolve it, one will conclude with Freud that this is linked to something that is the essence of masochism, but that in this instance the ego is firmly accentuated in the situation.

The subject finds herself in a reciprocal position, but which is also exclusive. It's either him or her who is being beaten. And here, it's her. The fact that it is her indicates something, without resolving it. In the very act of being beaten, one can see – and the ensuing part of Freud's discussion shows this – a transposition or a displacement of an element that perhaps is already marked by eroticism.

The very fact that one can speak on this occasion of the essence of masochism is altogether indicative. At the previous stage we were in a situation that, as exceedingly structured as it was, was in some sense laden with virtuality. As Freud says, it is Not clearly sexual, not in itself sadistic, but yet the stuff from which both will later come. The precipitation in one direction or in the other is marked out at the second stage, though it will remain ambiguous.

The second stage is a dual one, with the whole problematic that it raises on the libidinal plane. The subject finds herself included in a dual relation which is thus ambiguous. We meet the either . . . or . . . that is fundamental in this dual relationship. Freud tells us that we are almost always forced to reconstruct it, so fleeting is its existence. This fleetingness is such an essential characteristic that very quickly the situation is precipitated into the third stage.

In the third stage, the subject is reduced to her most extreme point. Here the subject is apparently to be found again in a third-party position in the shape of a pure and simple onlooker, as at the first stage. After the scaling-down of the first intersubjective situation, with its temporal tension, and the passage to the second situation, which was dual and reciprocal, we come to the desubjectivised situation which is that of the final fantasy, namely – A child is being beaten.

Of course, behind this passive voice one can vaguely make out the paternal function, but generally speaking the father is not recognisable. It's a mere substitute. On the other hand, Freud did want to respect the subject's wording but often it's not a matter of just one child but of several. The fantasmatic production causes it to burst apart, multiplying into umpteen specimens, and this shows very well the character of essential desubjectivation that is produced in the primordial relationship.

Indeed, there remains an objectivation, in any case a desubjectivation, that is radical and that affects the entire structure at this level where the subject is no longer there except as reduced to the state of an onlooker, or merely an eye, that is to say, the very thing that always characterises any kind of object at the limit, at the point of final reduction. To behold it, there has to be at least, not always a subject, but an eye, a screen upon which the subject is established.

How can we translate this into our language, at the precise point we've reached in our process? In referring to our diagram, the imaginary relationship, which is more or less fantasised, is inscribed between the two vertices a–a' in a relation that is marked to a greater or lesser degree by specularity and reciprocity between the ego and the other party. But here we find ourselves in the presence of something that takes place on the line S–A, namely unconscious speech, which had to be uncovered again through the artifices of the analysis of the transference. This unconscious speech runs as follows – My father, in beating the child whom I hate, is showing me he loves me. Or – My father is beating a child for fear I might believe I'm not the favourite. Or some quite different wording that in whichever way highlights one of the accents of this dramatic relationship. What is excluded, what is not present in the neurosis, yet which will undergo different developments that will become manifest elsewhere, in all the constitutive symptoms of the neurosis, is uncovered in this element of the clinical picture that is the fantasy.

How does this fantasy present? It bears within it, in a still highly visible manner, the testimony of the signifier-elements of speech that is articulated at the level of this trans-object, so to speak, which is the big Other. The big Other is the locus at which unconscious speech is articulated, the Es insomuch as it is speech, history, memory and articulated structure.

Perversion, or rather, to limit ourselves here, the perverse fantasy, possesses a property that we can now bring out.[2]

What is this kind of residue, this symbolic reduction that has progressively eliminated the entire subjective structure from the situation, to allow to emerge from it nothing more than something that is entirely de-subjectivised? Ultimately it is enigmatic because it conserves the full charge – but this is a charge that is neither revealed, nor constituted, nor taken on board by the subject – of what, at the level of the Other, is the articulated structure in which the subject is engaged. At the level of the perverse fantasy, all the elements are there, but everything to do with signification has been lost, namely the intersubjective relationship. These are what we might call signifiers in their pure state, without the intersubjective relationship, signifiers shorn of their subject. We have here a sort of objectivation of the signifiers of the situation as such. What is indicated here in the sense of a fundamental structuring relationship in the subject's history at the level of perversion is both preserved and contained, but in the form of a pure sign.

Is this different from everything that we meet at the level of perversion? Picture for a moment what you know about the fetish, for instance. You are told that it is explicable by what lies beyond but which is never seen, and for good reason, namely the penis of the phallic mother. More often than not, after a short effort of analysis, this proves to be linked by the subject, at the very least in those memories that are still accessible to him, to a precise situation when he came to a standstill in his observation – this at least is his memory of it – at the hem of his mother's dress. Here we find ourselves before a remarkable convergence with the structure that can be called the screen-memory, that is to say, the moment at which the chain of memory is arrested. Indeed, it is arrested at the hem of the dress, no higher than the ankle, and this is why the shoe is met here. This is also why the shoe can, at least in certain particular but exemplary cases, assume its function as a substitute for what has not been seen but which is articulated and formulated as being, here for this subject, what the mother possesses, namely the phallus. Doubtless it is an imaginary phallus, but it is essential to her symbolic foundation as a phallic mother.

Here in the beating fantasy we also find ourselves faced with something that belongs to the same realm, something that freezes the flow of memory, that reduces it to the instantaneous, by arresting it at this point that is called a screen-memory. Think of how cinematographic motion can be speeding along altogether rapidly and then all of a sudden stop at some point, capturing the characters in a freeze-frame. This freeze-frame is characteristic of the reduction of the full signifying scene, articulated from subject to subject, to something that is immobilised in this fantasy, which remains charged with all the erotic values that are included in what it has expressed, and of which it is the testimony and the support, the last support that remains.

Here we can put a finger on how there comes to be moulded what might be called the cast of perversion, namely the valorisation of the image. The image is at stake here to the extent that it remains the privileged witness of something that, in the unconscious, must be articulated and brought back into play in the dialectic of the transference, that is, in this something that must assume its full dimensions once more within the analytic dialogue.

The value of an imaginary dimension appears, therefore, to be supervalent whenever a perversion is at issue. This imaginary relationship stands on the path of what occurs between subject and Other, or more accurately, of what of the subject remains located in the Other, precisely insomuch as it is repressed. This is speech that is indeed the subject's own but, since by its very nature as speech it is a message that the subject must receive from the Other in an inverted form, it can equally remain in the Other and there constitute the repressed and the unconscious, establishing a relationship that is possible but which does not become a reality.

Possible does not say it all. There has to be some impossibility in this, without which it would not be repressed. It is precisely because this impossibility is present in ordinary situations that it requires all the artifices of the transference to make that which has to be communicated from the big Other to the subject both newly passable and formulable, in so far as the subject's I comes into being.

Freud's analysis affords us this indication in the sharpest fashion, and everything is spelt out at far greater length than what I've been saying here. He marks out how we must tackle the problem of the constitution of any perversion through the transformations of the Oedipus complex, through its advance and its revolution.

It is astounding that people should have dreamed of maintaining the indication that perversion is the negative of neurosis simply by translating it, as is commonly being done, to mean that perversion is a drive that has not been elaborated by the Oedipal and neurotic mechanism. It is purported to be a pure and simple relic, the persistence of an irreducible partial drive. On the contrary, in this vital article, and in many further points, Freud indicates well enough that perverse structuration, however primal we might suppose it to be – in any case, among those that come to our knowledge as analysts – can be articulated only as a means, a linchpin, an element of something that ultimately can be conceived of, can be understood, and can be articulated solely in, by and through the process, the organisation and the articulation of the Oedipus complex.

Let's try now to inscribe the case from the other day, the case of the young homosexual woman, onto our diagram of the subject's criss-cross relationship with the Other.

On the axis that runs S–A, insomuch as it is here that symbolic signification must come about and be established, lies the entire genesis of the subject in the present. On the other hand, the imaginary interposition a–a' is where the subject finds her status, her object structure, which she recognises as such, installed in a certain liaison in relation to these objects, which for her are immediately attractive and correspond to her desire, in so far as she commits to imaginary guiderails that form what are called libidinal fixations.

While we cannot push this exercise to its end today, we can try to sum things up. What can we see? Five temporal phases can be laid out to describe the major phenomena through which this perversion is instated. Whether we regard this perversion as fundamental or acquired matters little. In this instance, we know when it was first indicated, when it was established, when it was precipitated, we have its motives and we have its point of departure. It is a perversion that was constituted belatedly, which doesn't mean that it did not have its premises in quite primordial phenomena. But let's try to understand what we can see on the level at which Freud himself cleared the avenues.

There is a state that is essential, when the young woman has reached puberty, around her thirteenth or fourteenth year. She treasures an object, a child whom she looks after and to whom she is bound by ties of affection. She shows herself in everyone's eyes to be steering particularly well in this direction, precisely on the kinds of paths that anyone might hope for, as the vocation typical to woman, that of maternity.

On this basis, something occurs that will produce in her a kind of reversal that sets in when she starts to take an interest in love objects who will be marked first of all with the sign of femininity. These are women who are in a more or less motherly, neo-maternalising, circumstance.

She will ultimately be led to the passion, which is literally qualified as a consuming passion, for the person who in the text is called the lady, and there is a good reason for this. The young woman treats this lady in a highly elaborate style of relation that is chivalrous and specifically masculine. Her passion for the lady is served, in a sense, without any requirement, without desire, without even hope of return, with this character of a gift, the lover projecting even beyond any kind of show from the beloved. In short, we find here one of the most highly cultivated forms of love relation.

How are we to conceive of this transformation? I've given you its first temporal phase and its result. Between the two, something occurred. Freud tells us what. We are now going to implicate this transformation in the same terms that served to analyse the position.

Let's begin with the phallic phase of the genital organisation. What is the meaning of what Freud tells us in this regard? Just before the latency period, the infantile subject, male or female, reaches the phallic phase, which indicates the point of realisation of the genital type. Everything is there, up to and including object-choice. However, there is one thing that is not there, namely a full realisation of the genital function insomuch as it would be structured and organised as a reality. Indeed, there remains this essentially imaginary and fantasmatic element which is the supervalence of the phallus, in view of which there are for the subject two types of being in the world – those who have the phallus and those who have not, that is to say, who have been castrated.

This is how Freud formulates it and it's quite clear that there is something here that truly suggests a problematic from which, in truth, the various authors do not manage to extricate themselves when they seek to justify it in any way by motives that are determined for the subject in the real. I've already told you that I would bracket off the extraordinary modes of explanation that this forces upon these authors. Their general pattern of explanation amounts pretty much to the following – as everyone knows, since everything is already figured out and inscribed in the unconscious drive tendencies, the subject must already possess, by his very nature, the preformation that makes one sex correspond to the other in cooperation. So, this can only be a kind of formation in which the subject already finds some advantage, and there must already be a process of defence here. Actually, this is not inconceivable from one perspective, but it simply pushes the problem further back. This in turn commits the authors to a series of constructions that merely place the entire symbolic dialectic back at the origin, and which become increasingly unthinkable as one shifts further back towards it.

It is easier for us than for these authors to accept that in this instance the phallus happens to be the imaginary element – this is a fact, which has to be taken as a fact – whereby the subject at the genital level is introduced into the symbolic aspect of the gift.

The symbolic aspect of the gift and genital maturation, which are two different things, are nevertheless linked by a factor that is included in the real human situation, namely the rules that are established by law in the exercise of genital functions, to the extent that they effectively come into play in inter-human exchange. It is because things happen on this level that the bond is so tight between the symbolic aspect of the gift and genital maturation. But this is something that has no internal, biological or individual coherence for the subject. On the other hand it emerges that the fantasy of the phallus, within this symbolic aspect of the gift at the genital level, does assume its value, and Freud insists on this. The phallus does not have the same value for he who really possesses it, that is, the male child, as for the child who does not possess it, that is, the female child.

For the female child, she will be introduced to the symbolic aspect of the gift precisely in so far as she does not possess the phallus. It is in so far as she phallicises the situation – that is to say, in so far as it's a matter of either having or not having the phallus – that she enters the Oedipus complex.[3] Meanwhile, what Freud underscores is that this is not how the boy enters the Oedipus complex. Instead, this is his way out. At the end of the Oedipus complex he will have to make the symbolic aspect of the gift a reality on a certain plane. He will effectively have to make a gift of what he has, whereas the girl has entered the Oedipus complex in so far as she is to find, in the complex, what she does not have.

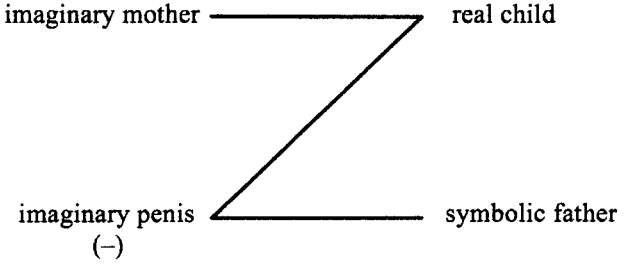
What is meant by what she does not have? Here, we are already on the plane where an imaginary element enters a symbolic dialectic. In a symbolic dialectic, what one does not have is merely something that is just as inexistent as the rest, but it bears the mark of the minus sign. So, she enters with this minus. To enter here with a minus or with a plus does not change the fact that what is in play here is the phallus. There has to be something so that one can assign oneself with a plus or a minus, a presence or an absence. Freud tells us that this is the mainspring of the girl's entry into the Oedipus complex.

Within this symbolic aspect of the gift, all sorts of things can be given in exchange. Indeed, it is because so many things can be given in exchange that ultimately we find so many equivalents of the phallus in what effectively occurs in symptoms.

Freud goes still further, and you can find it worded in a rough-and-ready fashion in A Child is Being Beaten. Why do so many elements from pregenital relations come into play in the Oedipal dialectic? Why do frustrations from the anal level or the oral level tend to arise, and to bring about the frustrations, accidents and dramatic elements of the Oedipal relation, when going by the premises this should only come about in the genital elaboration? Freud's reply is that this is related to something obscure that occurs at the level of the ego – because of course the child has no experience of this – in that the objects that form part of the pregenital relations can be more easily apprehended in verbal representations, in Wortvorstellungen.

Freud goes so far as to say that pregenital objects are brought into play in the Oedipal dialectic to the extent that they lend themselves more readily to verbal representations. The child can tell himself more easily that what the father gives to the mother on occasion is his urine, because urine is something that the child is very acquainted with in use, in its function and existence as an object. It is easier to symbolise an object – that is, to endow it with a plus sign or a minus sign – that has taken on a certain reality in the child's imagination, than this something that in spite of everything remains exceedingly hard to grasp, and which for the girl is difficult to access.

Freud tells us that the girl's first introduction into the dialectic of the Oedipus complex hinges on the fact that the penis she desires will be received from the father in the form of a substitute, namely a child. But in the example we are looking at, that of the young homosexual woman, a real child is involved. She has been doting over a real flesh-and-blood child who is part of the interplay.



On the other hand, what does this child whom she dotes over satisfy in her? Well, the child is the imaginary phallic substitution through which, as a subject, she constitutes herself, without knowing it, as an imaginary mother. She derives satisfaction from looking after this child because it amounts to an acquisition of the imaginary penis, which was the object of the fundamental frustration that resulted from her having placed this imaginary penis at the level of the minus. I'm doing no more than highlighting what is characteristic of originary frustration, namely that any object that is introduced by a frustration that has become a reality can only be an object that the subject takes up in this ambiguous position of the body's appurtenances.

I'm underscoring this for you because when people speak about primordial relationships between mother and child, they put all the emphasis on the notion of frustration taken passively. We are told that the child makes the first test of the relation between the pleasure principle and the reality principle in the frustrations he feels from his mother, and after that you can see the terms frustration of the object or loss of the love object being used indiscriminately. Now, if there is one thing on which I insisted in the previous lessons then it's precisely the bipolarity or the highly marked opposition that there is between the real object, in so far as the child can be deprived of it, namely the mother's breast, and the mother, in so far as she is in a position to grant or not to grant this real object.

This distinction between the breast and the mother as a complete object is made by Mrs Melanie Klein. She distinguishes between, on the one hand, the partial objects, and on the other, the mother who is established as a whole object. This is the mother that can create the famous depressive position in the child. Indeed, this is one way of seeing things. But what is passed over in the stance Klein takes is that these objects are not of the same nature, because irrespective of whether they are set apart or not, it is still the case that the mother is established as an agent by the function of the appeal. It is still the case that already, in her most rudimentary form, she is taken as an object that is marked and connoted by a possibility of plus or minus, as presence or absence. It is also the case that the frustration brought about by anything that refers to the mother as such is a frustration of love, and that everything that comes from the mother by way of response to this appeal is a gift, that is to say, something other than the object. In other words, there is a radical difference between, on the one hand, the gift as a sign of love, which aims radically at something else that lies beyond, namely the mother's love, and on the other hand, whichever object that might arise for the satisfaction of the child's needs.

The frustration of love and the frustration of jouissance are two distinct things. The frustration of love is pervaded by all the intersubjective relationships that can be constituted thereafter. Meanwhile, the frustration of jouissance is on no account pervaded by just anything, contrary to what people say.

As Mr Winnicott has understood very sharply, through the usual confusion to be read in the analytic literature, it is not the frustration of jouissance that generates reality. We cannot ground the faintest genesis of reality on the fact of whether the child has or doesn't have the breast. If he doesn't have the breast, he is hungry and he carries on crying. In other words, what is it that is produced by the frustration of jouissance? It produces at the very most the rekindling of desire, but it produces no kind of object constitution whatsoever. This is ultimately what leads Mr Winnicott to remark on what is truly there for the grasping in the child's behaviour, and which allows us to shed light on how there is indeed a progression that calls for an original explication.

It's not simply because the child is deprived of his mother's breast that he conjures up his fundamental image of it, nor is it just any kind of image. It is necessary that the image should in itself be taken as an original dimension. It's not the breast but the tip of the breast, the nipple, that is absolutely essential. It is this nipple that will be replaced by the phallus, which will be superposed onto it. When this happens, the nipple and the phallus show that what they have in common is this character of bringing us to a standstill, in so far as they are constituted as images.

What follows on from the child's frustration of jouissance is an original dimension that persists in the subject in the state of an imaginary relationship. This is not simply something that polarises the kindling of desire in the way that, in animals, there is always a certain lure that orients. The animal's behaviour always carries something of significance, in the feathers or in the fins of its adversary, which turns it into an adversary. One can always ascertain whatever it is that individualises the image in the biological realm. This is certainly present in mankind, but it is accentuated, and in such fashion as to be observable in children's behaviour where these images are referenced to the fundamental image that gives the subject his comprehensive status. We find this complete shape, this form of the other party as such, which he clings to and which means that he too has this image, around which subjects may band together or disband, as appurtenances or non-appurtenances.

All in all, the problem does not concern the more or less large degree to which narcissism is elaborated – a narcissism which to begin with is conceived of as a kind of imagined and ideal auto-eroticism. On the contrary, it's a matter of finding out what the function of original narcissism is in the constitution of an objectal world as such. This is why Winnicott pauses over these objects that he calls transitional objects.

Without them, we would have no account of the way in which the child is able at the start to constitute a world from his frustrations, because of course he does constitute a world, but don't go telling us that this has to do with the object of his desires that is the cause of his frustration at the beginning. He constitutes a world to the extent that in heading towards something that he desires, he will come up against something that he bumps into, or which burns him. This is not an object that is generated in any way whatsoever by the object of desire. It's not something that can be modelled by the stages of the development of desire as would be established and organised in child development. It's something else. In so far as it is generated by frustration itself, the object leads us to admit the autonomy of this imaginary figment in its relationship with the body image. This is an ambiguous object, which lies betwixt and between. One can speak neither of reality nor of unreality in its regard. This is how Mr Winnicott puts it, with great pertinence. Instead of presenting this with all the problems that it raises with respect to the introduction of this object into the symbolic order, he comes to it despite himself, because one is obliged to go there once one has committed oneself to this path.

These half-real, half-unreal objects – the transitional objects that he designates – are objects to which the child clasps, like the corner of his blanket or a piece of his bib. This cannot be observed in all children but is there in most of them. Mr Winnicott spots very clearly the relationship these objects must have at their terminal point with the fetish. He is wrong to call them primal fetishes but they are indeed its point of origin.

He pauses and tells himself that, after all, this object that is neither real nor unreal is something to which we grant neither a full reality nor a fully illusory character. The same goes for your philosophical ideas and your religious system, in the midst of which a good English citizen lives and knows in advance how he ought to behave. No one dreams of telling you that you believe in thus-and-such a religious or philosophical doctrine, nor does anyone dream of trying to pull you out of it. This is the realm of betwixt and between. Indeed, Mr Winnicott is not wrong. Life is situated in the midst of all this. How could the rest be organised were it not for this?

Mr Winnicott also remarks that one ought not to be too exacting. The intermediate state in which these things are established is firmly marked by the one thing that no one dreams of – unless one is forced to impose it on others as an object to which they must adhere, the authenticity or the unwavering reality of what you promote as a religious idea or a philosophical illusion – in short, the well instituted world indicates that everyone has the right to be mad on the condition that one remain mad separately. Madness begins when one imposes one's private madness on the entirety of subjects who are each constituted in a sort of nomadism of the transitional object.

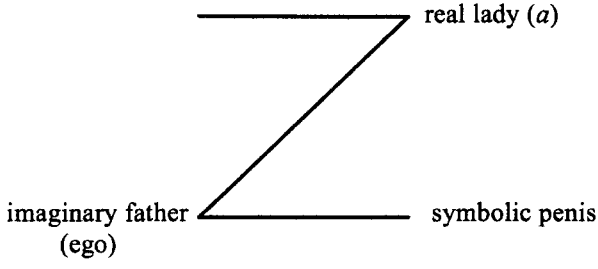
To end, let's come back to the case of the young woman in love, who has her transitional object, this imaginary penis, due to the fact of having her child. This is no different from what we are told when it is asserted that, all in all, she has her imaginary penis from the moment she starts doting on the child. What does it take for her to pass to the third phase, that is, the second stage of the five situations that we shan't manage to see today?

She is homosexual, and Freud tells us that she loves as does a man, männlichen Typus, even though the [French] translator has rendered this as féminin. She is in a virile position. This can be translated onto our diagram. The father, who at the previous stage was at the level of the big Other, has now passed to the level of the ego, to the extent that the girl has taken the male position. At a', there is the lady, the love-object who has replaced the child. Then, at the level of the Other there is the symbolic penis, that is to say, what stands at its most elaborated point in this love, which stands beyond the beloved subject. What is loved in love is what lies beyond the subject. It is literally what the beloved subject does not have. The lady is loved precisely in so far as she does not have the symbolic penis, though she has all it takes to get it because she is the chosen object of the subject's every adoration.



So, a permutation has been produced whereby the symbolic father has passed over into the imaginary through the subject's identification with the function of the father. By the same stroke, the lady has now appeared up here, on the right, as the love object, precisely by harbouring what lies beyond, the symbolic penis that at the outset was on the imaginary level.

What has happened between these two phases?

The distinguishing feature of the observation, which appears in the second phase and which can be found again in the fourth, is that at the level of the imaginary relationship the real action of the father has been introduced, this symbolic father who was previously down here in the unconscious.

The child that the father will give the girl as a substitute for the desire for a penis is a child that is either imaginary or real. In the present case, it's rather troubling that the child is real, but so it was. The father nevertheless remains unconscious as a progenitor, and all the more so given that the child is real. Yet here we have the father really giving a child not to the daughter but to the mother. So, the real child unconsciously desired by the daughter, and which she gave to herself in the substitute from which she derived her satisfaction, already shows without a shadow of doubt an accentuation of need, which lends the situation its dramatic aspect. The subject has been frustrated in a very particular way by the fact that the real child from the father qua symbolic father has been given to her own mother.

This is what amounts to the distinguishing feature of the observation. When people say that in a case such as this, things have taken the turn of a perversion, owing surely to some accentuation of the instincts or the drive tendencies, or of some primal drive, are they managing to sift out these three elements, which are absolutely essential so long as one distinguishes between them – the imaginary, the symbolic and the real?

You can see that the situation has revealed itself to be a relationship of jealousy, for eminently structural reasons, and that the imaginary satisfaction to which the girl entrusted herself has assumed an untenable character because the real has been introduced, a real that has responded to the unconscious situation on the level of the imaginary plane. Through a sort of interposition, the father has now become a reality on the plane of the imaginary relationship. He has effectively come into play as an imaginary father, and no longer as a symbolic father. Another imaginary relationship has now been established, which the girl will fill out as best she can.

This relationship is marked, however, by the fact that what was articulated in a latent fashion at the level of the big Other is starting to link up in an imaginary fashion, in the fashion of a perversion and, moreover, it is for this reason, and no other, that this will culminate in a perversion. The girl identifies with her father. She takes on his role and herself becomes the imaginary father. She also keeps his penis, and attaches herself to an object to whom necessarily she must give this something that the object doesn't have.

This necessity of centring her love not on the object but on what the object doesn't have, brings us to the heart of the love relationship as such and to the heart of the gift. And it is this something that the object doesn't have that makes the tripartite constellation of the subject's history a necessity.

This is where we shall pick things up next time. It will allow us to delve deeper into the dialectic of the gift as it is beheld and experienced altogether primordially by the subject, and also to see its other face, the one that earlier we left to one side. I accentuated the paradoxes of frustration on the side of the object, but I didn't say what is produced, and what is signified as such, by the frustration of love.

DORA AND THE YOUNG HOMOSEXUAL WOMAN

The symbolic insistence of transference
Potent father, impotent father
Love, lack and gift
Dora between question and identification
Perverse metonymy, neurotic metaphor

This latest instalment, the second issue of the journal La Psychanalyse, contains some texts that will allow you to see a new foray into logic, to see it right where it is, in a particularly vivid fashion, that is to say, in our practice. I'm alluding to our much-touted game of odds-and-evens, and I'm referring you to the Introduction I have given to my lesson on The Purloined Letter.

You can very easily find there the three temporal phases of subjectivity, in so far as subjectivity bears a relation to frustration, and on the condition that frustration is taken in the sense of a lack of object. You can find them easily if you reflect on what the baseline of the problem is, namely the opposition brought about by the institution of the pure symbol – plus or minus, presence or absence – in which there is nothing less than a sort of objectifiable positioning of what is given in the game.

You will easily see there the second temporal moment in the fact that the declaration you make in saying odd or even is a sort of bid whereby you put yourself in the position of being gratified or not by the response from the other party. However, since he already has the cubes in his hands, he is quite incapable of doing so. Whether or not what he has in hands corresponds to your bid is no longer something that depends on him. So, here you have the second stage in the dual relation in so far as it sets out this appeal and its response, upon which the level of frustration is established. At the same time you will see its utterly evanescent character, which is literally impossible to accommodate.

If the game possesses something that is of interest to you then clearly it's because you introduce the third dimension, which gives it its meaning, the dimension of law, in a form that is always latent in the playing of the game. From the standpoint of the bidder, what is at stake? From one moment to the next, the other party is clearly supposed to be hinting at some regularity, in other words a law, which at the same time he endeavours to shield from him. This dimension of a law, of a regularity that is being established, is conceived of as something possible yet is being shielded from the bidder by the one who is hinting at it in the hidden part of the game, even as he hints fleetingly at its emergence. It is at this moment that what is fundamental to the game is established, thereby lending it its intersubjective sense, locating it in a dimension that is no longer dual but ternary, and essentially so.

The value of my introductory text hinges on this, namely on the fact that for there to be the beginning of an articulation of something that resembles a law, it is necessary to introduce three terms. We are going to try to see how the object is introduced into these three intersubjective phases. By the mere fact that it falls within our scope, our purview in analytic practice, this object is an object that has to enter the symbolic chain.

This is the point we reached last time in the unfolding of our case of female homosexuality.

We reached what I called the third phase, which I am going to summarise for you by starting from the first situation that we are taking arbitrarily as the point of departure.

Note that this chronological ordering of terms is already a concession to the progressive point of view, which runs from the past to the future. We are doing this to facilitate matters by shifting closer to what is usually done in the dialectic of frustration, while not forgetting that in conceiving of it in a perfunctory fashion, that is to say, without distinguishing between the planes of the real, the imaginary and the symbolic, one ends up in impasses. The further we go, the more I hope to give you a sense of these impasses.

For the time being, however, we shall try to set out the principles behind these relationships between the object and the constitution of the symbolic chain.

First we have the young woman's position when she is still in her pubescent phase. The initial symbolic and imaginary structuration of her position happens in the typical way, as is ordained by the theory. The equation between imaginary penis and child sets the subject up as an imaginary mother in relation to what lies beyond, namely her own father who steps in at this moment as a symbolic function, that is, as the one who can give the phallus. The potency of the father is at this moment unconscious. This is after the dissolution of the Oedipus complex, and so the father qua he who can give the child is unconscious.

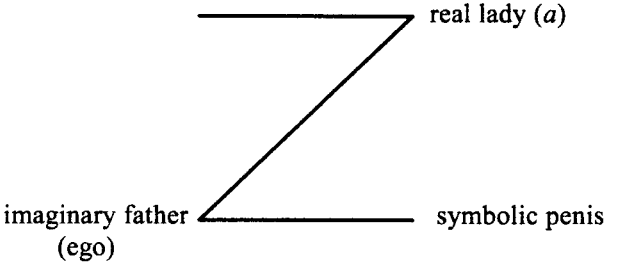
It is at this stage that occurs what might be called the fatal moment, when the father intervenes in the real, giving a child to her mother, that is to say, turning the child that was formerly in an imaginary relationship with the subject into a real child. Something becomes a reality, and as a result she can no longer sustain it in the imaginary position where she had set it up. We now find ourselves in the second phase, where the intervention of the real father at the level of the child, which is now the object of her frustration, produces the transformation of the whole equation.

Henceforth, this will be posited with the following terms – the imaginary father, the lady, and the symbolic penis. Through a sort of inversion, the subject's relationship with her father, which was previously in the symbolic realm, veers in the direction of the imaginary relationship. Or, if you prefer, there is a projection of the unconscious formula, that of her first equilibrium, into a perverse relationship, an imaginary relationship, which is her relation to the lady. This is the third phase.



So, after a first application of our formulae we can briefly pause over this positioning of the terms in play, which is undoubtedly enigmatic. None the less, it does need to be stressed that these terms, whichever they may be, impose a structure. That is to say, were we to change the position of any one of them, we would have to place each of the others elsewhere, and not just anywhere. Let's try now to see what this means. The signification is yielded by the analysis.

What does Freud tell us at the crucial moment of the observation? Due to a certain conception he has formed of the position at issue, and due also to an intervention he makes on this basis, he crystallises the position between himself and the patient in a way that is unsatisfactory, since he avouches that this was the moment at which the analytic relationship was broken off. Either way, whatever Freud thought about it, he is a long way from laying the full burden of this on an impasse in the patient's position. His intervention, his conception, his prejudices about her position, must count for something in the fact that the situation is broken off.

Let's remind ourselves what this position is and how Freud formulates it for us. He tells us that the patient's resistances were insurmountable. How does he substantiate these resistances? What examples does he provide and what meaning does he give them? He reads these resistances being expressed in particular in a series of dreams that might paradoxically have given rise to hopes that the situation was normalising. These are effectively dreams where what is at issue is nothing else but union, conjugo, and a fruitful marriage. In these dreams she is submissive to an ideal husband and bears his children. In short, this series of dreams indicates a desire that is steering in the direction of what is most wished for – if not by Freud then by society as here represented by her family – as the best outcome for the treatment.

Armed with everything the patient has told him about her position and her intentions, far from taking the dream-text at face value, Freud sees in it no more than what he calls the patient's ruse, expressly designed to disappoint him, or more precisely to deceive him and disillusion him at the same time, in the same manner as the intersubjective guessing-game I mentioned just a moment ago. It is remarkable that this presupposes, as Freud says it does, that one may object – What! The unconscious too can lie! Freud dwells at length on this point. He discusses it and makes sure to reply in a carefully worded manner.

He takes up a passage from The Interpretation of Dreams, which he had also revisited in another observation, the Dora case study, which we shall be coming to presently. At a congress five years ago, after Lagache's report on transference I gave a short paper summarising the positions in which I think the Dora case ought to be appreciated.

Regarding the relations between unconscious desire and preconscious desire, the Traumdeutung makes an analogy between the capitalist and the entrepreneur. Preconscious desire is the entrepreneur of the dream, but the dream would have no sufficient outlay to set itself up as the representative of this something that is called the unconscious were it not for another desire that provides the funds for the dream, and this is unconscious desire. Freud distinguishes very sharply between the two, though he doesn't go quite so far as to tease out their most far-reaching consequences. Ultimately there is a distinction between what the subject brings along in his dream, which is at the level of the unconscious, and the factor of dual relations, which hinge on his addressing someone when he recounts the dream in analysis. It is in this sense that I tell you that a dream that arises in the course of an analysis always bears a certain steering towards the analyst, and this steering is not always necessarily the unconscious steering.

The whole question is as to whether or not the stress should be laid on intention. In the case of the young homosexual woman, Freud tells us that this intention remains the patient's avowed intention to play the game of deception with her father. She manages to formulate this game that consists in feigning to undergo treatment while maintaining her positions and her fidelity to the lady. But should this something that is being expressed in the dreams be conceived of purely and simply from the perspective of deception, that is to say, in its preconscious intentionalisation?

I don't think so, because when we look closely, what can we see being formulated? This is undoubtedly a dialectic of deception, but when brought back to the signifier, what is being formulated is precisely what was deflected at the outset, in the first position, and which at that stage was in the unconscious just as it is in the unconscious now at the third stage. What is being formulated comes from the father. In the way that the subject receives his own message in an inverted form, in the form of You are my wife or You are my master, here the message is You will bear my child. Upon entering the Oedipus complex, or so long as the Oedipus complex has not been resolved, this is the promise on which the girl's entry into the Oedipus complex is grounded. This is the point of departure for her position, and if indeed we find in this series of dreams something that is articulated as a situation that fulfils this promise, then it's because it is always the same unconscious content that is borne out.

Freud hesitates when faced with this precisely because he hasn't yet managed to provide a fully pared down formulation of what transference is. In transference, there is an imaginary element and a symbolic element, and consequently there is a choice to be made. If there is a meaning to transference and to what Freud later contributed with the notion of Wiederholungszwang – on which I made sure to spend a year, so that you could see what was meant by it – then it's that there is an insistence that is inherent to the symbolic chain as such.

By definition, this insistence inherent to the symbolic chain is not taken on by the subject. None the less, the mere fact that here it reproduces and survives into the third stage, to be formulated in a dream – even though this does appear to be a misleading dream on the imaginary level of the direct relationship with the therapist – makes it strictly speaking, by itself alone, the representative of the transference in the proper sense. This is where Freud could have soundly and boldly placed his confidence, grounded on a less wavering positioning of his notion of transference. He would have been able to intervene if only he had perceived that transference happens essentially on the level of symbolic articulation.

When we speak of transference, when something takes on meaning from the fact that the analyst becomes the locus of the transference, this is very precisely in so far as symbolic articulation as such is at issue. Of course, this is before the subject has taken it on board, as we can see here in this transference dream. Freud notes how there and then something occurred that belonged to the realm of transference, yet he draws from it neither the strict consequence nor the correct method of intervention.

I'm pointing this out because in truth this is not valid for this particular case alone. We also have another case in which the problem arises on the same level and in like fashion, except that Freud makes the exact opposite mistake. This is the Dora case.

These two cases balance each other out admirably. They criss-cross, the one with the other, and strictly so, not only because the conflating of the symbolic position and the imaginary position occurs in either case in an opposite direction, but still more because in their overall constellation they are in strict correspondence, with the sole proviso that they are correlated as positive to negative. I might say that there is no finer illustration of Freud's formula that perversion is the negative of neurosis.

This still has to be developed.

Let's quickly review the terms of the Dora case, through their commonality with the terms of the constellation that is present in the case of the young homosexual woman.

In the Dora case we find exactly the same protagonists on centre stage – the father, a daughter, and also a lady, Frau K. This is all the more striking in that the whole problem revolves around the lady, though this is hidden from Freud in the girl's presentation.

Dora is a case of petite hystérie and she has been brought to see Freud because of certain symptoms she has. These symptoms are undoubtedly mild, but striking all the same. Above all, the situation has become intolerable following some sort of token of suicidal intention that ultimately caused her family some alarm. When she is taken to Freud, the father presents her as ill, and without a shadow of a doubt this move to consult is an element that in itself denotes a crisis in the social circle, in which previously the situation had been maintained with a certain equilibrium. Nevertheless, this peculiar equilibrium had already been upset two years hence, an equilibrium constituted by a positioning that was initially concealed from Freud, namely that Dora's father had taken Frau K. as his mistress. This woman was married to a gentleman named Herr K., and they lived in a sort of foursome relation encompassing the couple formed by father and daughter. Dora's mother is absent from the situation.

We can already see, as we keep pressing forward, the contrast with the previous situation. In the case of the young homosexual woman, the mother is present because she is the one who takes the father's attention away from the daughter, thereby introducing the real element of frustration that will be decisive in shaping the perverse constellation. Furthermore, in the Dora case the father is the one who brings the lady into the picture and seems to be keeping her there, while in the other case the daughter is the one who brings her in.

What is striking in this positioning is that Dora straightaway emphasises to Freud her exceedingly sharp reproach concerning the affection from her father, which she says has been stolen from her by the affair. She shows right away that she has always been privy to the existence of the affair, to its permanence and its regularity, and that she has reached a point where she can stand it no longer. Her entire deportment is indicative of her reproach in this regard.

With a step that is most decisive, possessing as it does the dialectical quality, strictly speaking, of the Freudian experience, Freud brings Dora to the question – Is it not the case that what you are rebelling against, as though it were something out of line, is the very thing that you yourself participated in? And, indeed, he promptly offers evidence of how, up until a critical moment, this position had been supported most efficaciously by Dora herself. She had shown herself to be far more than accepting of this singular situation. She was truly its kingpin, protecting the private moments of the couple formed by her father and the lady, even on occasion taking over the lady's duties, such as looking after her children. On the other hand, as one moves further into the structure of the case, she is even to be seen staking out an altogether special bond with the lady, whose confidante she is. Indeed, it seems that the confidences they exchanged went very far indeed.

The case bears such wealth of detail that there are still discoveries to be made in it, and so this quick reminder can on no account replace an attentive reading. Among other items, let me point out the lapse of nine months between the scene by the lake and the hysterical symptom of her dragging her leg, which Freud believes he has uncovered because the patient yields it to him in a symbolic fashion, but if one looks more closely one will notice that in reality it was a lapse of fifteen months. These fifteen months carry meaning because fifteen crops up throughout the observation, and this element is useful for our understanding in that it is grounded on number and on a purely symbolic value.

Today I can do no more than remind you of the terms in which the whole problem is set out, from beginning to end of the observation. It's not merely that Freud realises, after the event, that he has failed, due to the patient's resistance to admitting the love relation that binds her to Herr K., as Freud suggested to her with all the weight of his insistence and authority. It's not merely the footnote added, with hindsight, in which he points out that doubtless there was an error, namely that he should have understood that the homosexual attachment to Frau K. was the true signification of both the establishing of her initial position and her crisis. What is important is not merely that Freud acknowledges this after the event, but rather that throughout the observation you can read that Freud remains in the greatest ambiguity concerning the real object of Dora's desire.

In what terms is the problem to be articulated? Yet again, it's a matter of how this ambiguity might possibly be formulated, an ambiguity that is in some sense unresolved. It's quite clear that Herr K., in his person, is of overarching importance for Dora and that something along the lines of a libidinal bond has been established with him. It is also clear that something that belongs to another realm, yet which also carries considerable weight, is playing a constant role in Dora's libidinal bond with Frau K. How are they each to be appreciated in a way that would account both for the furtherance of the affair and for the moment at which it stops, its crisis point when the equilibrium is upset?

When I made my first inroad into the observation five years ago, I pointed out that, in conformity with the hysteric structure, the hysteric is someone who loves vicariously. You will find this in a whole host of observations. The hysteric is someone whose object is homosexual and who approaches this homosexual object by identifying with someone of the opposite sex. This was a first clinical approach, as it were, to the patient Dora.

I went further still. Taking as my point of departure the notion of the narcissistic relationship insomuch as it founds the ego, insomuch as it is the matrix, the Urbild, of the constitution of this imaginary function known as the ego, I showed how this affords trace elements for the observation. The full quadrille can be understood only to the extent that Dora's ego – and the ego alone – has identified with a virile protagonist, who is Herr K., and that for her the men are so many possible crystallisations of her own ego. In other words, it is through the intermediary of Herr K., it is in so far as she is Herr K., at the imaginary point constituted by the personality of Herr K., that she is attached to the personage of Frau K.

I went a little further still. I said that Frau K. is someone of importance. Why so? She is not important merely because she has been chosen among other objects. She is not merely someone of whom we might say that she is vested by the narcissistic function that lies at the bottom of any enamoration, any Verliebtheit. No. As the dreams show – since the essential point of the observation hinges on the dreams – Frau K. is Dora's question.

Let's try now to transcribe this onto our present formulation, and to pinpoint what in this foursome comes to be arranged on our fundamental schematic.

Dora is a hysteric, that is to say, someone who reached the level of the Oedipal crisis and who was both able and unable to pass through it. There is a reason for this, which is that her father, unlike the father of the young homosexual woman, is impotent. The whole observation leans on this central notion of the father's impotence. Here, then, is an opportunity to highlight in a particularly exemplary fashion what the function of the father might be in relation to the lack of object that led the girl into the Oedipus complex. What might the function of the father be qua giver?

This situation hinges on the distinction I made regarding primary frustration, the frustration that can set in between child and mother. There is the object of the child's frustration, but after this frustrating the child's desire persists. Frustration means something only to the extent that the object is the subject's appurtenance and persists as such after the frustrating. What is distinct in the mother's intervening belongs to another register, in that she gives, or doesn't give, and in that this gift is a sign of love.

Now comes the father, who is cut out to be the one who gives, symbolically, this missing object. Here in the Dora case he doesn't give it because he hasn't got it. Her father's phallic shortcoming resounds throughout the entire observation like the root of a chord, constitutive of the positioning. But yet again, do we find ourselves on just the one plane? Will the whole crisis be established solely in relation to this lack? Let's consider what is at stake. What does it mean to give? Isn't there another dimension that is introduced into the object relation on the level where it is raised to the symbolic degree by the fact that the object may or may not be given? In other words, is it ever the object that is given? This is the question, and in the Dora observation we can see one of its outcomes, which is utterly exemplary.

Dora remains very attached to this father from whom she does not receive, symbolically, the virile gift. She is so attached to him that her story begins exactly at the age of the dissolution of the Oedipus complex, with a whole series of hysterical mishaps that are very clearly linked to shows of love for the father, who at that time appears more than ever, and decisively so, to be a wounded and sick father, stricken in his very vital forces. The love she has for this father is at that time strictly correlative and coextensive with his diminution.

So, we have a very clear-cut distinction here. What intervenes in the love relationship, what is asked for as a sign of love, is only ever something that carries worth merely as a sign. Or, to go yet further, there is no greater possible gift, no greater sign of love, than the gift of what one hasn't got. Let's take note, however, that the dimension of the gift comes into existence only with the introduction of the Law. As is posited and asserted in sociological thought as a whole, a gift is something that circulates. The gift you give is always the gift you have received. But when the giving occurs between two subjects, the cycle of gifts comes from yet elsewhere, because what establishes a love relationship is that the gift is given, so to speak, for nothing.

Rien pour rien is the principle of exchange. You get nothing for nothing. This formula, like any formula in which the ambiguous rien occurs, seems to be the very formula for interest, but it is also the formula for what is wholly free of charge. Indeed, in the gift of love there is merely something that is given for nothing, and which can only be nothing. In other words, a subject gives something for free in so far as behind what he gives there is everything he lacks. What constitutes the gift is that the subject sacrifices beyond what he has. Moreover, this holds true for the primitive gift such as it effectively used to be practised at the origin of human exchanges in the form of the potlatch.

Imagine if you will a subject in possession of all the riches possible, the maximum possible amount of what may be possessed. Well, a gift from such a subject would literally have no value as a sign of love. Believers imagine that they love God because He is deemed to possess within Him this total plenitude and fullness, but it's quite certain that if this recognition is so much as thinkable, for anything whatsoever, when it comes to someone who might have gauged that at the root of any belief there is this Being who is supposed to be thought of as a Whole, even so, without any doubt He lacks the foremost thing in Being, that is to say, existence. At the root of any belief in God as perfectly and totally munificent, there is this je ne sais quoi that He forever lacks and which means that, all the same, it is always supposable that He doesn't exist. There is no reason to love God save that perhaps He doesn't exist.

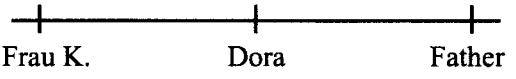
What is certain is that this is where Dora is when she loves her father. She loves him precisely for what he doesn't give her. The whole situation is unthinkable outside of this initial position, which is maintained through to the end. It still needs to be seen how this situation could be tolerated and put up with once the father got involved in something else, right before Dora's very eyes, and which she even seems to have induced.

The observation hinges on the following. We have the father, Dora, and Frau K.



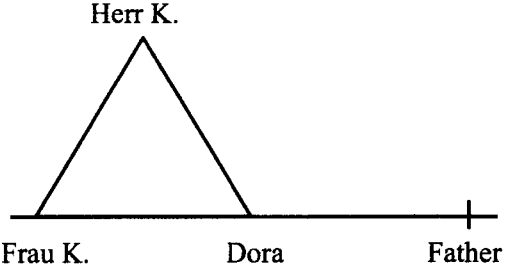
The whole situation is established as though Dora had to ask herself the question, What is it that my father loves in Frau K.? Frau K. is presented as something that her father can love beyond herself. What Dora latches on to is this something that is loved by her father in another, in so far as she doesn't know what it is.

This is in full conformity with what is supposed by the whole theory of the phallic object, namely that the female subject can enter the dialectic of the symbolic order only through the gift of the phallus. There is no other way. This supposes that real need, which is not denied by Freud and which belongs to the female organ as such, to woman's physiology, is something that never enters automatically into the establishing of the position of desire. Desire targets the phallus to the extent that it must be received as a gift. To this end, the phallus has to be raised to the level of the gift, which moreover may be absent or present. It is in so far as it is raised to the dignity of the gift-object that it leads the subject to enter the dialectic of exchange, which will normalise each of the subject's positions, up to and including the essential prohibitions that ground the overall movement of exchange. It is from within this that real need, the existence of which Freud never dreamed of denying, and which is linked to the female organ as such, will fall into its place and be satisfied, as it were, laterally. But it is never marked out symbolically as something that carries meaning. It is always essentially problematic unto itself, positioned shy of a certain symbolic crossing-point.

Indeed, this is precisely what is at stake throughout the unfurling of these symptoms and the unfurling of the observation. Dora asks herself, What is a woman? And it's in so far as Frau K. embodies this feminine function as such that for Dora she is the representation of the very thing into which Dora projects herself, as the question of femininity. It is to the extent that Dora herself is on the path of the dual relation with Frau K., or rather that Frau K. is what is loved beyond Dora, that Dora feels herself to be concerned in this position. Frau K. is the living incarnation of what Dora can neither know nor cognise in this situation, where she finds nowhere to accommodate herself. When it comes to love, someone is loved over and above what that someone is. Ultimately it's something this someone is lacking, whoever they are.

Dora places herself somewhere between her father and Frau K. Insomuch as her father loves Frau K., Dora feels satisfied, but on the condition, of course, that this positioning should be maintained. Moreover, this positioning is symbolised in umpteen different ways. The impotent father compensates by every kind of symbolic gift, including material gifts, for what he does not embody as a virile presence. And, in passing, he effectively makes Dora benefit from this through all sorts of generosity that are shared out equally to the mistress and to the daughter, thereby having her partake of this symbolic position.

Yet this is still not enough, and Dora tries to restore access to a manifest position oriented in the opposite direction. I mean that it's no longer vis-à-vis the father but vis-à-vis the woman she has in front of her, Frau K., that she tries to re-establish a triangular situation. This is where Herr K. comes in, through whom the triangle can effectively be closed, but in an inverted position.



Owing to her interest in the question, Dora will regard Herr K. as someone who participates in what symbolises the question aspect of Frau K.'s presence, namely the adoration that is further expressed by a very patent symbolic association that is given in the observation, the Sistine Madonna. Frau K. is an object of adoration to everyone around her, and Dora ultimately positions herself in relation to her as a participant in this adoration. Herr K. is the means whereby she makes this position normative by trying to reintegrate the male element into the circuit.

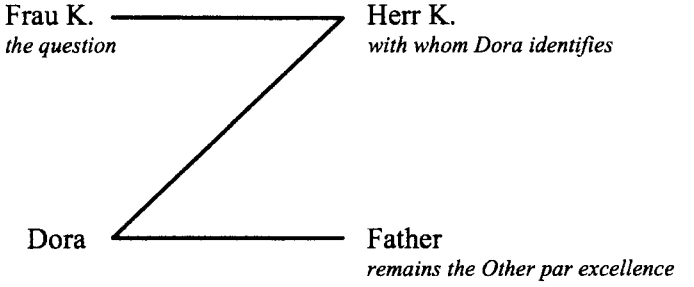
When does she slap him? Not when he is courting her or making declarations of love, nor even when he approaches her in a way that is intolerable for a hysteric. Rather, it's at the moment he tells her, Ich habe nichts an meiner Frau. The German wording is particularly telling. It has a particularly vivid sense, if we allow the term nothing to have its full scope. What he says in essence removes him from the circuit that had been thereby constituted, and which in its ordering is set out as follows –



Dora can readily accept that her father loves in her and through her what lies beyond, Frau K. But for Herr K. to be tolerable in this positioning he has to occupy the exact opposite function, which balances it out, namely, Dora herself has to be loved by him beyond his wife, but in so far as his wife means something to him. This something is the same as the nothing that must lie beyond, that is to say, in this instance, Dora. He doesn't say that his wife means nothing to him. He says that on the side of his wife, there is nothing. This an can be found in countless locutions in German, for example in the expression Es fehlt ihm an Geld. The particular wording here in German shows that this an is an additional link into the beyond of what lacks. This is precisely what we meet here. He means that there is nothing beyond his wife – My wife is not included in the circuit.

What is the upshot of this? Dora cannot tolerate that he should be interested in her, Dora, only in so far as he is interested in her alone. By the same stroke, the whole situation is broken off. If Herr K. is only interested in her, then her father is only interested in Frau K., and at that point she can no longer tolerate it. Why not?

In Freud's eyes, this nevertheless falls within a typical kind of situation. As Claude Lévi-Strauss explains in Elementary Structures of Kinship, the exchange of ties of alliance consists in the following – I have received a wife and I owe a daughter. Yet while this is the very principle behind the institution of exchange and of Law, it turns woman purely and simply into an object of exchange. She is not integrated into this by anything. In other words, if she has not renounced something, namely the paternal phallus conceived of as a gift-object, she can conceive of nothing, subjectively speaking, that she might receive from others, that is to say, from another man. To the very extent that she is excluded from this first institution of the gift and of the Law in the direct relation of the gift of love, she cannot experience this situation otherwise than by feeling reduced to the state of a mere object.[1]

This is indeed what happens at that very moment. Dora rebels absolutely and starts to say, My father is selling me to someone else. In effect, this is a clear and excellent assessment of the situation, to the extent that it has been kept in this half-darkness. As a matter of fact, from the father's standpoint, allowing Frau K.'s husband to carry on his courting of Dora over these long years in a sort of veiled tolerance has been a way of repaying his indulgence.

So, Herr K. has admitted that he has no part in a circuit where Dora could either identify him with herself or think that she is Herr K.'s object beyond the woman, through whom she is attached to him. There is a breaking of these bonds, which are undoubtedly subtle and ambiguous but which in each case carry a meaning and are perfectly oriented. She can no longer find her place in the circuit except in an extremely unstable fashion, but she does find it in some way, and in a way that is constant. When the bonds break, the situation loses its balance and Dora finds herself having slid into the role of a mere object. She then sets about staking a claim to the very thing she was inclined to consider she had been receiving up to the present time, though it was through the intermediary of another, namely her father's love. From this moment forth, she demands it exclusively, because it has been refused her totally.

So, what difference becomes apparent between these two registers and these two situations in which Dora and the homosexual woman are respectively implicated?

To go quickly, so as to end on something that will give you a clear picture, I will tell you the following, which we shall confirm later.

If it is true that what is maintained in the unconscious of the young homosexual woman is the father's promise, You will bear my child, and if what she shows in her exalted love for the lady is, as Freud says it is, the very model of absolutely selfless love, of love given for nothing in return, can't you see that it's as though the young woman wanted to show her father what true love is, this love that her father has refused her? Undoubtedly the father was implicated in the subject's unconscious, and no doubt this was because he was finding further favour from the mother. Indeed, this relationship is fundamental whenever a child enters the Oedipus complex, namely the crushing superiority of the adult rival. What she demonstrates to him is how one can love someone not only for what that person has, but literally for what the person doesn't have, for the symbolic penis she knows she will not find in the lady. For she knows full well where the symbolic penis is to be found. It is with her father who, for his part, is not impotent.

In other words, what is called perversion is expressed in this case between the lines, through contrasts and allusions. It's a way of speaking about something altogether different, but which necessarily implies, through a rigorous sequence of terms that are in play, its return as what is meant to be heard. You will find here what I once called, in the widest sense, metonymy, which consists in getting something across by speaking about something utterly different. If you cannot appreciate this fundamental notion of metonymy in its most comprehensive form, it is quite inconceivable that you should manage to form any notion whatsoever of what perversion in the imaginary can mean.

This metonymy is the principle behind everything that may be called realism in the realm of art and invention. Realism literally carries no sort of meaning whatsoever. A novel, which is made up of a heap of tiny lineaments that mean nothing, has no value if it doesn't make something pulsate harmonically, something that carries a meaning beyond. Thus, near the beginning of War and Peace, the theme that emanates from the women's bare shoulders stands for something else.[2] If the great novelists are tolerable, it's in so far as everything they endeavour to show us finds its meaning not at all symbolically, nor allegorically, but rather through what they allow to reverberate at a distance. The same goes for cinema. When a film is good, it's because of the metonymic function. And so too, the subject's function of perversion is a metonymic function.

Is it the same for Dora, who is a neurotic? It's actually quite different. When we look at the diagram, we notice that in perversion we are dealing with a signifying line of conduct that points to a signifier that lies further along in the signifying chain, to the extent that it is linked to it by a necessary signifier. In the Dora case, however, taken as a subject, Dora places herself at each step of the way beneath a certain number of signifiers in the chain. She finds in the situation a sort of perpetual metaphor.

Literally, Frau K. is her metaphor, because Dora can say nothing of what she is. Dora knows neither where to locate herself, nor where she is, nor what she is meant for, nor what love is meant for. She knows simply that love exists, and she finds an historicisation of this, wherein she finds her place in the form of a question. This question is focused by the content and the articulation of each of her dreams – the jewellery box, then Bahnhof, Friedhof, Vorhof – which signify nothing more than this question. In short, it is in so far as Dora questions herself about what it means to be a woman that she expresses herself as she does, through her symptoms. These symptoms are signifier-elements, but to the extent that beneath them runs a perpetually shifting signified, this being the way in which Dora implicates herself in this and concerns herself with it.

Dora's neurosis takes on its meaning to the extent that it is metaphorical, and to the extent that it can be unravelled. And it was precisely in so far as Freud forced the real element into this metaphor, the real element that tends to be reinserted in any metaphor, by telling her This is who you love, that something did, of course, tend towards a normalisation in the situation when Herr K. entered the game, but this something remained in a metaphorical state.

Proof of this is the sort of pregnancy that befalls Dora after the crisis when she breaks off from Herr K., and which Freud perceives with his prodigious intuitive feeling for signification. It is indeed an odd sort of signifying still-birth that occurs at term, after nine months. Freud says nine months because Dora herself tells him so. She thereby confesses to a sort of pregnancy, but it actually happens after that, after what for Dora would be a normal term pregnancy. It is of significance that Dora sees in this the final reverberation of what still binds her to Herr K. We find here, in a certain form, some equation with a kind of copulation that translates into the realm of the symbolic in a purely metaphorical fashion. Yet again, the symptom is but a metaphor here, an attempt to join the Law of symbolic exchanges to the man with whom one unites or disunites.

In contrast to this, the childbirth that is also to be found at the end of the observation on the homosexual woman, before she comes to see Freud, manifests in the following way – she abruptly throws herself from a little railway bridge when, once again, the real father steps in, evincing his irritation and wrath, which is in turn acknowledged by the lady who is beside her. The lady tells her that she no longer wishes to see her, and the young woman then finds herself stripped utterly of her last resources. Up until that moment, she was frustrated, since she was without the paternal phallus that was supposed to be given to her, but she had found the means to maintain desire along the path of the imaginary relationship with the lady. Now that the lady has rejected her, however, she can no longer sustain anything. The object is lost once and for all, and this nothing in which she had set herself up, in order to demonstrate to her father how to love, has no more reason to be. At that moment, she makes her suicide attempt.

As Freud underlines for us, this also carries another meaning, that of a definitive loss of the object. The phallus that has been firmly refused her has fallen, niederkommen. This falling away has the value of a definitive privation, and also mimes a sort of symbolic childbirth. The metonymic aspect I was telling you about is to be found here. If Freud can interpret the act of jumping off the railway bridge at the critical and terminal moment of her relationship with the lady and the father as a demonstrative way of herself becoming this child that she has not had, and at the same time of destroying herself in a final act that signifies the object, this is grounded solely on the existence of the word niederkommen.

This word indicates, metonymically, the final term, the term of suicide, in which is expressed what is at stake in the young homosexual woman, this being the sole mainspring of her entire perversion, in keeping with what Freud asserted time and again concerning the pathogenesis of a certain type of female homosexuality, namely a steady and particularly reinforced love for the father.

THE FETISH OBJECT

IX

THE FUNCTION OF THE VEIL

The symbolic phallus
How lack is actualised
The screen-memory: coming to a halt on the image
Alternation between perverse identifications
The structure of reactional exhibitionism

Pursuing our reflections on the object, today I'm going to be putting forward what can be gathered from them in connection with a problem that actualises the question of the object in an especially keen fashion, namely fetishes and fetishism.

You are going to see from this how the fundamental schema with which I've been trying to furnish you these last weeks certainly finds special expression in the following paradoxical assertions – that what is loved in the object is what the object lacks and that one gives only what one hasn't got.

The fundamental schema that in any symbolic exchange, irrespective of how it may function, implies the permanence of the constituent character of what lies beyond the object allows us to see in a new light the perversion that has taken on the role of exemplum in analytic theory and to establish what I might call its fundamental equations in a different way.

So, this is about fetishism.

Freud makes an inroad into the question of fetishism in two fundamental texts, one from 1905 and the other from 1927. While further texts take up the question later, these two – the paragraph on fetishism in the Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality and the article entitled Fetishism – are the most precious.

In his article, Freud tells us at the outset that the fetish is the symbol of something, but adds that in saying this he shall certainly create disappointment. A great deal has been said about the fetish for as long as people have been speaking about analysis, and also since Freud first spoke about it. The something in question is, once again, the penis.

Yet immediately after this comment, he stresses that this is not any chance penis. The detail seems scarcely to have been exploited in its structural grounding, in the fundamental suppositions that it implies on reading it naively for the first time. To spell it right out, the penis at stake is not the real penis. It's the penis in so far as the woman has it, that it to say, in so far as she does not have it.

I'm underscoring this point of oscillation, on which we ought briefly to pause, so as to see what is ordinarily passed over, and which we must not pass over. For someone who does not make use of the keys we possess, all this is merely a matter of misrecognising the real – it's about the phallus that the woman doesn't have, and which she must have for reasons relating to the child's doubtful relation to reality. This is the common path, which usually supports all manner of speculation on the future, the development and the crisis-points of fetishism, and, as I have been able to confirm through an extensive reading of all that has been written on fetishism, it leads to all sorts of impasse.

Here, as always, I have ventured not to expand too far into this forest of analytic literature. In truth, this is something that, to be treated effectively, would require not just hours but a more controlled study, for there is nothing more delicate and more fastidious than to locate the precise point at which some matter shrinks away, at which the author avoids the crucial point in a discrimination. So, I will be showing you here, in one part of what I'm about to expatiate, the more or less settled result of my readings, and I will be asking you to follow me.

To avoid the aimless wandering into which the authors have gradually been led over the years whenever they avoid this point, and to restore the proper position to what is at issue, the differential sinew by which to broach this is that on no account is this a real phallus, a phallus which, as real, would exist or not exist. It's a symbolic phallus, in so far as it's in its very nature to present in exchange as an absence, as an absence that functions as such.

Indeed, everything that can be tralatitious in symbolic exchange is always something that is as much absence as presence. It is made in such a way that it has a sort of fundamental alternation, which means that, having appeared at one point, it disappears then to reappear at another. In other words, it circulates, leaving behind it the sign of its absence at the point from which it came. In yet other words, we can immediately recognise that the phallus that is involved here is a symbolic object.

On the one hand, by means of this object a structural cycle of imaginary threats is established, which limits the use and wielding of the real phallus. This is the meaning of the castration complex, in that this is how the man is caught in it. But there is another use, which is hidden, so to speak, by the more or less fearsome fantasies in the man's relation to these prohibitions bearing on the use of the phallus, and this is the symbolic function of the phallus. I mean that the fact of whether it is there or not there, and solely in so far as it is there or not there, is what sets up the symbolic differentiation between the sexes.

Symbolically, woman does not have the phallus. But not to have the phallus symbolically is to partake of it in the capacity of absence, and so to have it in some way. The phallus always lies beyond any relationship between man and woman. It can on occasion form the object of a woman's imaginary yearning to the extent that she has only a very small phallus, yet this phallus that she might feel to be insufficient is not the only one that functions for her because, in so far as she is caught in the intersubjective relationship, there lies, beyond her, for the man, the phallus that she doesn't have, that is to say, the symbolic phallus that exists qua absence. This is completely independent of the inferiority she might feel on the imaginary plane, for as much as she has a real partaking of the phallus.

This symbolic penis, which the other day I positioned in the diagram for the young homosexual woman, plays an essential role and function in the girl's entry into symbolic exchange. It is in so far as she does not have this phallus, that is to say, in so far as, also, she does have it on the symbolic plane, it is in so far as she enters the symbolic dialectic of having or not having the phallus, that she thereby enters the ordered, symbolised relationship of differentiation between the sexes, where the inter-human relationship is taken on board as something disciplined, typified, ordered, struck with prohibitions and marked by the fundamental structure of the incest law. This is what Freud means when he tells us that it is through the intermediary of what he calls the idea of castration in woman – and which is precisely that she does not have it symbolically, and so therefore she may have it – that she enters the Oedipus complex, whereas this is the boy's way out if it.

In this we can see how, structurally speaking, the androcentrism that marks the elementary structures of kinship in Lévi-Strauss's schematisation is in a certain way justified. The women are exchanged between lineages founded on the male line, the one that is chosen precisely because it is symbolic and improbable. It is a fact that the women are exchanged as an object between male lineages. They enter here through an exchange, that of the phallus they receive symbolically and in exchange for which they give the child that for them takes on the function of an ersatz, a substitute, an equivalent for the phallus, and whereby they introduce natural fecundity into this patricentric symbolic genealogy which in itself is sterile. Yet it is in so far as they latch onto this sole and central object that is distinguished by the fact that it is precisely not an object, but an object that has undergone symbolic valorisation in the most radical way, it is by the intermediary of their relation to this phallus, that they enter the chain of symbolic exchange, that they set themselves up within it and assume their place and value.

Once you have noticed this you can see it finding expression in umpteen different ways. When we look closely, what is ultimately expressed in this fundamental theme of the woman giving of herself, if not precisely the need to affirm the gift? Here we can see the concrete psychological experience such as it is given to us, and which is so paradoxical in this instance because it's quite clear that in the act of love, the woman receives, for real. She receives far more than she gives. Everything indicates, and the analytic experience has accentuated this, that no position is a more capturing one, indeed a more consuming one, on the imaginary plane, than hers. If this gets turned around into the contrary assertion, namely that the woman gives herself, it is to the very extent that symbolically it must be so. She must give something in exchange for what she receives, that is, the symbolic phallus.

So – Freud tells us – here we have the fetish, representing the phallus qua absent, the symbolic phallus. How can we not see here, right away, that this sort of initial turnaround is indispensable if we are to understand items that are otherwise utterly paradoxical? For example, it is invariably boys who are fetishists, and never girls. If everything lay on the plane of imaginary deficiency, or even of imaginary inferiority, it might seem on first approach that of the two sexes fetishism would break out most overtly in the one that is deprived of the phallus for real. Yet this is hardly the case. Fetishism is exceedingly rare in women, in the proper and individualised sense that it is incarnated in an object that we can regard as itself corresponding in a symbolic way to the phallus qua absent.

Let's try to see first of all how this singular relation to an object that is not one can be generated.

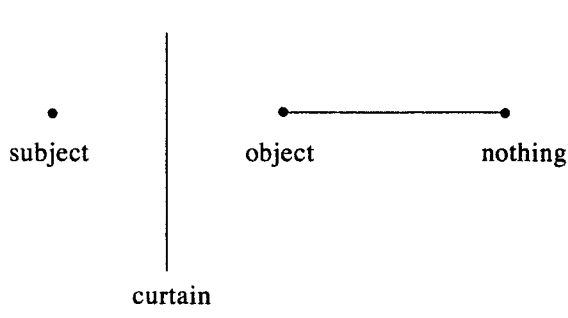
Analysis tells us that the fetish is a symbol. In this respect, it is placed at the outset almost on the same footing as any other neurotic symbol.

When it is not a neurosis that is at issue but rather a perversion, this is not so palpable. This is how things are classified nosographically for reasons of clinical resemblance that indubitably harbour a certain value, but one has to look fairly closely to confirm this in the structure from the standpoint of analysis. In truth, a good many authors show hesitation here and go so far as to place fetishism on the borderline between the perversions and the neuroses, precisely due to the especially symbolic character of the crucial fantasy.

Having started with the full weight of structure, let's pause for a moment on this position of interposition, which means that what is loved in the love-object is something that lies beyond it. This something is undoubtedly nothing, but it possesses the property of being there symbolically. Since it is a symbol, not only can it be this nothing, but also it must be. What can materialise for us, as it were, in the sharpest way this relationship of interposition, which means that what is aimed at lies beyond what presents itself? Well, something that is truly one of the most fundamental images of the human relationship with the world, namely the veil, the curtain.

The veil or curtain that hangs in front of something is still what best affords an image of this fundamental situation of love. One can even say that with the presence of the curtain, what lies beyond as a lack tends to be actualised as an image. The absence is painted onto the veil. This is nothing less than a curtain's function per se, whichever it may be. The curtain assumes its value, its being and its consistence from being precisely that onto which absence is projected and imagined. The curtain is, so to speak, the idol of absence. If the veil of Māyā is the most commonly used metaphor to express man's relation to all that captivates him, this is surely due to his sense of a certain fundamental illusion in all his relations of desire. It is precisely here that man embodies and idolifies his sense of this nothing that lies beyond the love-object.

You should hold this fundamental schema in your minds if you want to locate in the right way the elements that come into play in the setting up of the fetishistic relationship, at whichever moment we might consider it.



Here, then, is the subject, and the object, and what lies beyond is the nothing, or else the symbol, or else the phallus insomuch as woman lacks it. But once the curtain is in place, something can be painted onto it that indicates that the object lies beyond. The object can then take the place of lack, and also, as such, be the support of love, but in so far as it is precisely not the point to which desire is tethered. Desire appears in some way as a metaphor for love, but what tethers it, namely the object, appears as something illusory and as something that is valorised as illusory.

The notorious splitting of the ego when the fetish is involved is explained to us by saying that here woman's castration is at once affirmed yet denied. Since the fetish is there, she has not lost the phallus, but by the same stroke she can be made to lose it, that is, she can be castrated. The ambiguity of this relationship to the fetish is constant and is relentlessly manifested from one moment to the next in symptoms. This ambiguity, which is borne out in lived experience, an illusion both sustained and cherished as such, is at the same time experienced in a fragile balance where at any moment the curtain could be raised or come tumbling down. This is the relation that is at issue in the fetishist's relationship with his object.

When we follow Freud's article further, he speaks of Verleugnung with regard to the fundamental stance of disavowing in the relationship to the fetish. But he also says that it's about making the complex relationship hold up, aufrechtzuhalten, as though he were speaking about a stage set. Freud's language, which is so full of imagery, while being so very precise, employs terms that here assume their value. He says that the horror of castration has set up a memorial to itself in the creation of this substitute. The fetish is a Denkmal. The word trophy doesn't feature, but in truth it is there, doubling up as the token of triumph, das Zeichen des Triumphes. Authors who approach the typical phenomenon of the fetish will speak over and again of the way in which the subject heraldises his relation to sex,[1] but Freud is making us take a step further here.

Why does this come about? Why is it necessary? We will be coming back to this afterwards. As always, people press ahead too quickly. If one goes straight to the whys and wherefores, one slides immediately into a kind of pandemonium where all sorts of leanings come crowding in to explain why the subject can be more or less remote from the object and feel himself to be arrested, threatened and in conflict.[2] Let's stay for the time being at the level of structure.

The structure is here in this relation between the veil and what lies beyond it. An image can be formed on the veil, that is to say, it can be established as an imaginary capture and as the place of desire. This relationship with a beyond-zone is fundamental whenever a symbolic relationship is being set up. It's a matter of descending onto the imaginary plane of the ternary order of subject / object / beyond-zone that is fundamental to the symbolic relationship. In other words, it's about projecting the intermediary position of the object into the function of the veil.

Before going any further and examining the subject's requirement of this veil, we are going to look at another angle from which a symbolic relation is established in the imaginary.

When last time I was speaking about the perverse structure as such, I spoke about metonymy, or allusion, or a relation that lies between the lines, these being the elevated forms of metonymy. Here Freud puts it in the clearest possible way, though he does not use the word metonymy. What constitutes the fetish, the symbolic element that fixes down the fetish and projects it onto the veil, is taken from the historical dimension. It's the moment when the image comes to a standstill.

I recall previously making a comparison with a film that all of a sudden freezes, just before the moment when what is being sought in the mother, that is, the phallus that she has and which she does not have, has to be seen qua presence–absence, qua absence–presence. The historical reminiscence is halted and suspended at the moment just before.

I'm saying historical reminiscence because there is no other meaning to be given to the term screen-memory, which is so fundamental in Freud's conceptualisation and phenomenology. The screen-memory, the Deckerinnerung, is not merely a snapshot. It's an interruption in the subject's history, a moment at which it becomes halted and frozen, and so by the same token a moment when it indicates the pursuance of its movement beyond the veil. The screen-memory is linked to the subject's history by a whole chain. It is a stopping point in this chain, and it's in this respect that it is metonymical, because history, by its very nature, goes on. In coming to a halt there, the chain indicates its ensuing sequence, which is thenceforth veiled. It indicates its absent sequence, namely the repression at stake, as Freud says very clearly.

We speak of repression solely in so far as there is a symbolic chain. If a phenomenon that may pass for an imaginary phenomenon can be designated as the point of a repression – because the fetish is in a certain sense an image, and a projected image – it's precisely in so far as this image is merely the limit point between history insomuch as it goes on and the moment at which it is interrupted. It is the sign, the marker, of the point of repression.

If you read Freud's text carefully you will see that this way of spelling things out is the clearest way of giving his expressions their full weight.

Once again we can see the distinction between the relationship with the love object and the relationship of object frustration. These are two different relationships. On the one hand, love transfers via metaphor to desire, which latches onto the object as something illusory, while on the other hand the constitution of the object is not metaphoric but metonymic. The latter is a point in the chain of history at which history has come to a halt. It's the sign that this is where the beyond-zone that the subject has constituted begins. Why so? Why does the subject have to constitute this zone that lies beyond? Why is the veil more precious to man than reality? Why does the order of this illusory relationship become an essential constituent that is necessary for his relation to the object? This is the question posed by fetishism.

Before going further, from what I've just said you can see all sorts of things becoming clearer, including for instance the fact that as the first example of an analysis of a fetishist Freud gives us the wonderful story of a play on words, concerning a gentleman who had been brought up in England and later became a fetishist in Germany, and who was forever seeking out a little shine on the nose. Moreover, he would actually see this shine, this Glanz auf der Nase. It meant nothing other than a glance at the nose, the nose itself being, of course, a symbol. The German expression simply transposed the English expression of his early years. You can see here the historical chain coming into play and projecting onto a point on the veil insomuch as it can even encompass an entire sentence, and indeed a sentence from a forgotten tongue.

What are the causes behind the setting-up of the fetishistic structure? The Kleinians won't ascertain anything for you in this matter.

In any case, the various authors have been in a bind for some time now.

On the one hand, we cannot lose sight of the notion of the essential articulation that is the relation between the genesis of fetishism and the castration complex. On the other, it is apparently most certain in preoedipal relationships, and not elsewhere, that the phallic mother is the central element and the decisive mainspring. How are the two to be joined together?

These authors are more or less happy to do so. Just look how confortable the members of the English school are – fair to middling, actually – thanks to Mrs Melanie Klein's system. It structures the first stages of the oral drive tendencies, and particularly their most aggressive moment, by introducing the presence of the paternal penis into the very heart of this moment by means of retroactive projection, that is to say, by retroactivating the Oedipus complex in the earliest relationships with objects that are introjectable. Clearly, in this way they have easier access to the material that will allow for an interpretation of what is at issue. Since I have not yet embarked on an exhaustive critique of what Melanie Klein's system means, we shall leave aside for the time being what one or another author might be able to contribute on this score. To stick to what we have brought to light here, let's start with the fundamental relationship between the real child, the symbolic mother and her phallus, which for her is imaginary.

So, this is a scheme to be handled with caution inasmuch as it is focused on a single plane, despite corresponding to various planes and coming to function at successive stages of the story. Indeed, for a long while the child is not in a position to appropriate for himself the relationship of imaginary appurtenance that produces the mother's profound division on her side. We are going to try this year to elucidate this question. We are on the path of seeing how and at what moment this is taken on board by the child, and how this comes into play when the child himself enters this relationship with the symbolic object in so far as the phallus is its main currency. This poses questions of chronology, temporality, order and succession, which are questions that we try to broach quite naturally – as is indicated by the history of psychoanalysis – from the angle of pathology.

What do the observations show us here? When we scrutinise them carefully they show that it is very exactly around and correlative to this singular symptom, which places the subject in an elective relationship with a fetish – the mesmerising object inscribed upon the veil – that his erotic life gravitates. I'm saying gravitates because although it is a mesmerising object, it is understood that the subject maintains a certain freedom of movement, which can be perceived when one analyses and doesn't merely make a clinical description. When we take an observation we can see those elements that I have been spelling out today, and which Binet himself had already seen, for instance this gripping point of the screen-memory and the stand-still at the hem of the mother's dress, even her girdle. We can see the essentially ambiguous relation of illusion with this fetish being lived through as such and, moreover, being preferred. We can see the particularly satisfying function of an object that in itself is inert and entirely at the mercy of the subject for the handling of his erotic relationships. All of this can be seen, but it takes analysis to see what is at stake a little more closely, namely what happens whenever, for whatever reason, the recourse to the fetish founders, becomes exhausted and worn out, and simply gives way.

What we can see in the subject's deportment in his love life, and more simply in his erotic relationship, boils down to a defence. You can inspect this by reading observations in the International Journal, by Mrs Sylvia Payne in the second issue of volume 20, by Mr W. H. Gillespie in volume 21, and by Mr Dugmore Hunter in the third issue of volume 35, or those by Mrs Greenacre and others in the Psycho-Analytic Study of the Child. This was also glimpsed by Freud, and is spelt out in our diagram. Freud tells us that fetishism is a defence against homosexuality and Mr Gillespie too notes how narrow may be the margin between fetishism and homosexuality. In short, what we find in the relationships with the love object that organise this cycle for the fetishist is an alternation of identifications. There is an identification with the woman confronted with the destructive penis, the imaginary phallus of the primordial experiences from the oral–anal period focused on the aggressiveness of the sadistic theory of coitus, and indeed a good many experiences that are brought to light by analysis include some observation of the primal scene perceived as cruel, aggressive, violent and even deadly. And, conversely, there is the subject's identification with the imaginary phallus, which for the woman makes it a pure object which she can devour and, at the furthest limit, destroy.

The child is faced with this oscillation between the two poles of the imaginary relationship in what might be called a brutal fashion, not yet established in its Oedipal lawfulness by the introduction of the father as a subject, as a central point of order and legitimate ownership. The child is offered up to this bipolar oscillation of the relationship between two irreconcilable objects which either way culminate in a destructive and even deadly outcome. This is what is to be found at the base of love relations whenever they arise in the subject's life as they assume order and shape. Along a certain path of understanding analysis, which is precisely the new-fangled path and which in this respect has forged its own path, the analyst will intervene to make the subject perceive the alternation between these positions at the same time as their signification. It might be said that in a certain way the analyst intervenes to open the symbolic distance that is necessary for the subject to perceive meaning.

The observations are exceedingly rich and profitable here, when they show us for example the umpteen forms that the actuality of the subject's early life can take, the fundamental dis-completion that means that he is offered up as such to the imaginary relationship, either along the path of identification with the woman or along the path of taking the place of the imaginary phallus. That is to say, either way there is an insufficient symbolisation of the ternary relationship. For example, the authors say that very often they note the absence of the father, sometimes repeatedly in the subject's history, his shortcoming as a presence – he goes on a trip, off to war, and so forth.

Furthermore, they note a certain type of subjective position that is sometimes peculiarly reproduced in the fantasies, that of a forced immobilisation. It is sometimes manifested by the fact of the subject having actually been tied down. There is a very fine example in the observation by Sylvia Payne. Following some excessive medical advice, a child was prevented from walking up until the age of two. He had to be tied down in his bed, and this was not without consequence, including the fact that he lived in this way closely monitored in his parents' bedroom. This put him in the exemplary position of being entirely given over to a purely visual relationship, without any first signs of muscular activity emerging from their source. His relationship with his parents was thus lived through in the style of rage and anger that you can imagine. While such exemplary cases are rare, some authors have insisted on the fact that certain phobic mothers who keep their child at a distance from their contact, a little as though such contact were a source of infection, are certainly not without consequence on the supervalence accorded the visual relationship in the constitution of the primal relationship with the maternal object.

Be that as it may, far more instructive than any such example of a vitiation of the primary relationship is, as it were, what appears as a pathological relationship, which presents as the flipside or the complement to the libidinal adherence to the fetish. Fetishism is a classification that, nosologically speaking, encompasses all sorts of things for which our intuition merely gives us an indication of their affinity or kinship with fetishism.

That a subject like the one Mrs Payne tells us about should be attached to a mackintosh seems to be of the same nature as being attached to a shoe. We make no mistake in thinking so. Structurally speaking, however, this mackintosh contains relations on its own account and indicates a position that is somewhat different from that of the shoe or the girdle in so far as strictly speaking they are themselves directly in the position of the veil between subject and object. Yet it is quite certain that this mackintosh, like any other kind of clothing fetish that is more or less enveloping, aside from the special quality that the rubber entails, possesses a feature that is very often met and which cannot fail to harbour some final mystery that would doubtless be clarified psychologically by the sensoriality of the special contact with the rubber itself. Perhaps it does harbour something that might, more easily than anything else, be the outer lining of skin, or else perhaps harbour special insulating capacities, but whatever the case may be concerning the structure itself of the relations such as they are delivered up in some centres where the observation is made analytically, we can see that the mackintosh plays a role here that is no longer exactly that of the veil. It is much rather the role of something behind which the subject aligns himself, not as though he were in front of the veil but as though he were behind it, that is, in the mother's place, and, more specifically, adhering to the position of identification with the mother in which she needs to be protected, right here, by this envelopment.

This is what affords the transition between cases of fetishism and those of transvestism. The envelopment is not a veil but a protection. It's an aegis in which the subject identified with the female personage envelops himself.

Another typical relationship that can be particularly exemplary is evidenced in outbreaks of an exhibitionism that in some cases is truly reactional, even sometimes in alternation with fetishism. It always occurs in connection with some effort the subject makes to leave his labyrinth, and when the real comes into play in some way, putting the subject in these positions of unstable equilibrium that give rise to this type of crystallisation or swing-around of his position. This is very plainly illustrated by the outline of Freud's case of female homosexuality, to the extent that we can see that the introduction of the real element in the shape of the father leads to an interchange of the terms such that what was located in the beyond-zone, the symbolic father, takes up a place in the imaginary relationship in the form of the exemplary homosexual position that she assumes, and which is demonstrative in relation to the father.

Similarly, among the observations we have a very fine case in which we can see a subject who, having attempted in certain conditions to gain access to a full relationship by artificially forcing the real, expresses what was symbolically latent in the situation by means of his acting-out, that is to say, on the imaginary plane. Here is the example. The subject is about to attempt actual intercourse with a woman for the first time, but he positions himself in the experience as venturing into it in order to show, as it were, what he is capable of doing. He manages more or less successfully thanks to the help of the woman but, within the hour, even though there was nothing to suggest any possibility of his developing such symptoms, he gives himself over to a most peculiar and very highly calculated exhibitionism that consists in exposing his organ just as an international train is passing by. In this way, he could not be caught red-handed. He was compelled, therefore, to follow-up on something that was implicit in his position. His exhibitionism was merely the expression or the projection on the imaginary plane of something of which he had not understood the symbolic reverberations, namely the act he had just engaged in, which ultimately was but the act of trying to show, and merely to show, that he was capable of having normal intercourse just like anyone else.

We find this sort of reactional exhibitionism time and again in those observations that are proximate to fetishism, or which are even quite indisputably fetishism. One has a very clear sense of what is at stake in Delinquent Acts as Perversions and Fetishes by Melitta Schmideberg, though at the same time it is very curious to see how far she manages to avoid the main and essential aspect of the thing. She depicts a man who married a woman nearly a head taller than he and of about one and a half times his weight. He was truly victimised by his wife, becoming her awful punch-bag. One fine day this young man, who had been doing his best to face up to the situation, is informed that he is going to be a father. He rushes off to a public park and starts showing his organ to a group of young women.

Mrs Schmideberg, who certainly sounds a bit too Anna-Freudian in this, finds all sorts of analogies with the fact that the lad's father was already something of a victim for his wife, but had one day managed to get out of the situation by being caught with the maid. The intermediary of the jealous protest had brought his wife somewhat to heel. This explains nothing. It seems to Mrs Schmideberg that she has managed to make a short analysis of a perversion. But there is no cause for wonder, because it wasn't perversion at all, and nor has she managed to analyse it in the slightest. She leaves out of account the fact that, even so, it was through an act of exposing himself that the subject on this occasion manifested himself. There is no other way to explain this act of exposing himself than to refer to the mechanism of triggering whereby what arises in the real as a surplus that cannot be symbolically assimilated tends to precipitate what lies at the bottom of the symbolic relationship, namely the equivalence between phallus and child.

Unable to assume this paternity in any way whatsoever, or even to believe in it, the intrepid fellow went off to show the equivalent of the child in the right place, namely the use of his phallus that still remained to him.

IDENTIFICATION WITH THE PHALLUS

Transvestism and garment use
Showing oneself ≠ offering oneself to view
Girl = phallus
The object and the ideal in Freud
Frustration of love and satisfaction of need

Last time, I took a step forward in the elucidation of fetishism as an especially fundamental example of the dynamics of desire.

Desire is of the utmost interest to us for a reason that is twofold. On the one hand, we deal with this desire in our practice. It's not a constructed desire but a desire with all its paradoxes, just as we deal with an object with all its paradoxes. On the other hand, it's quite clear that Freud's thought took these paradoxes as its starting point. In particular, as far as desire is concerned, the starting point was perverse desire. It would be a great shame to lose sight of this in our attempt at unification or reduction in the face of the most naively intuitive theories on which psychoanalysis today has been drawing.

Every now and then I get some feedback on how you have received each fresh little finding that I bring you from one time to the next. At least this is what I hope for. Now, the little step I took came as a surprise to some people, who already found the theory of love quite satisfactory enough in the way I present it to you, in being grounded on the fact that the subject addresses the lack that is in the object. This had already given a number of them the opportunity to reflect in a way that seemed sufficiently enlightened, though they did have some trouble realising that there is a beyond-zone and a lack in this subject–object relation. Last time, I brought in an extra complication with a term that is situated in front of the object, namely the veil or curtain, the site of the imaginary projection where something appears that becomes the figuration of this lack and which as such can be the support offered to something that finds its name there – desire, but desire qua perverse. It is upon this veil that the fetish comes as a figuration of precisely what lacks beyond the object.

This schematisation is designed to set up the successive planes that should allow you in certain cases to find your bearings more easily in this sort of perpetual ambivalence and confusion, where yes is equal to no, where steering in one direction is equal to steering in exactly the opposite direction, along with everything that analysts unfortunately make use of to get out of the bind under the name ambivalence.

Right at the end of what I told you last time regarding fetishism, I pointed out how a position becomes apparent that is in some sense complementary. This position is also apparent across the different phases of the fetishist structure, even in the attempts that the fetishist makes to join up with the object from which he has been separated by something that has a mechanism and function which he does not, of course, understand. This position, which might be called symmetrical – the corresponding pole that lies opposite fetishism – is the function of transvestism.

In transvestism the subject identifies with what lies behind the veil, with the object that lacks something. The authors have spotted this very well in their analyses and have expressed it in their language, saying that the transvestite identifies with the phallic mother insomuch as, further to this, she veils over the lack of phallus.

This transvestism takes us a long way into the question, because we didn't have to wait for Freud to tackle the psychology of garments. In any use of the garment there is something that partakes of the function of transvestism. While the immediate commonplace view of the function of the garment is that it conceals the pudendum, the question has to be slightly more complicated than this in the eyes of an analyst. All it would take would be for one of these authors who go on about the phallic mother just to notice the meaning of what he is saying. Garments are not made solely to conceal what one has, in the sense of having it or not, but also precisely on account of not having. Both functions are essential. It is not always and essentially a matter of hiding the object but also of hiding the lack of object. This is a straightforward application in this case of the imaginary dialectic of what is too often overlooked, namely the function and presence of the lack of object.

Conversely, in the sweeping use they make of the scoptophilic relationship,[1] they always imply, as though it went without saying, that the fact of showing oneself is quite straightforward, that it is the correlative of the activity of viewing in voyeurism. Yet again, one dimension is being wilfully overlooked.

It is not true that always and in every instance the subject simply puts himself on view, as though this were the correlative and corresponding relation to the activity of viewing. It is not about the subject's involvement in a couple of visual capture. In scoptophilia there is also the supplementary dimension of involvement that is expressed in language by the presence of the reflexive form, a verbal form that in other languages exists in the middle voice. It is to offer oneself to view. If you combine these two dimensions, what the subject offers to view across a whole range of activities that get mixed up under the heading of voyeurism/exhibitionism is something other than what he shows. This gets drowned out in what is sweepingly called the scoptophilic relationship.

Authors like Fenichel – who are very poor theoreticians under their apparent clarity but who, even so, are not lacking in analytic experience – saw this very well. While the effort at theorisation comes to a head in hopeless failure, which is the case in a number of Fenichel's articles, you can occasionally light upon some very fine clinical gems in them, and even his good feeling for a whole range of facts that, through a kind of flair that the analyst has fortunately drawn from his experience, are grouped together around a theme or a branch chosen from the analytic articulation of the fundamental imaginary relationships. Around scoptophilia and around transvestism, various factual stems are grouped together which are utterly distinct from one another but which the author feels more or less obscurely to share some kinship or commonality.

In particular, while taking in this expansive and bland literature – a necessary undertaking if one is to give an account of just how far analysts have penetrated into an actual articulation of these facts – I recently turned my attention to an article by Fenichel that was published in 1949, in the third instalment of the eighteenth volume of the Psychoanalytic Quarterly. It concerns what he calls The Symbolic Equation: Girl = Phallus. This is not unrelated to the well-known series of equations faeces = child = penis that Freud himself authorised. Even though we can see a blatant lack of orientation being demonstrated here by Fenichel, which constantly leaves us wishing for a logic that would be otherwise, a series of facts can be ascertained which are grouped around these analytic encounters. From these it can be seen that, in the subject's unconscious, and especially the unconscious of the female subject, the child may be held to be equivalent to the phallus. All in all, here lies the phylum of everything that attaches to the fact that the child is given to the mother as a sort of substitute for, or even an equivalent to, the phallus.

However, alongside this there are many further facts, and that they should be bracketed together with this one is rather surprising. When I spoke about the child, it was not especially the female child, but this article sets its sights very specifically on the girl. Certainly the article has to start with a number of well-known features of fetishistic or quasi-fetishistic specificity, with certain perversions that are interpreted as the equivalent of the subject's phallus. It is part and parcel of analytic data that the girl herself – and even the child in a more general way – can conceive of herself as being posited as equivalent to the phallus and can demonstrate this in her deportment. That it is to say, a woman can experience the sexual relationship as being what leads her to bring the male partner his phallus. This is sometimes noticeable even in the details of her preferred position in love-making, as something that comes to append to the partner, that nestles into a certain locality of her partner's body. This is yet another kind of fact that cannot fail to be quite striking and to catch our attention. Then, in some cases, the male subject can likewise give himself to the woman as the thing she lacks, and bring her the phallus in the capacity of what she lacks, imaginarily speaking.

The full range of facts that are highlighted here might seem to point in one direction, but it can also be seen that in this way of comparing them and bringing them all into a single equation, the facts that are being gathered together are actually extremely different. In each of the four different orders of relationship that I have just sketched out, the subject is absolutely not in the same relation with the object. Either the subject brings it, or else gives it, or else desires it, or else replaces it. Once our attention has been drawn to these registers, we cannot fail to see that the author's grouping together of these facts into the equivalence that he thereby sets up goes far beyond a straightforward theoretical requirement.

We also read that the young girl can, for one type of subject, be the object of a supervalent attachment, and that a mythical function can emerge both from these perverse mirages and from a whole series of literary constructions which, depending on their author, we can place in more or less illustrious groupings. Some have spoken quite readily of a Mignon type. You are all familiar with Goethe's creation of Mignon the bohemian, whose bisexual position is very firmly underscored by the author himself. She lives with a sort of enormous and brutal protector, who clearly is highly paternal, known as the Harper. All told, he serves as her high servitor, but at the same time she is of great necessity to him. Goethe says somewhere, the Harper whom she needed, and Mignon whom he could not do without.[2] We find here a sort of couple with, on the one hand, what could be called might in its solid and brutal embodied state, and, on the other, something without which this might would be stripped of its efficacy, something that it is missing and which is ultimately the secret of its true might. This something is nothing less than a lack.

This is the final site where the infamous magic comes to be located, which is always so confusedly attributed in analytic theory to the idea of almightiness. As I have told you, the structure of almightiness, contrary to what people believe, lies not in the subject but in the mother, that is, in the primal Other. The Other is the one who is almighty. However, behind this almightiness there is indeed an ultimate lack on which the might of the Other hinges. I mean that as soon as the subject perceives, in the object whose almightiness he expects, this lack that renders powerless, the final resource of almightiness is deferred yet further beyond, to the very site where something does not exist, and to the utmost degree. It is that which, in the object, is nothing but the symbolism of lack, nothing but fragility and smallness. This is where the subject has accentuated the true and secret mainspring of almightiness, and it's what constitutes the considerable interest of what today I'm calling the Mignon type, which in literature has been reproduced in a great many examples.

Three years ago, I nearly announced a lecture on Jacques Cazotte's Le Diable amoureux. There are few testimonies that are so exemplary when it comes to a profound divination of the imaginary dynamic I've been trying to develop for you, and today especially. My recollection of it is as a major illustration that accentuates and imparts the meaning of this magical being that lies beyond the object, to which a whole series of idealising fantasies can become attached.

The tale begins in Naples, in a cave to which the first-person narrator has taken himself at the beckoning of the devil. In accordance with certain formalities, the devil appears in the guise of a formidable camel's head with disproportionately large ears. The camel's head says to him, in the most hollow voice – Che vuoi? What wouldst thou?

I believe that this fundamental questioning is indeed what provides us in the most gripping way with the function of the superego. But the interest does not lie in the fact that the image of the superego has found a gripping illustration, but rather in the creature who is supposed to transform, no sooner has the pact been concluded, into a little dog who, through a transition that surprises no one, becomes a charming young man and, then, a charming young woman. Furthermore, until the end they intermingle with total ambiguity. This beloved protagonist, who goes by the significant name of Biondetta, becomes for a while the stunning source of the narrator's every happiness, the fulfilment of his every desire, the properly magical satisfaction of everything he might wish for. Yet all this is steeped in an atmosphere of fantasy, of dangerous unreality, of abiding menace that doesn't fail to taint the surroundings. The situation is resolved at the end by the sudden collapse of this accelerating and crazy race, and by a catastrophic dissipation of the mirage, when the subject returns, as is only proper, to his mother's castle.

Another novel, Henri de Latouche's Fragoletta, presents a curious character who is clearly a transvestite because until the end, and without anything being brought to light unless by the reader, it has to do with a girl who is a boy and who plays a role that is functionally analogous to the one I've just described as the Mignon type. After a number of details and refinements, the novel culminates in a duel in which the protagonist kills Fragoletta. Fragoletta had presented herself to him as a boy and he had failed to recognise her. This shows very well the equivalence between a certain female object of Verliebtheit and the other party as a rival, the same other that is at issue when Hamlet kills the character of Ophelia's brother.

Here we are in the presence of a character that is fetishised or made fay, these being fundamentally the same word since they both connect via the Portuguese feitiço to the Latin factitius. Historically speaking, the word fetish derives from this and is none other than the factitious. The ambiguous feminine creature represents the subject himself, embodying in some way, beyond the mother, the phallus that she lacks, and doing so all the better in that he doesn't possess it himself. Instead, he is fully engaged in its representation, its Vorstellung. We are in the presence of a yet further function of the love relation on the perverse paths of desire, paths which can be exemplary for us in clarifying the positions that have to be singled out when we analyse this desire.

So, we have been led finally to ask the question of what is subjacent and constantly put into question by this very critique, namely the notion of identification.

The notion of identification is present from the first in Freud's writing in a latent fashion, emerging from one moment to the next only to disappear again. Implications of identification are already there in The Interpretation of Dreams. It was to reach its major point of explication when he wrote Mass Psychology and the Analysis of the Ego, which includes a chapter expressly devoted to identification.

One feature of this chapter is to show us – as very often this is so, and the value of Freud's writing is to show us this – the author's very great perplexity. This is an article where Freud admits that he is in a bind, and even that he is quite powerless to get out of the dilemma posed by the constant ambiguity that presents between the two terms he specifies, namely identification and object-choice. These two terms appear in a great many cases, one being substituted for the other with such a disconcerting power of metamorphosis that the transition itself is not grasped. Nevertheless, it is clearly necessary to maintain the distinction between the two because, as Freud says, standing on the side of the object is not the same thing as standing on the side of the subject. It's quite clear that, should an object become the object of choice, it is not the same as becoming the support for the subject's identification.

In itself this is wonderfully instructive. It is no less instructive to behold the disconcerting ease with which each author seems to accommodate himself to this and uses one and the other in a way that is strictly equivalent, whether in his observation or his theorisation, without asking for more. When one does ask for more, this produces an article like the one by Gustav Hans Graber, in the 1937 edition of Imago, on two types of mechanism in identification, Die zweierlei Mechanismen der Identifizierung, which really is the most staggering thing you can imagine because everything seems to be resolved for him by the distinction between active identification and passive identification. When one looks more closely it is impossible not to see, and indeed Graber himself notices this, that the two poles of active and passive are present in any kind of identification, and so we really have to come back to Freud and take up his articulation of the question point by point.

Chapter VIII of Mass Psychology and Analysis of the Ego, which follows the chapter on identification, opens with a sentence that shifts right away into the atmosphere of something that in its purity is quite different from what we usually read – Even in its caprices the usage of language remains true to some Wirklichkeit, to some effective reality.

As a side note, I would like to point out that Freud had made a first inroad into identification in the previous chapter by speaking about identification with the father as the example through which we enter most naturally into this phenomenon. We come to the second paragraph, and in the German text we read – At the same time as this identification with his father, possibly even earlier, the boy has begun to undertake a true object-charging of his mother. As an example of the poor translation of Freud's texts in French, even earlier is translated as un peu plus tard, a little later, leaving the reader to wonder whether the identification with the father might not come first.[3]

We find another example in the passage I want to come to this morning, and which I have chosen for you because it is the most condensed and the most apt to show you Freud's perplexities. It concerns the state of love in its relations with identification. Following Freud's text, we read that identification is the more primal and fundamental function in that it entails an object-choice, but one that still has to be articulated in a way that is itself highly problematic, because Freud's entire analysis ties it profoundly to narcissism. To go as far as we can in the direction that Freud spells out perfectly, we see that this object is a sort of other ego within the subject – The difference between identification and the condition of being in love, Verliebtheit, in its highest forms, called fascination or amorous dependence, Hörigkeit, is now easy to describe. In the former case the ego has enriched itself with the qualities of the object. To use Ferenczi's expression, it has 'introjected' the object into itself. In the latter case the ego has become poorer, it has abandoned itself to the object, setting the object in place of its most important constituent.

In the French translation we read that the ego s'assimile the object, but all one has to do is read what Ferenczi wrote to see that it's not about assimilation but introjection. It's a matter of introjection in its relations with identification. Then, the French translator gives s'étant effacé devant lui for dasselbe an die Stelle seines wichtigsten Bestandteils gesetzt. The German has been completely lost in the French sentence, which on no account translates what is so fully articulated in Freud's text.

Freud is pausing here on the contrast between, on the one hand, what the subject introjects and is enriched by, and on the other, what takes something from him and impoverishes him. Indeed, Freud had previously dwelt at some length on what occurs in the state of love, where the subject becomes increasingly dispossessed, to the benefit of the loved object, of everything that is himself. The subject is humbled and falls into complete subjection in relation to the object he has invested in. Freud is spelling out how this object, for whose benefit the subject has become impoverished, is the very same that he sets in place of his most important constituent, his wichtigsten Bestandteils.

This is Freud's approach to the problem. He tackles it by tracing backwards. He doesn't spare us the moves he makes. He moves forward and sees that it's incomplete, so he retraces his steps and says – Closer examination shows that this account erects sham opposites that do not in fact exist. We are not talking about impoverishment or enrichment in economic terms; the condition of being deeply in love can also be described as the ego having introjected the object into itself. It may be that another distinction comes closer to the essence here. In the case of identification, the object had become lost or been given up.

The French translation, however, tells us that the object se volatilise et disparaît. We are better off consulting the German text, because this is a reference to the fundamental notion that can be found consistently in Freud's notion of the formation of the object from the very start. He says that das Objekt verloren gegangen oder aufgegeben worden. It is not, therefore, about evaporating or vanishing, because the object does not vanish. On the contrary, the object is reinstated in the ego, with the ego undergoing a partial change, modelling itself on the lost object, or, in the case of Verliebtheit, the object is preserved and is as such 'over-charged' by and at the expense of the ego.

Freud continues – But in this respect too there is some doubt. If it is established that identification presupposes the relinquishment of object-charging, can there be no identification where the object is preserved? And before we allow ourselves to become involved in debating this delicate question, it may already have dawned on us that another question captures the essence of this situation, namely whether the object is set in the place of the Ich or of the Ichideal.

So, in going about things in this way the text leaves us in quite a pickle. It seems that nothing of any great sharpness emerges from these movements to-and-fro. The very place that is to be given to the object in these different back-and-forth movements, in which it is constituted either as an object of identification or as an object of loving capture, remains almost entirely in the state of a question. At least the question is being posed, and this is simply what I wanted to highlight. It can't be said that this is one of those texts that would be testamentary, but it's one of those in which Freud reached the summit of his theoretical elaboration.

Let's try, therefore, to take up the problem on the basis of the reference points that we have been afforded in the elaboration we have been trying to undertake here concerning the relations between frustration and the constitution of the object.

First of all, it's a matter of conceiving of the bond that we commonly establish, both in our practice and in our parlance, between identification and introjection. You have seen how this is quite apparent right from the start of the passage from Freud that I've just read out to you.

I propose the following – the metaphor that underlies introjection is an oral metaphor. People speak indiscriminately about introjection and incorporation, allowing themselves to slide in the most common way into all the articulations that were produced in the Kleinian era. They would evoke, for instance, the infamous constitution of primordial objects that divide in just the right way into good and bad objects that are alternately introjected. These objects are held to be something that is simply given in this infamous primitive world that knows no bounds, where the subject would form a whole from his being subsumed into the maternal body. From this standpoint, introjection is held to be a function that is strictly equivalent to and symmetrical with the function of projection. Furthermore, the object is constantly in a kind of movement, passing from without to within only to be pushed back out from the inside when it has become too much to bear. This leaves introjection and projection in a perfect symmetry.

What I am about to try to articulate for you now takes a stand against this excess, which is certainly not a Freudian excess.

I believe that it is strictly impossible to conceive of phenomena such as manifest oral impulses – and I'm not talking simply in terms of conceptualisation or something that is shaped in thoughts, but in terms of clinical practice – of such evocations of the oral drive, correlative with turning points in the symbolic reduction of the object that we endeavour to bring about from time to time, with more or less success, if we stick with this vague notion of regression that is always put at our disposal in such cases. In cases of young children where this leads to the appearance of bulimic impulses, or at some such turning point in the treatment of a fetishist, we are told that the subject is regressing because, of course, that's what he's there for. Why? Because at the very moment he is progressing in his analysis, that is to say, trying to take in a full perspective of his fetish, he regresses. You can always say this and no one will contradict you.

I say, on the contrary, that each time the drive appears in the analysis, or elsewhere, it should be conceived of in relation to its economic function, in relation to the unfolding of a particular defined symbolic relationship. Isn't there something that allows us to shed light on this in the rough outline I gave you for the dialectical structure of the gift?

On one side, the child is faced with the mother as the support of the first love relation, in so far as love is something that is symbolically structured, in so far as she is the object of an appeal, an object which therefore is as much absent as present. This is the mother whose gifts are signs of love, and which as such are just that. Ipso facto, these gifts are cancelled out whenever they are anything else but signs of love. On the other side, there are the objects of need that she presents to the child in the form of her breast. Can't you see that between the two it's a matter of equipoise and compensation? Whenever there is a frustration of love, this is compensated by the satisfaction of need. It is in so far as the mother is missing for the child who calls out to her, that he clings to her breast and turns it into something more significant than anything else. So long as he has it in his mouth and derives satisfaction from it, he cannot be separated from this thing that leaves him nourished, relaxed and satisfied. Here, the satisfaction of need is both a compensation for the frustration of love and, I would almost say, the beginning of the distraction from it.

The supervalence that the object assumes – the breast in this instance, or the nipple – is grounded precisely on the fact that a real object assumes its function as a part of the love object. It takes on its signification qua symbolic and, as a real object, becomes part of the symbolic object. The drive aims at the real object as a part of the symbolic object. It is on this basis that any understanding of oral absorption, of the mechanism of so-called regressive oral absorption that can intervene in any love relation, becomes possible. Once a real object that satisfies a real need has become an element of the symbolic object, any other object that can satisfy a real need can come in its stead, and first in line is the one that is already symbolised but which is also perfectly materialised, namely speech.

To the extent that oral regression to the primal object of devoration comes to compensate for the frustration of love, this reaction of incorporation imparts its model, its cast, its Vorbild, to the kind of incorporation that is the incorporation of certain words among others, which lies at the origin of the early shaping of what is known as the superego. What the subject incorporates under the name of the superego is something analogous to the object of need, not in the sense that it would itself be the gift but in that it is the substitute for the failing of the gift, which is really not the same thing.

It is on this basis, too, that the fact of possessing or not possessing a penis can take on a double meaning and enter the subject's imaginary economy by two paths that are initially very different. First, the penis can, at a given moment, locate its object somewhere in the lineage and the stead of the object that is the breast or the nipple. It is thus an oral form of the incorporation of the penis that plays its role in determining certain symptoms and functions. But there is another way in which the penis enters the imaginary economy. It can enter not as an object that compensates for the frustration of love, but as what lies beyond the love object and which the love object lacks.

Let's call the first one the penis. With all it entails, even so, it is an imaginary function in that it is incorporated imaginarily. The other one is the phallus inasmuch as the mother lacks it and it lies beyond her and her power of love.

It is with respect to this missing phallus that I've been posing you the question, since the start of this year's seminar – at what moment does the subject discover this lack? When and how does he make this discovery in such a way that he can find himself committed to substituting himself for it, that is to say, to choosing a different path in the re-finding of the love-object that slips away, by himself bringing in his own lack?

This distinction is crucial, and it will enable us today to set down a first sketch of what is more or less requisite for this temporal phase to come about.

We have symbolic structuration and possible introjection, which as such is the most characteristic form of primal identification that Freud posited. It is in a second temporal phase that Verliebtheit occurs. This Verliebtheit is absolutely inconceivable, it cannot be articulated anywhere, except in the register of the narcissistic relationship, in other words in the specular relationship, such as I have defined and articulated it.

I remind you that this occurs at a date that can be isolated. Of necessity, it cannot be before the sixth month. Sometime thereafter, this relationship with the image of the other comes about, insomuch as this image affords the subject the matrix around which can be organised what I called his incomplétude vécue, his lived experience of incompleteness, of the fact that he is wanting. He realises that he is lacking something in relation to the image that presents itself as total, not only as fulfilling, but also as a source of jubilation for him. It is in so far as there is a specific relationship between man and his image, in so far as the imaginary comes into play, that upon the foundation of these first two symbolic relationships between the object and the mother it will become apparent that both he and his mother lack something imaginarily. It is in the specular relationship that the subject has had the experience and the apprehension of a possible lack, the apprehension that something that lies beyond can exist and that this is a lack.

Therefore, it is only beyond the narcissistic realisation, and to the extent that these tense and deeply aggressive comings and goings start to be organised, around which the successive layers of what will constitute the ego will crystallise and form a kernel, that there can be an introduction of what leads to the appearance, for the subject, beyond what he constitutes for the mother as an object, of the impression that either way the object of love is itself caught, captured, withheld in something that he, as an object, does not manage to reach, namely a yearning that bears on the mother's own lack.

In fact, at the point we've reached, all of this hinges on the effect of transmission whereby we suppose – because experience forces this upon us and because Freud adhered to this completely, right through to the last of his formulations – that no satisfaction by any real object whatsoever that comes to replace it will ever manage to fill this lack in the mother. Alongside the relationship with the child, the lack of the phallus remains as a point of attachment of her insertion in the imaginary. It is only after the second phase of imaginary specular identification with the body image as such, which lies at the origin of the ego and which provides its matrix, that the child, the subject, can gain access to what the mother lacks. But the precondition for this is the specular experience of the other as forming a totality in relation to which he is the one who can lack something, because the subject broaches, beyond the object of love, the lack for which he can be led to substitute himself. He can propose himself as the object that will fill this lack.

I have led you today as far as the presentation of a form that you must simply hold in your minds so that we can pick up from the same spot next time. To what does this form correspond? What you can see drawn up here is a new dimension, a new property, of what is given in the actual state of the subject once he has completed this process and the functions of superego, Ego-ideal and ego have been differentiated. It's a matter of knowing, as Freud puts it very well at the end of his article, what is meant by this object coming to position itself either in the place of the ego or in the place of the Ego-ideal.

In what I have thus far explained about narcissism I have had to stress the shaping of the Ego-ideal – I mean, the shaping of the ego insomuch as it is an ideal shaping and insomuch as it is from the Ego-ideal that the ego is detached. I have not sufficiently articulated the difference between them. However, if you simply look into Freud, with his fruitful obscurities and his diagrams that pass from hand to hand without anyone deigning for an instant to reproduce them, what do you find in the one that he offers us at the end of this chapter?

Freud's Graphische Darstellung

Here [on the central vertical axis] is where he places the egos of the different subjects. It's a matter of knowing why different subjects are in communion with the same ideal. He explains that there is an identification between the Ego-ideal and all these objects that are supposed to be the same. Yet when we look at the diagram we notice that he has taken care to link these three objects, which may be supposed to be the same, to an external object that lies behind them. Can you not see that this bears a glaring resemblance to what I've been trying to explain to you? Regarding the Ichideal, it's not merely a matter of an object but indeed of something that lies beyond the object and which comes to be reflected, as Freud says, not purely and simply in the ego – which doubtless feels something of this and can be impoverished by it – but rather in something that lies in the ego's very footings, in its first requirements and, to spell it right out, upon the first veil that is projected in the form of the Ego-ideal.

Next time I will be picking up from where I've left off today, with the relation between the Ego-ideal, the fetish, and the object qua missing object, that is to say, the phallus.

I intend today to take up the terms with which I've been trying to formulate the necessary revision of the notion of frustration. Indeed, without this revision it is quite possible that the gap will continue to grow between the dominant theories in psychoanalysis today – what are called the current proclivities of psychoanalysis – and Freudian doctrine. As you know, in my view Freud's doctrine constitutes nothing less than the only accurate conceptual formulation of the practice that this very same doctrine founded.

What I am going to try to spell out today might be a little more algebraic than usual, but everything we have done so far has paved the way for it.

Before we set off again, let's punctuate what has been brought out by certain terms that we have been led to voice here.

I have tried to locate frustration for you on the three-tier chart between castration, which Freud's doctrine took as its point of departure, and privation, to which certain authors refer it. Let's say that they have referred privation to castration in various ways.

Psychoanalysis today has been putting frustration right at the heart of all these failings that are purportedly marked out in their analysable consequences, in the symptoms properly speaking that fall in our remit. We need to understand frustration so that we can turn it to valid use, because, to be sure, if the problem of analytic experience has brought it to the forefront of the terms in use, this cannot be entirely without reason. While its prevalence does not substantially modify the economy of our thought as a whole in the presence of neurotic phenomena, it does nevertheless lead it in some respects into dead-ends. This is indeed what I've been endeavouring to demonstrate, I hope with success, using a number of examples. The further you venture into the analytic literature with an open eye, the more you will see these dead-ends being demonstrated.

Let's posit here at the outset that frustration is not the refusing of an object of satisfaction in the pure and simple sense. Satisfaction means the satisfying of a need. I don't have to insist on this point.

On the whole, when one speaks in terms of frustration, one is using the word without reading more into it. We have frustrating experiences and we think they leave traces. We simply forget that for things to be so simple an explanation would have to be found for how the desire that would supposedly have been frustrated might correspond to the distinctive property that Freud accentuates so firmly from the time of his very first writings, namely that desire in the repressed unconscious is indestructible. I've been indicating to you how the entire development of his life's work is undertaken to examine this riddle.

This property is strictly inexplicable within the perspective of need alone. Any experience we might have of what goes on in an animal economy shows us this. The frustration of a need must entail various modifications that are bearable for the organism to a greater or lesser extent, but certainly if there is one thing that experience confirms, it's that frustration cannot give rise to the maintaining of desire as such. Either the individual succumbs or the desire alters or wanes. Either way, no coherence whatsoever is imposed between frustration and the permanence of desire, even its insistence, to employ the term I was led to foreground when we were speaking about Wiederholungszwang, the automatism of repetition.

Furthermore, Freud never speaks of frustration. He speaks of Versagung, which falls more adequately in line with the notion of reneging, in the sense that one says to renege a treaty, to withdraw from an engagement.[1] This is so true that one can even on occasion place Versagung on the opposite side, because the word can mean both pledge and the breaking of a pledge. Very often this is so with these words that carry the prefix Ver-, which is so essential in German and which has held an eminent place in word-choice in analytic theory.

Let's come straight out with it. The triad frustration / aggression / regression, when it is given like this, is far from having the more or less seductive character of immediately comprehensible signification that is often read into it. One has only to consider it for a moment to notice that in itself it is not comprehensible, and that it raises the question of how comprehensive it is. There is no reason not to offer some other sequence of terms instead. Quite randomly, I could tell you – frustration / depression / contrition. I could invent others. For us, it's a matter of posing the question of the relations between frustration and regression, and this has never been done in a satisfactory way. I wouldn't say that what has been done is false. Rather, I'm saying that it's not satisfactory because the notion of regression is never developed in these efforts.

So, frustration is not the refusing of an object of satisfaction. It hinges on something else. I'm going to content myself with lining up a series of formulas that have already been worked through here, and so I am relatively unburdened from having to prove their worth, save through veiled references. I want to work through a chain in such a way that you will be able to retain its chief points of articulation, so that you can make use of it and see whether these articulations are helpful to you.

Let's move on to the path that consists in taking things up at the start. I'm not saying that this is the start of development, because it doesn't have the character of a development, but rather at the level of the child's primal relation with his mother. Let's say that, originatively, frustration – not just any frustration but a frustration that can be utilised in our dialectic – is thinkable only as the refusing of a gift, in so far as the gift is itself the symbol of something that is called love.

In saying this I'm saying nothing that isn't spelt out in black and white by Freud himself. The fundamental character of the love relation, with all that it entails in and of itself, elaborated not at one remove but twice removed, does not imply merely that one is faced with an object but that one is faced with a being. This is set out by Freud in a number of different passages as the relation that lies at the beginning. What does it mean? It doesn't mean that the child has practised the philosophy of love, that he has made the distinction between love and desire. It means that he is already steeped in the implied existence of the symbolic order. We find evidence of this in his behaviour. Certain things come to pass that are only conceivable if this order is already present.

Here we are faced with an ambiguity that arises from the fact that we have a science that is a science of the subject and not a science of the individual. Yet we succumb to the need to place the subject at the point of departure, forgetting that the subject qua subject cannot be identified with the individual. Even if the subject is detached, as an individual, from the order that concerns him as a subject, this order exists none the less. In other words, the law of intersubjective relationships, given how it profoundly governs the very thing upon which the individual depends, implicates him, whether he is conscious of this or not, as an individual in this order.

Trying to make the image of the father emerge from the child's anxieties in the dark is a desperate attempt that can only be undertaken by pulling strings so conspicuous they fool no one. I'm alluding to Mallet's articles on phobia. I can qualify their outlook as desperate because the order of paternity exists as such. Whether or not the child has experienced such childhood dread, it only takes on its articulated meaning in the intersubjective father/child relationship, which is deeply organised symbolically and forms the subjective context in which the child will have to develop his experience. This experience is taken up from one moment to the next, and retroactively reshaped, by the intersubjective relation in which he engages himself incrementally, taking the bait piece by piece.

I spoke about the gift. In itself the gift implies the full cycle of exchange, and the subject enters this as early as you can imagine. There is a gift only because there is an immense circulation of gifts that covers the entire intersubjective whole. The gift arises from a zone that lies beyond the object relation, precisely because it presupposes behind it the full order of exchange that the child has entered, and it can arise from this beyond-zone only with the character that constitutes it as specifically symbolic. Nothing is a gift unless it has been constituted by the act that cancelled it out or dismissed it beforehand. The gift emerges against a backdrop of revocation, and it is against this backdrop, and as a sign of love that is first annulled so as then to reappear as a pure presence, that the gift is given or not on appeal.

I shall say more here. I've said that the appeal lies on the foremost plane, but recall if you will what I told you when we were dealing with psychosis. I said that the appeal was essential to speech. I would be wrong to stick at this level, because the structure of speech implies in the Other that the subject receives his own message in an inverted form. Here, we are not yet at this level because what is at issue is the appeal. However, already, the appeal cannot be sustained in isolation. Freud's image of the infant with his Fort/Da shows this very well. Already, at the level of the appeal, it has to have its contrary diametrically opposed. Let's call it a marker. It is to the extent that the very thing that is called out for can be rejected that the appeal is already fundamental and foundational in the symbolic order. Either way, the appeal is already a fully engaged introduction into the symbolic order.

When it is not there, the gift manifests itself following the appeal for what is, and when it is there, it manifests itself essentially as the mere sign of the gift, that is to say, as nothing, as no object of satisfaction. It is there precisely to be pushed away in so far as it is this nothing. This symbolic interplay therefore has a fundamentally disappointing character. This is the essential articulation on the basis of which satisfaction itself is situated and takes on its meaning.

I don't mean that the child does not on such occasions obtain the satisfaction that is granted to a pure vital rhythm. I'm saying that any satisfaction that is in question in frustration arises there against the backdrop of the fundamentally disappointing character of the symbolic order. Here, satisfaction is a mere substitute, a compensation. The child quashes, as it were, the disappointing aspect of this symbolic interplay by orally seizing the object of satisfaction, the breast in this instance. What sends him to sleep in this satisfaction is precisely his disappointment, his frustration, the refusal that he has experienced.

The painful dialectic of the object that is both there and never there, in which the subject becomes practised, is symbolised for us in the exercise that is brilliantly seized upon by Freud as the pared-down interplay of what constitutes the backdrop to the subject's relationship with the presence–absence couple. Of course, Freud seizes upon it in its pure state, in its detached form, but he recognises this interplay insomuch as it is absence that constitutes presence. So, in his satisfaction, the child quashes the fundamental unfulfilment of this relationship. He stifles the interplay by grasping the oral object. He quashes what arises from this fundamentally symbolic relationship.

From this point forth, there is nothing astonishing for us in the fact that it is in sleep that the persistence of his desire on the symbolic plane should manifest itself. I will add here how even the child's desire in the dream is never tied to a pure and simple natural satisfaction. You can see this in the dream of the young Anna Freud, which is claimed to be exceedingly straightforward. She says – stwawbewwies, pudden, etc. These objects are all transcendental objects. They have already entered the symbolic order to such an extent that they are all forbidden objects. Nothing obliges us to think that the young Anna was unfulfilled that evening, quite the contrary. What is maintained in the dream as a desire – certainly one that is expressed undisguisedly, but with the full transposition of the symbolic order – is desire of the impossible.

And if you might still be in doubt as to whether speech plays an essential role here, I will point out to you that had the young Anna

Freud not voiced this in words, we would never have known a thing about it.

Let's pursue now the dialectic of frustration and ask what happens when the satisfaction of need comes into play and replaces symbolic satisfaction.

Due to the very fact that it is substituted for symbolic satisfaction, this satisfaction of need itself undergoes a transformation. When the real object itself becomes a sign in the demand for love, that is to say, in the symbolic plea, it brings about an immediate transformation. What is this transformation? Given that I've been telling you that the real object here takes on the value of a symbol, I could tell you that it has thereby become a symbol, or almost become one, but to do so would be a sheer sleight of hand. What takes on a symbolic accent and value is the activity, the mode of apprehension, that puts the child in possession of the object.

This is how orality becomes what it is. Being an instinctual mode of hunger, it is the vehicle of a libido that maintains one's body, but that's not all it is. Freud wonders about this libido, asking whether it is the libido of vital preservation or sexual libido. Of course, in itself it is the former, and this is even what implicates destrudo, but it is precisely because it has entered this dialectic of substituting satisfaction for the demand for love that it is indeed an eroticised activity. It is libido in the strict sense, and it is sexual libido.

All this is not merely some nugatory rhetorical articulation, because it responds to certain objections – and in a different way, in a way that does not evade them – voiced by people who are certainly not especially astute, regarding certain analytic remarks on the eroticisation of the breast. One such objector is Charles Blondel. In the most recent issue of Les Études philosophiques, dedicated to the centenary of Freud's birth, Mme Favez-Boutonier quotes Blondel from one of his articles where he says that he's quite prepared to entertain all of this, but still wonders what analysts make of those cases where the child is not suckled at his mother's breast but is instead bottle-fed. What I've just structured for you provides a reply precisely to this. Once it has entered the dialectic of frustration, the real object is not in itself irrelevant, but it has no need to be specific. Even if it is not the mother's breast, it will lose nothing of the value of its place in the sexual dialectic, from which emanates the eroticisation of the oral zone. The object is not what plays the essential role here, but rather the fact that the activity has taken on this eroticised function on the plane of desire, and which becomes organised in the symbolic order.

I shall also point out to you in passing that this reaches so far that it is quite possible for the same role to be played when there is no real object whatsoever, because what is at issue here is to give rise to a substitutive satisfaction for symbolic saturation. This and this alone can explain the true function of symptoms like those of anorexia nervosa. I've already[2] told you that anorexia is not a matter of not eating anything, but of eating nothing. I insist – it means to eat nothing. Nothing is precisely something that exists on the symbolic plane. It's not a nicht essen, but a nichts essen. This point is indispensable if one is to understand the phenomenology of anorexia. What is at issue in the detail is that the child eats nothing, which is something other than a negation of activity. From this savoured absence as such, he makes use of what he has in front of him, namely the mother on whom he depends. In virtue of this nothing, he makes her dependent on him. If you do not grasp this, you cannot understand anything, not only about anorexia but about other symptoms besides, and you will make the gravest errors.

So, I have located for you the moment of reversal that brings us into the symbolic dialectic of oral activity. Other types of activity are then seized upon in like fashion in the libidinal dialectic. But this is not all that happens. Conversely, and consequently, at the same time as the symbolic reversal of the substitutive activity is introduced into the real, the mother – who hitherto was the subject of the symbolic demand, the simple locus where presence or absence could manifest itself, which raises the question of the unreality of the primary relationship with the mother – becomes a real being. Since she can endlessly decline, she can literally do anything. As I said, it is at this level – and not at the level of goodness knows what hypothesis of some kind of megalomania, which merely projects onto the child what is in the mind of the analyst – that there appears for the first time the dimension of almightiness, Wirklichkeit, which in German means what is really and effectively so. The essential effectiveness initially presents as the almightiness of the real being upon whom the gift or the non-gift depend, absolutely and with no recourse.

I'm telling you that the mother is primordially all-powerful, and that this cannot be eliminated from this dialectic if we are to understand anything worthwhile. It's one of its essential conditions. I'm not telling you, as does Mrs Melanie Klein, that the mother contains everything. That is another matter, to which I'm alluding only in passing. I will note, however, that we are now afforded a glimpse of how all the primitive phantasmatic objects can be found gathered together in the immense container of the maternal body. Mrs Klein has always shown us quite wonderfully that this is possible, but she has always been in a great bind when it comes to explaining how it is possible, and her opponents have not held back from arguing as much in order to say that she is surely daydreaming. For sure, she has been daydreaming, and she has been quite right to, because the fact is possible only through a retroactive projection of the whole gamut of imaginary objects into the heart of the maternal body. But these objects really are there, because the mother constitutes a virtual field of symbolic annihilation, from which each of the objects to come will in turn draw their symbolic value. If we simply take the subject at a slightly more advanced level, for example a child at around two years of age, it is not surprising in the least that Mrs Klein should find here objects that are re-projected retroactively. And one can say in a certain sense that, just like all the others, since they were ready to appear there one day, they were indeed already there.

So, we find ourselves before a point at which the child is faced with the presence of maternal almightiness. Since we are on Mrs Melanie Klein's level, you will note that if I have just alluded briefly to what can be called the paranoid position, which is what she herself terms it, we are already at the level of maternal almightiness in what is suggested to us as constitutive of the depressive position, because, faced with this almightiness, we may suspect that there is something that cannot be unrelated to the relationship to almightiness, this kind of annihilation, this kind of micromania, which, contrary to megalomania, takes shape, according to what she tells us, at this stage. Clearly we should not go too quickly, because this is not given in itself by the mere fact that the mother who emerges as almighty is real. For the real almightiness to generate a depressive effect in the subject he still has to be able to reflect upon himself and upon the contrast with his own powerlessness. Clinical experience allows us to locate the thereabouts of this point at around the sixth month, the same that Freud picked out, and when the phenomenon of the mirror stage is already being produced.

You will object that I taught that when the subject is able to grasp his own body in its totality, in its specular reflection, this total other in which he completes himself and presents himself to himself, it is rather a sense of triumph that he feels. Indeed, this is something that we reconstructed, and not without experiential confirmation. The jubilatory character of this encounter was not in doubt. But there are two things here that we must not conflate.

On the one hand there is the experience of mastery, which will impart to the child's relation with his own ego an utterly essential element of splitting, of being distinct from himself, and which will last until the end. On the other hand there is the encounter with the reality of the master. Insomuch as the form of mastery is given to him in the shape of a totality that is alienated from his own self, though closely bound to him and dependent upon him, there is jubilation, but it's a different matter once this form has been given and he encounters the reality of the master. This is when the moment of his triumph bespeaks also his defeat. When he finds himself in the presence of this totality in the shape of the mother's body, he is forced to observe that it doesn't obey him. Therefore, it is in so far as the reflected specular structure of the mirror stage comes into play that we can conceive of maternal almightiness as being reflected upon solely from a distinctly depressive position, namely the child's sense of powerlessness.

It is here that we can insert what I was alluding to earlier in anorexia. We could go a little quickly and say that the only power the subject wields against almightiness is to say no at the level of action and to bring in the dimension of negativism, which of course is not unrelated to the moment I'm driving at. Nevertheless, I will note that experience shows us, and surely not without reason, that resistance to almightiness in the relationship of dependence does not develop at the level of action or in the form of negativism, but rather at the level of the object insomuch as it has appeared to us under the sign of the nothing. It is at the level of the annulled object qua symbolic object that the child holds his dependence in check, and precisely by feeding on nothing. It is here that he turns his relation of dependence around, making himself by this means the master of the almightiness that is so eager to keep him alive, he who is initially the dependent one. From this point forward, the almightiness becomes answerable to his desire. It is blown wide open by a show of his capriciousness and is henceforth at the mercy of his own almightiness.

So, we do indeed need to be clear in our minds about how the symbolic order is, as it were, the necessary breeding ground on which the first imaginary relationship can come into play, on which the projection of a contrary can be played out in full.

To illustrate this now in psychological terms – but which amount to no more than a downgrading alongside the exposé I've just given – the intentionality of love constitutes very early on, prior to any beyond-zone with respect to the object, a fundamental symbolic structuration that it is impossible to conceive of if we do not posit the symbolic order itself as already established and present. Experience shows us this. Quite early on Mrs Susan Isaacs noted that from a very tender age a child can distinguish between a scolding and an accidental knock. Even before a word is uttered, the child does not react to an inadvertent bump in the same way as to a slap.

I'll leave you to reflect on what this implies. You will tell me that, curiously enough, it's the same with animals, at least with pets. You would be raising an objection that I believe can easily be overturned, but which perhaps could be used as a counterargument. Indeed, this proves that the animal is able to accede to this sort of sketching out of a beyond-zone that brings him into highly particular relations with his master. Yet it is precisely because, unlike mankind, the animal is not inserted in an order of language with his whole being that this yields nothing further in the animal. The animal does, however, manage something as developed as telling the difference between some unintended whack on the back and being beaten.

Since for the time being it's a matter of sharpening the contours, you might have seen the journal that came out in December 1956 as the fourth number of volume 37 of the International Journal of Psychoanalysis. It looks as though they told themselves that, after all, there is something to this thing called language, and it looks like a few people were solicited to respond to the call. I'm basing myself on the article by Mr Loewenstein, which betrays a certain cautious distance, not without competence, that consists in calling to mind how Ferdinand de Saussure taught that there is a signifier and signified. In short, Loewenstein shows that he's a little abreast of what's going on, but this is absolutely devoid of any links with our experience here, save for underscoring that one ought to think about what one says. So, remaining at this level of development, I can forgive him for not citing my teaching, because we've gone a great deal further.

There is also in the same issue an article by Mr Charles Rycroft, who on behalf of the Londoners tries to put a bit more into it, that is, to tell us what we're doing, the analytic theory of the intra-psychical agencies and their articulations one with the other. Perhaps we ought not to forget, says the author, that communication theory exists. We are reminded that when a child cries out, this can be regarded as a total situation that encompasses the mother, the cry, and the child. Consequently, we find ourselves fully in communication theory – the child cries out and the mother receives his cry as a sign-stimulus of need. If we could only take this as our point of departure, says the author, perhaps we might manage to reorganise our experience.

This is absolutely not how things are in what I have been teaching you. The cry that is at stake is a cry that already, as is shown by what Freud highlights in the child's manifestation, is not taken as a signal. It is already a call inasmuch as it calls for a reply. It calls out, if I may say so, against the backdrop of a response. The cry is produced in a state of affairs where not only is language set in place for the child, but indeed he is steeped in a language-environment and is capable of seizing upon and voicing his first scraps of language as an alternating pair.

The Fort/Da is utterly essential. It's a cry, but the cry that is at issue here, the one that we take into account in frustration, is inserted into a synchronic world of cries that are organised in a symbolic system. The cries are already virtually organised in a symbolic system. The human subject is not merely conversant with the cry as something that on each occasion signals an object. Indeed it is perverted, deceptive, and wrong to pose the question in terms of a sign when the symbolic system is at issue, because from the very first the child issues his cry for someone to take it into account, and even for someone to have to account for it to someone else. You need only observe the interest that the child takes in receiving these moulded and voiced cries that we call language, and the interest he takes in the system of language for its own sake. The model gift is precisely the gift of speech, because here the gift is indeed equal in its principle. From the very first, the child feeds on words as much as on bread. As the Gospel says, Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man; but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man.

You have noticed the following – or more precisely, you didn't notice it but I insist on underscoring it for you so as to bring this to a close – the term regression can have a repercussion here that is different from how it usually appears. The term regression is applicable to what happens when the real object, and by the same stroke the activity that is exerted to secure it, comes to be substituted for the symbolic demand. When I said that the child quashes his disappointment in his saturation and his unfulfilment by the contact with the breast, or with whichever other object, what is strictly speaking at stake is what will enable him to enter the necessity of the mechanism. This means that a symbolic frustration can always be followed by, can always open the door to, regression.

We need to make a jump now.

It would be quite artificial if we were to make do with the remark that, based on this opening that has been made for the signifier by the entry of the imaginary, everything else from here on in is plain sailing. Indeed, with all the relationships that will now be established with the subject's own body, through the intermediary of the specular relationship, you can see very well how the advent of the signifier can come into play for each of the body's appurtenances. That excrement should become the choice object for the gift during a certain period should certainly come as no surprise to us because it's quite obvious that the child can on occasion find the real in a ready state to feed the symbolic in the material that is available to him in relation to his body. That retention can occasionally become refusal should not surprise us either. Whatever richness and refinement the analytic experience has uncovered in the phenomena of anal symbolism, this doesn't lead us to dwell on it at any length.

If I spoke of making a jump, it's because it's now a matter of seeing how the phallus is brought into the dialectic of frustration.

Once again, please abstain from pointless demands bearing on natural genesis. If you want to deduce the fact that the phallus plays an absolutely supervalent role across the entire genital aspect of the symbolic from something in the makeup of the genital organs, you will simply never manage. You will merely surrender to the very contortions that I hope to be able to show you in detail, those of Dr Ernest Jones when he tries to offer a satisfactory commentary on the phallic phase, which Freud had asserted in a rough-and-ready way, and tries to show us how it is that the phallus that woman doesn't have can assume such importance for her. It's really very strange to behold.

In truth, the question absolutely does not lie here. The question is first and foremost a question of fact. It's a fact. Had we not uncovered, in the phenomena, this supervalence and pre-eminence of the phallus across the entire imaginary dialectic that governs the misadventures, the mishaps, and also the failures and breakdowns of genital development, there wouldn't be any problem.

There can be no doubting that it's quite needless to tire oneself out, as many have, observing that the female child must surely have little sensations in her tummy too, and an experience that is surely distinct from the boy's. As Freud notes, this is not the question. Moreover, this is utterly self-evident because if woman, by her own admission, finds it much harder than the boy to bring the reality of what happens on the side of the uterus or the vagina into a dialectic of desire that would satisfy her, it's because she has to pass through something to which she has a completely different relation from that of the man, namely the thing she lacks, the phallus. But the reason why things are like this is certainly not to be gathered, in any case whatsoever, from anything that originates in any physiological leaning of either of the two sexes. One has to start with the existence of an imaginary phallus.

The imaginary phallus is the pivotal point in a whole series of facts that require it as a postulate. One has to study this labyrinth in which the subject generally loses his way, and in which he can even wind up being devoured. The thread that leads out of it is provided by the fact that what is to be discovered is that the mother lacks the phallus, that it is because she lacks it that she desires it, and that it is only insomuch as something gives it to her that she can be satisfied.

This might appear, quite literally, stupefying. Well, we have to start with this stupefaction. The first virtue of cognisance is to be capable of confronting what is not self-evident. All the same, we have perhaps been somewhat prepared to accept that lack is the main desire here if we accept that this is also the distinguishing feature of the symbolic order. In other words, it is in so far as the imaginary phallus plays a major signifying role that the situation presents in this way. It's not that each subject invents the signifier in accordance with his or her sex and his or her leanings or frolickings at birth. The signifier exists. That the phallus as signifier plays a subjacent role cannot be doubted. It took analysis to discover it, but it's absolutely essential.

Let's leave for a moment the terrain of analysis to take up a question I put to Monsieur Lévi-Strauss, the author of Elementary Structures of Kinship. He sets out the dialectic of the exchange of women down through the lineages. By means of a sort of postulate and choice, he sets out how women are exchanged between generations. I have taken a woman from one line, I owe another woman to a following generation or to another line. And so there is a moment when this must come to a close. If this is done through the law of exchange and preferential marriages between cross cousins, things will circulate with great regularity in a circle that will have no reason to close or break, but if this is done with what are known as parallel cousins this can give rise to things that are rather awkward because after a while the exchange starts to converge and to produce cracks and fragments in the lineages. So, I asked Lévi-Strauss, what if you were to describe this circle of exchange by turning it around, to say that the female lineages produce men and exchange them between one another? For, in the end, we are already aware that the lack that we have been speaking about in women is not a real lack. Everyone knows that they can have phalli, and what is more they produce them. They beget boys, phallophores. As a consequence, one may describe the exchange down through the generations in a more straightforward way, in the opposite order. One can imagine a matriarchy whose law would be – I've given a son, I shall now receive a man.[3] formalisation one could doubtless describe things in exactly the same way, symmetrically, by taking a reference axis, a system of coordinates founded on women or founded on men, but then a heap of items would remain inexplicable and in particular the following. In every case where the political power is androcentric, even in matriarchal societies, it is represented by men and by male lineages. Very peculiar anomalies in these exchanges – a modification, an exception, or a paradox that might appear in the laws of exchange at the level of the elementary structures of kinship – can be explained only in relation and reference to something that lies outside the interplay of kinship, and this is the political context, that is to say, the order of power, and very precisely the order of the signifier, the order in which sceptre and phallus merge into one.

It is for reasons that are inscribed into the symbolic order, which transcends individual development, that the fact of having or not having the imaginary and symbolised phallus takes on the economic importance that it holds at the level of the Oedipus complex. This is what explains both the importance of the castration complex and the primacy of the infamous fantasies of the phallic mother, which has been creating the problem you know about for as long as it has been on the analytic horizon.

Before leading you into how the dialectic of the phallus is articulated, completed and resolved at the level of the Oedipus complex, I want to show you that I too can remain for a while in the preoedipal stages, on the sole condition of being led by the guiding thread of the fundamental role of the symbolic relationship.

What role does the phallus play at the level of its imaginary function, at the level of the claimed requirement of a phallic mother? I want to show you once again how absolutely essential this notion of the lack of object is, just by reading the decent analyst-authors, among whom I include Karl Abraham.

In an admirable article from 1920 on Manifestations of the Female Castration Complex, Abraham gives us the example, on page 341, of a little girl of two.[4] After coffee-time, she goes to her father's cigar box, takes a first cigar and gives it to her father, takes a second and gives it to her mother, who doesn't smoke, then takes a third and places it between her legs. Her mother put the three cigars back in the box. It is not by chance that the girl waited a little while and then played the same game over again. This comes to just the right place. I regret that the commentary is not spelt out further, because if we accept that the third move indicates that the young girl lacks this symbolic object, which is what Abraham implicitly admits, she thereby manifests this lack and it is no doubt in this capacity that she first gave it to he who does not lack, thereby showing she who does lack, namely her mother, what to do with it. The girl marks out very well how she can desire it, as experience proves, in order to satisfy the one who lacks it. If you read Freud's article on Female Sexuality, you learn that for the young girl it's not simply a matter of lacking the phallus, but of giving it or its equivalent to her mother, just as the boy wants to.

I'm recalling this vignette simply by way of an introduction to what you need to represent in your own minds, which is the fact that nothing is conceivable in the phenomenology of the perversions – I mean in a direct way – if you don't start with the idea that what is involved is the phallus. This is a far simpler idea than what is usually given to you in that kind of obscurity of identifications, re-entifications, and projections all enmeshed into a labyrinth where you lose your way. It's a matter of the phallus and of seeing how the child realises, more or less consciously, that his all-powerful mother is fundamentally in want of something. The question is always to see by what path he will give her this object that she is in want of, and which he himself is forever in want of.

Indeed, let's not forget that the young boy's phallus is not a great deal more robust than the young girl's. Naturally the finer authors spotted this, and Dr Jones realised all the same that Mrs Karen Horney was rather favourable to the one with whom he was in conflict, in this instance Freud. The fundamentally deficient character of the little boy's phallus, even the shame that he can feel about it, his keen sense of insufficiency, is something that she was able to stress very firmly, not as a way of trying to bridge the gulf of difference that lies between the young boy and the young girl, but as a way of clarifying one through the other. In this light, in order to understand the exact value of the little boy's attempts at seducing his mother, let's not forget the importance of what he discovers on his own person. These attempts at seduction, which people are still speaking about, are deeply marked by narcissistic conflict. This is always the occasion of the first narcissistic wounds, which are merely preludes here, and even presuppositions, with regard to the later effects of castration. They still need to be looked at, though. Rather than mere sexual drive or aggression, what is ultimately at issue is the fact that the boy wants to make-believe that he is a male or a bearer of the phallus, when he is only half way to being one.

In other words, what is involved throughout the whole preoedipal period in which the perversions find their point of origin is a game that is kept up, a game of hunt-the-ring or find-the-Lady, or even our game of odds-and-evens, where the phallus is fundamental as a signifier in this imaginary of the mother that it's a question of joining, because the child's ego is reliant on the mother's almightiness. It's a matter of seeing where it is and where it is not. It is never truly there where it is, and it is never altogether absent where it is not. The classification of the perversions as a whole must encompass this. Irrespective of the worth of some contributions on identification with the mother and identification with the object, and so on, what is essential is the relation to the phallus.

Take for example transvestism. In transvestism the subject calls the phallus into question. People forget that transvestism is not merely a matter of homosexuality more or less transposed, nor is it a matter of fetishism particularised, a fetish that is worn by the subject. As Fenichel shows very well in his article The Psychology of Transvestism, which came out in 1930 in the eleventh issue of The International Journal of Psychoanalysis, the woman with whom the transvestist identifies himself is conceived of by him as phallic. However, she has a phallus in so far as it is hidden, and here we can see that the phallus must always partake of something that veils it. The essential importance of what I called the veil, the existence of garments, lies in the fact that it is through them that the object is materialised. Even when the real object is there, one has to be able to think that it may not be there. And it always has to be possible that it is thought to be precisely where it is not.

Likewise, in male homosexuality – to confine ourselves to this for today – what is at stake for the subject is still his phallus but, curiously, it is in so far as he will seek out his own phallus in another party.

To spell it right out, all the perversions can be placed within this measure, where they always play from some angle with the significant object insomuch as it is, in itself and by its very nature, a true signifier, that is to say, something that in no case whatsoever can be taken at face value. And when one does get one's hand on it, when one finds it and attaches oneself to it definitively, as is the case in the perversion of all perversions known as fetishism – for this is the one that shows not only where it truly lies, but also what it is – the object is tantamount to exactly nothing. It's just a worn-out garment, a cast-off rag. A part of this fetishism can be seen in transvestism, where at the end of the day it's just a tatty old shoe.

When it does appear, when it is unveiled for real, it is the fetish. What does this mean? It's that the crucial stage stands just before the Oedipus complex. It stands between the first relationship that was my point of departure today and which I have grounded for you, namely the primary relationship of frustration, and the Oedipus complex. It's the stage at which the child engages in the dialectic of the lure. To satisfy what cannot be satisfied, namely the mother's desire, which in its very fundament is unfulfillable, the child commits, by whichever path, to the route of making himself a deceptive object. I mean that it's a matter of tricking this desire that cannot be fulfilled. It is very precisely to the extent that he shows his mother that he is not, that the whole movement from which the ego derives its stability is constructed.

The most characteristic stages have now been marked by the fundamental ambiguity between subject and object, as Freud showed in his final article, on splitting. It is to the extent that the child turns himself into an object meant to trick, that he finds himself committed to a position vis-à-vis the other where the intersubjective relationship has been fully constituted. This is not merely a sort of immediate lure, as can be produced in the animal kingdom where the one that is decked out in all the colours of display has to establish the whole situation by parading around. On the contrary, the subject supposes desire in the other. What has to be satisfied is a desire at one remove, and since it's a desire that cannot be satisfied, one can only trick it.

It is always overlooked how human exhibitionism is not an exhibitionism like others, like that of the robin redbreast, for instance. It involves opening one's trouser fly then closing it again. If there are no trousers then a dimension of exhibitionism is missing.

We also meet the possibility of regression. The unfulfilled and unsatisfied mother around whom the child ascends the upward slope of his narcissism is someone real. She is right there, and like all other unfulfilled creatures, she is in search of what she can devour, quaerens quem devoret. What the child once found as a means of quashing the symbolic unfulfilment is what he may possibly find across from him again as a wide-open maw. We also find this projected image of the oral situation at the level of imaginary sexual satisfaction. The gaping hole of the Medusa's head is a devouring figure that the child encounters as a possible outcome of his search to satisfy his mother.

To be devoured is a grave danger that our fantasies reveal to us. We find it at the origin, and we find it again at this turn in the path where it yields us the essential form in which phobia presents.

We find it again when we look at the fears of little Hans. The case now presents with somewhat greater clarification with respect to one of its conditions. With the support of what I have shown you today, you will better see the relationships between phobia and perversion. Furthermore, you will better see what I indicated last time, namely the function of the Ego-ideal that takes shape against this backdrop. I shall go so far as to say that you will interpret the case better than did Freud himself, because there is a wavering in the observation over how what the child calls the big giraffe and the little giraffe ought to be identified.

As Monsieur Prévert has put it,

Les grandes girafes sont muettes
Les petites girafes sont rares.

While this is very poorly interpreted in the observation, there is nevertheless an inroad to what is at stake. Isn't it clear enough from the simple fact that little Hans crumples the little giraffe and sits on top of it, in spite of the cries of the big giraffe who is incontestably the mother?

Last time, we tried to spell out afresh the notion of castration, or at the very least how this concept is used in our practice.[1]

In the second part of the lesson I pinpointed the locus at which the imaginary comes to interfere in the relationship of frustration that unites the child to his mother, this relationship being vastly more complex than the use that has on the whole been made of it. I told you that it was only in an apparent way, and in keeping with the requirements of its expounding, that we found ourselves thereby moving backwards, depicting a sort of succession of stages that would follow on in a line of development, because, quite to the contrary, it's always a matter of grasping what at each stage intervenes from the outside, retroactively to reorganise what had been initiated at the previous stage. This is for the simple reason that the child is not alone. The fact that he is not alone is due not only to his biological surroundings but also to surroundings that are of far greater import, namely the lawful environment, the symbolic order. As I underscored last time, the particularities of the symbolic order are what impart accentuation and supervalence to the element of the imaginary known as the phallus.

So, this is the point we reached, and to open the third part of my exposé I set you on the trail of little Hans's anxiety, since from the first we have been singling out two exemplary objects, the fetish object and the real object.

It is at the level of little Hans that we are going to try to articulate today's remarks.

This will not be an attempt to rearticulate the notion of castration, because goodness knows it was powerfully and insistently articulated by Freud, but simply to speak about it once more because for as long as people have avoided speaking about it, the use and reference that can be drawn from it have become increasingly rare in the observations.

To tackle this notion of castration today, we need only follow the same line as our disquisition last time.

What is at issue at the end of the preoedipal phase, on the cusp of the Oedipus complex?

The child has to take the phallus on board as a signifier, and in a way that turns it into the instrument of the symbolic order of exchange that presides over the constitution of lineages. All told, he has to be confronted with the order that, in the Oedipus complex, will make the function of the father the pivotal point of the drama.

This is not so straightforward. At the very least, I have thus far told you enough about it for it to strike a chord with you when I tell you that it's not so straightforward. The function of existence on the symbolic plane in the signifier Father, with everything that this term entails that is so deeply problematic, raises the question of the way in which it has come to the centre of the symbolic organisation.

This gives us to think that we shall have a few questions to ask ourselves regarding the three aspects of the paternal function.

During the first year of our seminars, when the second semester was dedicated to the study of the Wolf Man, we learnt to single out the paternal repercussions in the conflict under the threefold heading of the symbolic father, the imaginary father and the real father. We saw that it was impossible to orient oneself in the Wolf-Man case if one doesn't draw this essential distinction.

Let's try to tackle the point we reached, namely the introduction into the Oedipus complex that arises for the child, in chronological order.

All in all, we saw the child in the luring position that he takes up vis-à-vis his mother. I told you that this is not a lure in which he would be fully implicated. It's not the simple lure of the game of sexual parade, in the ethological sense, where we on the outside can perceive the imaginary elements that captivate one of the partners in virtue of the appearances of the other. In this case, we don't know to what extent the subjects themselves act as a lure, though we do know that we can do so on occasion, presenting a mere coat-of-arms to the desire of the adversary. Here, the lure that is at issue is very sharply delineated in the very actions and activities that we can observe in the young boy. For example, in his seducing of his mother, when he exhibits himself, this is no mere showing. It is the showing of himself by himself to the mother that exists as a third party. And behind the mother looms something that is tantamount to good faith, in which she can be caught, so to speak. This is already an entire intersubjective trinity, even a quaternary, that is taking shape.

What ultimately is at stake in this entry into the Oedipus complex? Well, it's about the subject himself having to be caught in this lure in such a way that he finds himself committed to an existent order, an order that is different from the psychological lure through which he came into it. This is where we left him last time.

While analytic theory ascribes a normalising function to the Oedipus complex, we should recall that our experience teaches us that this normalising function is not enough to culminate in the fact of the subject making an object-choice. Just as we know that for there to be heterosexual object-choice it is not enough to play by the rules of being heterosexual, so do we know that there are all shapes and sizes of apparent heterosexuality. Sometimes the candidly heterosexual relationship can harbour an atypical positioning that will come to light through analytic investigation as being derived from a clearly homosexualised position, for instance. So, after the Oedipus complex, the subject, boy or girl, must not only arrive at heterosexuality but also reach it in such a way as to situate him- or herself in the proper manner in relation to the function of the Father. This lies at the heart of the whole Oedipal problematic.

We indicated on our inroad into object relations, and Freud spells it out expressly in his 1931 article on Female Sexuality, that taken from this angle, and from the preoedipal angle, the woman's problematic is much simpler.[2] While it can appear far more complicated in Freud's writings, this is consistent with the order of discovery. He discovered the Oedipus complex before he uncovered what is preoedipal, and indeed how could he have done otherwise? If there is something that is preoedipal, it's because first of all the Oedipus complex has been posited. We can speak of this greater simplicity of the female position on the developmental level that we qualify as preoedipal only because we first know that we are going to arrive at the complex structure of the Oedipus complex.

That said, we are also able to say that, for the woman, the phallus that she has more or less situated and approached in the imaginary – which is where it is to be found, beyond the mother, in the progressive uncovering of the fundamental dissatisfaction that the mother feels in the mother/child relationship – slides into the real. There is a sliding of the phallus from the imaginary to the real. This is what Freud explains when he tells us that in the yearning for the originary phallus, at the imaginary level where it starts to emerge for the young girl in the specular reference to her semblable – another little girl or a little boy – the child will be the substitute for the phallus.

This is actually a somewhat summary way of grasping what occurs in the phenomenon under observation. If you look at the position such as I have drawn it out – here is the imaginary, that is, the mother's desire for the phallus, and here the child, our centre, who has to discover this beyond-zone, this lack in the maternal object – in one of the possible outcomes, from the moment the child becomes the pivotal point of the situation and finds himself saturating it, he gets out of it by conceiving of the possibility of this way out.

What effectively do we find in the young girl's fantasy, and also in the young boy's?

To the extent that the situation pivots around the child, the young girl then finds the real penis right where it is, beyond the child herself, with the one who can give her the child, says Freud, with the father. It is precisely in so far as she does not have it as an appurtenance, and even in so far as she sharply renounces it on this plane, that she will be able to have it as a gift from the father. This is why it is through the relation to the phallus that, as Freud tells us, the young girl enters the Oedipus complex in a straightforward way, as you can see. Thereafter, the phallus will just have to slide from the imaginary to the real by means of a sort of equation. Gleichung is the term that Freud uses in his 1925 article on Some Consequences of the Anatomical Distinction Between the Sexes. He writes, Nun aber gleitet die Libido des Mädchens – man kann nur sagen: längs der vorgezeichneten symbolischen Gleichung Penis = Kind – in eine neue Position. The young girl will have been sufficiently introduced into the Oedipus complex to make this a reality.

I'm not saying that there is not to be a great deal more, including thereafter all the anomalies in the development of female sexuality, but here there is already the fixation upon the father as the bearer of the real penis, as he who can give the child for real. For her this is already of sufficient consistence for it to be said that ultimately the Oedipus complex, as the pathway to integration into the typical heterosexual position, is far more straightforward for the woman, even though it does usher in all sorts of complications and impasses in the development of female sexuality.

Obviously this should not astonish us, insomuch as the Oedipus complex is essentially androcentric or patricentric. This asymmetry calls upon all kinds of particular quasi-historical considerations to make us perceive the supervalence on the sociological and ethnographic plane of the individual experience that Freud's discovery allows us to analyse. Conversely, since I spoke of an ordering, of a symbolic order or a subordinated ordination, it's quite clear that the object of woman's love is the object of the sentiment that is addressed, strictly speaking, to the element of lack in the object. In so far as she has been led to this object, the father, along the path of lack, he becomes the one who gives the object of satisfaction, the object of the natural relationship of childbirth. From this point forward, all it takes is a little patience for the father to be replaced by he who will play exactly the same role, the father's role.

This brings with it a feature that we will be coming back to, and which lends its particular style to the development of the female superego. There is a kind of balance between the renunciation of the phallus and what has quite rightly been called the supervalence of the narcissistic relationship in women's development. Hanns Sachs saw the importance of this very clearly.[3] Indeed, once this renunciation has been made, the phallus is given up as an appurtenance and becomes the appurtenance of the one to whom she now attaches her love, the father from whom she effectively awaits a child. This expectation of what henceforth is for her no less than her due places her in a very peculiar dependence that paradoxically gives rise at one point to specifically narcissistic fixations, as the various authors have noted. Indeed she is the being who is most intolerant of a particular frustration.

We might come back to this later, when we speak about the ideal of monogamy in women.

Furthermore, it is with this simple reduction of the situation, which identifies the object of love with the object that gives satisfaction, that the especially fixed aspect of women's development, and even its precociously arrested aspect, is located in a development that may be qualified as normal. At certain junctures in his writings Freud assumes a peculiarly misogynistic tone, complaining bitterly of how very difficult it is, at least with some female subjects, to get them to shift away from the logic of soup, with dumplings for arguments, from something so imperiously requisite in the satisfaction that they must derive, for example, from their analysis.

I'm doing no more than indicating a certain number of beginnings. We will have to come back to the development that Freud contributed on female sexuality. Today we are going to focus on the boy.

In the case of the boy, the Oedipus complex appears to be far more clearly destined to allow him to identify with his own sex. All in all, it arises in the ideal relationship, in the imaginary relationship with the father. Conversely, the true aim of the Oedipus complex, which is to situate the subject in the right way in relation to the function of the father, that is to say, for him one day to gain access to the altogether paradoxical and problematic position of being a father, presents a mountain of difficulties.

People have not been taking less and less interest in the Oedipus complex because they've failed to see this mountain. It's precisely because they have seen it, and they prefer to turn their backs on it.

Let's not forget that Freud's questioning as a whole, not only in the doctrine but in his very experience, which we find traced out for us in the confidences he shares – his dreams, the progress of his thought, everything that we now know of his life, his habits and even his attitudes at home with his family, which Dr Jones has reported in a way that is fairly thoroughgoing, but of which we may be sure – boils down to the question of what it means to be a father.

This was the central problem for Freud, the productive point from which all his research took its true orientation.

Observe too that while this is a problem for every neurotic, it's also a problem for every non-neurotic in the course of his childhood experience. What is a father? This question is one way of tackling the problem of the signifier of the father, but let's not overlook the fact that in the end they do become fathers. To pose the question What is a father? is something different from being a father oneself, from acceding to the paternal position. Let's look at this more closely.

Even if acceding to this position is an article of faith, a quest, it's not unthinkable to say that, in the end, no one has ever truly been a father through and through.

In this dialectic, we suppose – and this supposition has to be the starting point – that somewhere there is someone who can fully take on the position of the father, someone who can respond, I am the father. This is a supposition that is essential to the whole furtherance of the Oedipal dialectic, but in no way does this settle the question of the particular intersubjective position of the one that fulfils this role for the others, and especially for the child.

So, let's start again with little Hans.

The observation on little Hans is a whole world unto itself. Among the collection of five of Freud's case studies,[4] this is the one I have left until last in the labour of commentary I have been pursuing, and with good reason.

Last time, I left you with the material from the first few pages of the text, and Freud is well justified in presenting things in this order. The question is that of the Wiwimacher, which has been translated [into English] as widdler. When we follow Freud to the letter, the questions that little Hans poses concern not only his widdler but also the widdlers of all living creatures, and especially of those that are bigger than himself.

You have seen the pertinent remarks concerning the sequence in which the child poses his questions. In sequence, he first asks his mother, Have you got a widdler too? We will speak later about what his mother replies, and whereupon Hans utters, I was only just thinking. That is to say, he has been mulling over a good many things. Next he puts the question to his father. Then he delights in seeing the lion's widdler, which is not altogether by chance. And back at this time, that is, prior to the appearance of the phobia, he clearly indicates that if his mother has a widdler, as she asserts to him that she has – not, in my opinion, without impudence – then it ought to be visible. One evening, not long after this questioning, he watches her undressing and remarks I thought you were so big you'd have a widdler like a horse.

The word Vergleichung has been translated [into English] as comparison. We could almost say that the word equalisation would be better in this instance, at the very least in economic terms if not by strict tradition. From the imaginary phallicist perspective, in which we left the subject last time, there is an effort of equalisation between a sort of absolute object, the phallus, and the fact of putting it to the test of the real. It's not a matter of all or nothing, as it was in the game of find-the-Lady or in the game of hide-and-seek where it is never where one is looking and never where it was found. It's a matter now of finding out where it truly is.

Up to this point the child was the one who was affecting a semblance, or who was playing at affecting a semblance. It's not for nothing that, a little further on in the observation, little Hans has a dream – his first account of a dream, we are told by Freud and his parents – in which an element of distortion, a displacement, arises, precisely through the intermediary of a game of forfeits. Moreover, when you follow the whole imaginary dialectic – if you remember how I approached it in the previous lessons – you will be struck by how it is being played out here on the surface at this pre-phobic stage in Hans's development. It's all there, up to and including the fantasmatic children. All of a sudden, after the birth of his little sister, he adopts a bevy of imaginary little girls to whom he does everything that can be done to children. The imaginary game is out in force, almost without intention. It's a matter of bridging the full distance that lies between the one who affects a semblance and the one who knows that he has the power.

What affords us a first approach to the Oedipal relationship? When we look at what is being played out on the plane of this act of comparing, we could conceive of it as the continuation of the game on the plane of the lure, on the imaginary plane, with the child merely subjoining the maternal model to his own dimensions. The image is larger, but essentially homogenous. Yet it still remains that if this is how the dialectic of the Oedipus complex gets under way, then ultimately he will only ever be dealing with a double of himself, an enlarged double. In this introduction, which is perfectly conceivable, of the maternal image in the form of the Ego-ideal, we remain in the imaginary dialectic, in the specular dialectic of the subject's relation to the little other. The inevitable consequence of this does not allow us to get out of the either/or, of the either him or me, that remains bound to the first symbolic dialectic, that of presence or absence. We do not get out of the game of odds-and-evens. We do not leave behind the plane of the lure. What results from this?

We know the answer from the side that is as much theoretical as it is exemplary. The only thing we see coming out of this is the symptom, the manifestation of anxiety. So Freud tells us.

Freud underscores near the start of the observation that, when it comes to anxiety and phobia, there is good reason for keeping the two separate. They are two things that come in succession. One comes to the aid of the other. The phobic object fulfils a function against the backdrop of anxiety. On the imaginary plane, however, nothing enables us to envisage the jump that makes the child shift away from the luring game with his mother. As someone who is all or nothing, the one who suffices or the one who does not suffice, she surely remains on the plane of fundamental insufficiency in virtue of the sole fact that the question has been posed.

This is the first outline of the notion of the entry into the Oedipus complex – the almost fraternal rivalry with the father. We are being led to nuance this far more than in how it is commonly put together. Indeed, the aggressiveness at issue there is an aggressiveness of the type that comes into play in the specular relationship, in the it's either him or me that is always being defined as the fundamental mainspring. On the other hand, the fixation remains wholly attached to she who, after the first frustrations, has become the real object, that is to say, the mother. It is due to this stage, or more precisely to this essential and central Oedipal experience on the imaginary plane, that the Oedipus complex reaches out with all its neurosis-inducing consequences, which can be found in countless aspects of analytic reality.

In particular, it is here that we can see one of the first terms of the Freudian experience making its entry, the debasement in the sphere of love to which Freud devoted a special study. In virtue of the subject's permanent attachment to this real primal object that is the mother qua frustrating mother, any female object will thereafter be no more for him than a depreciated object, a substitute, a broken, refracted and forever partial mode in comparison with the first maternal object. We will be seeing shortly what we ought to think of this.

However, don't forget that while the Oedipus complex can have perdurable consequences with respect to the imaginary mainspring that it causes to intervene, this is not the whole story. As a rule, and from the very first in Freud's doctrine, it is in the nature of the Oedipus complex to resolve itself. When Freud speaks about it, he tells us that surely what we can appreciate concerning the pushing into the background of the hostility against the father is something that we can legitimately link to a repression. But in the same breath, he makes sure to underscore that this is one more opportunity to note that repression is applied always to a particular articulation of the subject's history, and not to a permanent relationship. He says, I see no reason for denying the name of a 'repression', but at this age, between five and five-and-a-half years when the dissolution of the Oedipus complex occurs, it is as a rule equivalent to a destruction and an abolition of the complex. Thus, there is something more in relation to what we have thus far described, and which would in some way be the effacement, the imaginary attenuation, of a relationship that in itself is fundamentally perdurable. There is a veritable crisis, a revolution. There truly is something that leaves a result, this being the shaping of the superego, which is both highly particular and precisely datable in the unconscious.

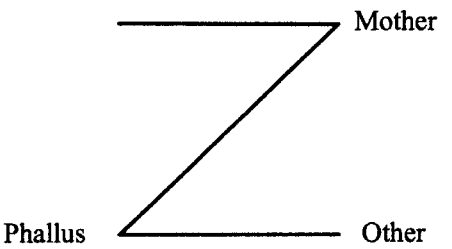
It is here that we come face-to-face with the necessity of bringing out something new and original, and which has its specific solution in the Oedipal relationship. To see this, we need only turn to our usual scheme.

At the point we reached last time, the child was offering the mother the imaginary object of the phallus in order to give her complete satisfaction, and was doing so in the form of a lure, that is to say, by bringing in the Other that is in some way the witness, the one who can behold the situation as a whole. The young boy's exhibitionism to his mother is meaningless without this term. It is implicated by the mere fact that what we describe in the presentation, even in the offering, that the little boy makes to his mother, plainly arises at the level of this Other. This term must be produced at this level for the Oedipus complex to exist. It requires the presence of a term that hitherto was not in the game, the presence of someone who always and in any circumstance is poised to play and to win.



The scheme of the forfeits game is there to show us this, among countless other hints that are there to be read in the observations and which one can see being played out in the child's very activity at this stage. We meet it in umpteen different forms in the case of little Hans, for example in his way of suddenly taking himself off to the wood-cupboard and standing in the darkness. It is his W.C., where previously he was using the family W.C. There is a moment when everything oscillates around this game-playing, with the notion of something that adds the dimension that was to be expected on the plane of the symbolic relationship. What previously, in the broaching of the symbolic relationship, was no more than the calling and the calling back that I spoke about last time, and which characterises the symbolic mother, now becomes the notion that at the level of the big Other there is someone who can respond come what may, and who in every case answers that he is the one who's got the true phallus, the real penis. He is the one who holds the trump card, and who knows it. The introduction of this real element in the symbolic order is the inverse of the first position of the mother that is symbolised in the real by her presence and her absence.

Until then, the object both was and wasn't there. It was with this point that the subject began in relation to any object, namely that an object is both present and absent, and that one can always play with the presence or the absence of an object. After the turning point, however, the object is no longer the imaginary object that he can use in his luring but an object the power of which is always in the hands of an Other, who can show that the subject does not have it or that he has it insufficiently. Castration plays its absolutely essential role throughout his ensuing development solely on the basis of the fact that, in having to take on board the maternal phallus as an essentially symbolic object, in the essential Oedipal experience the child can conceive that this same symbolic object will be given to him one day by the one who has it, who knows that he has it in every instance.

In other words, taking on board the very sign of the virile position, of male heterosexuality, implies castration at its point of departure. This is what Freud's Oedipal notion teaches us. Precisely because the male, contrary to the female position, is already in perfect possession of a natural appendage, he has to have this appurtenance from someone else, in this relationship to something that is real in the symbolic – the one who truly is the father. And in the end no one can say what it means to be the father for real, except that it's something that is already to be found in the game. It's in relation to this game played with the father, this game of loser wins, as it were, that the child can win the faith that leaves him with this first inscription of Law.

What becomes of the subject in this drama?

As it is described for us in the Freudian dialectic, he is a little criminal. It is by the path of the imaginary crime that he enters the realm of Law. But he can enter this realm of Law only if he has had, at least for an instant, a real partner across from him, someone who has effectively brought to this level something that is not merely calling and calling back, that is not merely a pairing of presence and absence, the fundamentally annihilating element of the symbolic, but rather someone who responds to him.

Now, while things may be expressed in this way on the plane of the imaginary drama, it is on the level of the imaginary game that this must be experienced. It is not without reason that no particular dialogue is generated by this requirement of a dimension of absolute alterity, by the one who simply possesses the power and who answers for it. This dimension is incarnated by real protagonists, but they themselves are always dependent upon something that ultimately presents as an eternal alibi. The only one who might respond absolutely from this position of the father qua symbolic father is the one who could say, like the monotheistic God, I AM THAT I AM. But this is a thing that, aside from the sacred text in which we find it, can literally be uttered by no one.

You will tell me then, You have taught us that the message we receive is our own in an inverted form, and so everything will be resolved by – THOU ART THAT THOU ART. Don't believe it, because who am I to say that to anyone else? In other words, what I want to indicate here is that the symbolic father is strictly speaking unthinkable.

The symbolic father is nowhere. He intervenes nowhere.

The proof of this is laid out in Freud's work. It took a mind as bound to the requirements of positivist and scientific thought as was the mind of Freud to produce the construction that Jones reveals he esteemed above all the rest of his life's work. He didn't put it in the front line, because his major work, and the only one – as he affirmed in writing and never went back on – was The Interpretation of Dreams, but the one he held most dear, as an achievement that in his eyes was a feat, is Totem and Taboo. Totem and Taboo is no less than a modern myth, a myth constructed to explain what remained as a gaping hole in his doctrine, namely, Where is the father?

You need only read Totem and Taboo with an open eye to realise that if it is not what I say it is – a myth – then it's quite absurd. However, if Totem and Taboo is designed to tell us that there are such things as fathers who linger on, then the true father, the only father, the one and only father from before the dawn of history, has to be the dead father. Further still, this father has to have been killed. And truly, how could this even be thinkable beyond its strictly mythical value, because as far as I know, the father at issue is not conceived of by Freud, nor by anyone, as an immortal being? Why is it that the sons should have in some way hastened him to an untimely end? Why go to such lengths when ultimately they forbade themselves what it was a matter of stealing from him? That is to say, they killed him only to show that he cannot be killed.

The essence of what Freud introduces in relation to a major drama hinges on a notion that is strictly mythical in so far as it is the very categorisation of a form of the impossible, even of the unthinkable, namely the eternalisation of a one and only Father at the origin, whose characteristics amount to his having been killed. And why so, if not to maintain him? I point out to you incidentally that in French, and a few other tongues, in German in particular, tuer comes from the Latin tūtāre, which means to guard.

This mythical father who shows us what kinds of difficulties Freud was facing also shows us on what he was well and truly setting his sights in the notion of the father. It has to do with something that does not intervene at any moment of the dialectic unless through the intervention of the real father who at any given moment comes to fulfil the role and function thereof, and who allows the imaginary relationship to be invigorated and afforded a new dimension. The real father does not bring in the pure specular interplay of either me or the other, but rather affords an embodiment to the unutterable sentence, THOU ART THAT THOU ART, which just now we said cannot be uttered by someone who is not so himself. If you will allow me to play on the words and the ambiguity that I made use of when we were studying the paranoiac structure of Präsident Schreber, it's not tu es celui que tu es, but rather tu es celui qui tuais, thou art the one that hath killed.

The end of the Oedipus complex is correlative with the establishing of the Law as repressed, but permanent, in the unconscious. It is to this extent that there is something that responds in the symbolic. The Law is not simply this thing about which we ask ourselves why the whole community of man has been introduced into it and is implicated in it, but also something that has passed into the real in the form of the kernel left by the Oedipus complex, in the form of something that analysis has shown, once and for all, to be the real form that is the superego. This is the form that the philosophers had latched on to, to show us with greater or lesser ambiguity the density, the permanent kernel, of moral conscience. We know that in each individual this is very precisely incarnated in a superego that can take multiple forms, that comes in every shape and size, the most twisted and the most contorted.

It takes this form because its introduction at the level of the Es, as an element that is homogenous with the other libidinal elements, always partakes of some accident. One does not necessarily know at what point in the imaginary game the passage has been made, nor who was there momentarily to respond.

This tyrannical superego, in itself fundamentally paradoxical and contingent, represents in itself alone, even in non-neurotics, the signifier that leaves its mark and its imprint on man, that seals his relationship with the signifier. There is in man a signifier that marks his relationship with the signifier, and this is called the superego. There are even many more than one, and they are called symptoms.

It is with this key, and with this key alone, that you may understand what is at issue when little Hans is fomenting his phobia. What is distinctive, and I think I can demonstrate this for you in this observation, is precisely how in spite of all the father's love, all his kindness, all his intelligence, in virtue of which we have this observation, there is no real father.

The ensuing part of the game is played out in the luring in the relationship between little Hans and his mother, which in the end is unbearable, anguishing and intolerable, in that it is either him or her. It is one or the other, without ever knowing which, he the phallophore or she the phallophore, the little giraffe or the big giraffe. Despite the ambiguities in the ways the various authors have appraised the observation, it's quite clear that the little giraffe is precisely this maternal appurtenance around which the matter of knowing who has it and who will have it plays out. Hans is in a kind of waking dream, which for a moment makes him – to a chorus of cries from his mother, and in spite of this calling out – the possessor of the main stake. Indeed, it is there to underscore for us this very mechanism in the most vivid fashion.

To this I would like to add a few considerations that will allow you to familiarise yourselves with the strict handling of the category of castration that I have been trying to spell out for you.

The perspective that I've laid out for you allows both the imaginary game of the Ego-ideal and the sanctioning intervention of castration – in virtue of which these imaginary elements take on stability and a fixed constellation in the symbolic – to be located in their reciprocal relationships, each on their own plane. Let's try to see whether it really is necessary, from this perspective and with this distinction in mind, to deign to articulate something that would stem directly from the notion of an object relation conceived of in advance as harmonious and uniform, as though by some happy convergence of Nature and Law each Jack should come to find his Jill, ideally and constantly, to the couple's greatest satisfaction, without so much as a moment's pause to find out what the community as a whole happens to think about this.

If, on the contrary, we know how to distinguish the order of Law from imaginary harmonies, indeed from the very position of the love relationship, and if it is true that castration is the essential crisis in which each and every subject becomes authorised, as it were, to be rightfully Oedipalised, we shall gather from this that it is quite natural – even at the level of complex structures, indeed structures that are altogether free of kinship, like those we live with at our level, and not only in elementary structures – to posit, at least at a push, the formula that any woman who is not permitted is forbidden by Law. This formula allows us to appreciate the very sharp echo of castration that all marriage bears within it, and not simply for neurotics. While the particular civilisation we are living in, which has produced marriage symbolically as the fruit of mutual consent, will explain to you that the ideal conflation of love and conjugo has been able to flourish as an ideal, it is nevertheless quite clear that this is so to the extent that it has thrust the fact of mutual consent to the fore, that is to say, it has pushed the freedom to unite as far as it possibly can, so far indeed that it is always verging on incest.

Besides, you need only dwell a little on the very function of the primitive laws of alliance and kinship to realise that any conjoining whatsoever, even an instantaneous conjoining, arising from individual choice within the bounds of the law, any conjoining of love and law, even when it is desirable, even when it is a kind of necessary crossing point of union between beings, is something that partakes of incest. It ultimately follows from this that, if Freudian doctrine ascribes the failures and indeed the debasements in the sphere of love to the lasting fixation to the mother as a permanent constancy of goodness knows what that strikes the ideal of monogamous union with an originary flaw, it should not be believed that there might be something else here. It should not be believed that there is a new form of either/or that would show us how, if incest does not arise where we wish it to, in actuality or in perfect marriages, as they say, this is precisely because it arose elsewhere. Rather, incest is very much at issue in both cases. In other words, there is something here that bears its limit within it, that entails a fundamental duplicity, an ambiguity that is always ready to rise again.

This is what allows us to affirm, in keeping with experience but with the sole advantage of coming as no surprise, that while the ideal of conjugal conjunction is monogamous in women, for the reasons we stated at the outset, there is no cause for astonishment when we realise that what always tends to be reproduced on the man's side is the split that makes him fundamentally bigamous. One has only to refer to the initial scheme of the child's relation to his mother. To the extent that the typical, normative and lawful union is always marked by castration, this division tends to be reproduced in men. I'm not saying that it makes him polygamous, contrary to what people think, though of course once the twain has been introduced there is no longer any reason to stem the play in this mirror palace. Fundamentally, however, while the real father authorises the one who has entered the Oedipal dialectic to fix down his choice, what is always targeted in love lies beyond this choice, and it is neither the lawful object nor the object of satisfaction, but Being, that is to say, the object that is grasped in precisely what is wanting.

It is for this, that whether in an institutionalised or anarchic fashion, we can see how love and consecrated union are never conflated. I repeat – either this is produced in an institutionalised fashion, as numerous evolved civilisations have had no hesitation in asserting in doctrine and in putting into practice, or, when one is in a civilisation like ours, where no one knows how to make anything hang together, everything happens almost by accident. It happens because one is more or less an ego that is more or less weak, more or less strong, and because one is more or less tied to some such archaic or even ancestral fixation.

It is in the primary imaginary relationship, the one in which the child has already been introduced to what lies beyond the mother, that, through his mother, he can already behold, touch upon and experience how the human being is a deprived being and an abandoned being. The very structure that imposes the distinction between this imaginary experience and the symbolic experience that normalises it – though solely through the intervention and the intermediary of Law – implies that many things are maintained that on no account allow us to speak of the sphere of love as though it were merely an object relation, even the most ideal one, one that is motivated by choice and by the deepest affinities. This structure leaves entirely open a problematic that is inherent to the love life of each and every subject.

Freud's experience, and our day-to-day experience, are there to bring us up against this and by the same stroke to confirm it.

Today we are going to try to speak about castration.

Castration runs throughout Freud's writings, as does the Oedipus complex, yet they are treated differently.

It was only late in the day, in a 1931 article dedicated to something entirely new, that Freud tried to spell out in full the formula of the Oedipus complex, despite its having been present in his thinking from the first. Indeed, it may be reckoned that here lies the chief personal issue that was his point of departure – What is a father? There can be no doubt about this because we know from his biography – and the letters to Fliess are confirmatory – that he was preoccupied by the presence of the Oedipus complex from the outset. It was only much later that he explained himself on this matter.

As for castration, nowhere is there anything of the sort. Not once did Freud spell out in full the precise meaning, the precise psychical impact, of this fear, or this threat, or this instance, or this dramatic moment. Each of these words may equally be posited, with a question mark, in regard to castration.

When I started to tackle the issue last time through the emergence of castration at a lower level than frustration and the imaginary phallic game with the mother, many of you, even when you had grasped the role I was ascribing to the father's intervention – his symbolic personage being purely the symbolic personage of dreams – were still wondering what this castration is. What does it mean that, for the subject to come to genital maturity, he has to have been castrated?

We are going to see how to respond to this.

If you take things at the simple level of reading, it may be said that castration is the sign of the Oedipal drama, just as it is its implicit fulcrum.

Even though it is not spelt out like this anywhere, it is literally implied throughout Freud's writings.

People may seek to sidestep this, and it can be taken as a sort of make-believe, which is what keeps cropping up when you listen to current-day analytic discourse. However, once you allow the text to bring you to dwell on this, as I am doing right now, so that the abruptness of this assertion can become apparent as something problematic, which indeed it is, you can take this formula as the point of departure, however paradoxical it may be.

What, then, is meant by this formulation? What does it presuppose? Moreover, this is precisely what the authors have latched on to because, even so, there are some who have not failed to pause over the singularity of such a consequence. Foremost among them is Ernest Jones.

You will notice this if you read his collected papers. He never managed to overcome the difficulty of how to handle the castration complex as such. He tried to formulate a term which is peculiar to him, though of course like everything that has been introduced into the analytic community it has wended its way and borne echo, having been cited chiefly among the British authors. The term is aphanisis. The Greek term ἀφάνισις means disappearance.

The solution that Jones tried to offer to the pattern of insistence behind the psychical drama of castration in the subject's history runs as follows. First, the dread of castration cannot, at least from his perspective, be made to hang on the accidental occurrence, on the contingency, of threats, which nevertheless are always so singularly reproduced in subjects' histories, expressed in the well-known parental threat of We shall send for someone to cut it off. The paradoxically motivated aspect of the threat, which is un-rooted, in a sort of necessary constant of the inter-individual relationship, is not the only aspect that has given the authors pause for thought. So, the question and difficulty concerns how castration is to be handled when it comes to integrating such a singular thing in its positive form, which Freud nevertheless spells out clearly as something that threatens the penis, the phallus. This is what pushed Jones, when he was starting to broach the problem of establishing the mechanism of development around which the superego must be constituted, to foreground the notion of aphanisis. I think I need only spell it out for you myself for you to see to what extent it cannot help but present great difficulty.

Aphanisis is indeed disappearance, but the disappearance of what? For Jones, it is the disappearance of desire. The castration complex qua aphanisis, substituted for castration, is the subject's fear of seeing his desire extinguished.

I think you cannot fail to see how such a notion in itself amounts to a relationship that has been highly subjectified. It may indeed be conceivable that this is the source of some primordial anxiety, but this is certainly an anxiety that has been reflected on in a very peculiar manner. One really has to make a leap of understanding that leaves an immense gulf gaping wide, all the while assuming it to have been bridged, if one is to suppose, on the basis of data derived from a subject's very first relational movements with respect to his objects, that he is already in a position to take a step back in such a way as not only to experience an articulated frustration as such, but also to hang upon it the apprehension of a drying-up of desire.

It was actually around the notion of privation, as what purportedly gives rise to the fear of aphanisis, that Jones tried to articulate his entire genesis of the superego as the formation in which the Oedipus complex naturally culminates. Of course, he promptly found himself faced with the distinctions to which I believe we are succeeding in giving a slightly more manageable form. When Jones uses the term privation, he doesn't manage for an instant to distinguish between sheer privation, which means that the subject is not satisfied in any given need he might have, and the privation that he calls deliberate deprivation, which presupposes, across from the subject, another subject who refuses him the satisfaction he is seeking. Furthermore, since it is not easy, based on such indistinct data, to unite the passage from one to the other, especially when they are being kept in the state of synonyms, he quite naturally comes to suggest that, more often than not, privation is taken as frustration. He suggests that, for the subject, privation is equivalent to frustration. Of course, on this basis a good many things are facilitated in the articulation of a process, but while they are facilitated for the speaker, this does not mean that the same holds true for a moderately exacting listener.

In point of fact, on my chart I don't give the term privation anything like the meaning that Jones gives it. The privation that is involved on the chart, where it features as one of the terms, is the very thing in relation to which the notion of castration has to be located. I have tried to restore to the term frustration its complexity as a veritable relation. As you were able to see in the session just before the February break, I did so in a highly articulated way, and you ought to be able to retain enough from this to see that I do not employ the term in the summary form in which it is usually employed.

In my schematic, privation and castration feature as distinct simply because it's not possible to articulate the impact of castration onto something else without isolating the notion of privation as what I have called a real hole. Rather than throwing out a red herring, let's try on the contrary to isolate the herring. Privation is the privation of the herring.[1] It is, in particular, the fact that woman does not have a penis. I mean that this fact has a constant impact in the evolution of practically all the cases that Freud lays out for us. Taking on board the fact that woman is deprived of a penis affords the boy the most salient example, which we can meet at every turn in the Freudian case histories, of how castration, if indeed it is this that we are seeking out, takes as its base the apprehension of woman's absence of penis in the real. This is the crucial point in the majority of the cases. In the male subject's experience, this is the fundament upon which the notion of privation sits in a way that is especially efficacious and anguishing. There is a share of beings in humanity who are, as it is put in the texts, castrated. This term is, of course, utterly ambiguous. They are castrated in the subjectivity of the subject. In reality, when it comes to what they are in the real, and which is invoked as a real experience, they are deprived.

I am alluding to the reference to the real around which the experience of castration turns in the teaching to be derived from Freud's texts. I mentioned to you in this connection that to spell out the thinking correctly we must correlate to this privation in the real the fact that it necessarily concerns our own way of apprehending what is at issue. This is due to the simple fact that we are setting things out in reference, not to the patient's experience, but to the experiences of our own thinking.

The very notion of privation is exposed in this kind of experience – which entails the symbolisation of the object in the real – as something markedly tangible and visible. In the real, nothing is deprived of anything. Everything that is real is sufficient unto itself. By definition, the real is full. If we introduced the notion of privation into the real, this is because we already symbolise it quite enough, and even altogether fully, to indicate that if something is not there it's because we suppose its presence to be a possibility. That is to say, we introduce into the real, in order to cover it over and to hollow it out in some way, the elementary order of the symbolic.

This is why I say that, at the level of this progression, the object at issue in this instance is the penis. It's an object that is given to us in a symbolic state on the tier at which we have been speaking about privation. I'm reminding you of the necessity of the chart. It's quite clear that castration, insomuch as it is effective and felt in lived experience, and present in the genesis of a neurosis, is the castration of an imaginary object. In its impact in a neurosis, no castration is ever a real castration. Castration enters the game to the extent that it is played out in the subject in the form of an action that bears on an imaginary object.

The issue for us is precisely to conceive of why and through what necessity this castration is introduced into a development that is the subject's typical development. It's a matter of the subject joining this complex order that constitutes the relationship between man and woman and which means that genital realisation is submitted to a number of conditions in humankind.

So, our starting point will be, as it was last time, the subject in his originative relation with the mother at the stage that is being qualified as preoedipal. We have seen that there is much to say about this stage, and we hope to have spelt it out better than is usually done, with greater differentiation. Even when these authors do demonstrate what is at issue, we believe that they do not handle it so well and fail to reason it out. We are going to start again from this point so as to try to seize at its moment of emergence the necessity of the phenomenon of castration as something that symbolises a symbolic indebtedness, a symbolic castigation inscribed into the symbolic chain, and as something that snatches hold of this imaginary object as its instrument.

To serve us as a guide, and so that we may refer to terms that I laid out previously, I ask you to accept for the time being the hypothesis, the supposition, that our articulation will lean on and which we saw last time, namely that behind the symbolic mother stands the symbolic father.

The symbolic father is in some sense a necessity of symbolic construction, but one that we can locate only in a beyond-zone, I would almost say in a transcendence, in any case in something that, as I indicated in passing, can only be joined through a mythical construction. I have often insisted on the fact that ultimately this symbolic father is not represented anywhere, and the next part of our disquisition will confirm for you whether this is valid, whether it is effectively useful in allowing us to find this element of the drama of castration in complex reality.

We now have on our chart the real father and the imaginary father. While the symbolic father is the signifier about which one can never speak without encountering both its necessity and its character – which we have to accept as a kind of irreducible given from the world of the signifier – the imaginary father and the real father are two terms that present far less difficulty for us.

We are constantly dealing with the imaginary father. The imaginary father is the commonest point of reference for the whole dialectic of aggressiveness, the whole dialectic of identification, and the whole dialectic of idealisation whereby the subject gains access to what is called identification with the father. All of this occurs on the level of the imaginary father. We also say that this father is imaginary because he is integrated into the imaginary relationship that forms the psychological support for dealings with the semblable, these being strictly speaking relationships of kind, the same that lie at the root of any libidinal captivation or any aggressive stand-off. The imaginary father also participates, ipso facto, with typical characteristics. This imaginary father is the terrifying father with whom we are acquainted, who is behind so many neurotic experiences and who bears no mandatory relation to the child's real father. We frequently see cropping up in the child's fantasies a figure of the father – and also of the mother – who twists into a grimace and who is very far removed from the real father who was present for the child at the time. He is linked solely to this period, and to the function that this imaginary father will hold at this stage of development.

The real father is an altogether different matter. The child has only ever had a very difficult apprehension of this real father, due to the interposition of fantasies and the necessity of the symbolic relationship. Indeed, this is how it is for any human being. If there is one thing that lies at the base and the foundation of all analytic experience, then it's that we find it so very hard to apprehend what is most real around us, that is to say, human beings such as they are. The whole difficulty of psychical development and everyday life alike is that of knowing with whom we are really dealing. This is no less the case for the person of the father, who under ordinary conditions may rightly be regarded as a constant element in what these days is called the child's entourage. I ask you therefore to take on board what might strike you as paradoxical in the first approach to the stationed character of the chart, namely that, contrary to a sort of normative or typical notion that people seek to pin on the insistence of the castration complex in the Oedipal drama, it is effectively to the real father that the prominent function of what occurs with respect to the castration complex is deferred.

So, you can see from the way I'm formulating it what can already appear as a contingency, as something scarcely explicable. Why is this castration here? Why is there this strange form of intervention in the subject's economy that is called castration? In itself it has something shocking about it.

I will double this contingency by telling you that it is no accident, it is no strangeness ascribable to the first approach to this topic, that physicians were the first to dwell on these things that were recognised as being more fantasmatic than people believed, namely the scenes of primary seduction. You know that this is a stage in Freud's thought, even before he had analysed this topic and produced the doctrine on it. When it comes to castration, however, it's not a matter of fantasmatising the whole affair, as was done with the scenes of primary seduction. While castration does effectively warrant being isolated by naming it in the subject's history, this is always linked to the impact, to the intervention, of the real father. Or, if you prefer, it may equally be marked, and profoundly so, by the absence of the real father, which throws it deeply off balance, and this necessity, which introduces something of a profound atypia, then calls for the substitution of the real father by something else, which is deeply neuroticising.

We will take as our point of departure the supposition of the fundamental character of the link between the real father and castration, so as to try to find our bearings in these complex dramas that Freud elaborates for us. Very often we have the sense that he is allowing himself to be led in advance by a sort of guiding thread that occasionally is so assured – as in the case of little Hans – that we too have the impression of being guided, from one instant to the next, yet without grasping anything and without the motives that lead us to make a choice at each fork in the path.

I ask you, therefore, tentatively to accept this position, on a provisional basis, as the position around which we shall try to understand this necessity behind the signification of the castration complex, by now taking up the case of little Hans.

From the age of four-and-a-half, little Hans develops what is called a phobia, that is to say, a neurosis.

This phobia was taken in charge by Hans's father, who as it happened was one of Freud's acolytes. He was a good honest fellow, which is the best thing for a real father to be. We are also told that little Hans had every positive feeling for him, whom he had always loved, and that he is far from fearing such abusive treatment as castration from the father.

On the other hand, it cannot be said that little Hans has been frustrated of something for real. In the way we see it at the beginning of the observation, little Hans, still an only child, is as happy as can be. He is the object of an attentiveness that his father certainly didn't wait until the appearance of the phobia to lavish. He is also the object of the most tender care from his mother, so tender, in fact, that everything is handed over to him. In truth, it takes Freud's sublime serenity to approve her actions, when nowadays all manner of anathema would be pronounced upon her, she who every morning allows little Hans into the conjugal bed as a third party, against the express reservations voiced by the husband and father. Not only does the latter show himself on this occasion to be very peculiarly tolerant, but also we may deem him not to be in on what's going on, because regardless of what he says, things carry on no less in the most determined fashion. Not for a second do we see the mother in question taking even slightly into account the observation that has been respectfully suggested to her by the person of the father.

Little Hans is in no way frustrated. He is not deprived of anything for real. Nevertheless, at the start of the observation, his mother does go so far as to forbid his masturbation. Not only is this no small matter in itself, she even goes so far as to utter the fatal words, If you do that, I shall send for Dr A. to cut off your widdler. This is reported at the start of the observation, but we don't have the impression that it is decisive. The child continues of course. This is not an element that is assessed, but certainly her intervention needs to be taken note of given the qualm with which the observation is picked up on, and due to the fact that the parents are sufficiently well informed, which moreover doesn't stop them from behaving exactly as though they knew nothing. Nevertheless, Freud doesn't entertain, even for a second, bringing in at that moment anything whatsoever that would be decisive with respect to the appearance of the phobia. The child harkens to this threat, I would say almost as is fitting. You will see that after the event there even emerges the implication that one could say nothing more to a child, that it's precisely what will serve him as the material from which to construct what he needs, that is, the castration complex. However, the question of why he needs this is precisely another question. This is where we are, and we are far from being able to give an immediate reply.

For the time being, it's not about castration. It's about phobia and the fact that on no account can we tie it in a direct and straightforward way to the forbidding of masturbation. As Freud puts it very well, the child's masturbation does not by any means explain his anxiety. The child will continue to masturbate. Of course, in what ensues he will integrate it into the conflict that will become manifest at the time of his phobia, but this is certainly not anything apparent. What occurs at this moment is not some traumatising impact that would allow us to understand the outbreak of the phobia. The conditions that surround the child are optimal, and the issue of the scope of the phobia remains an issue that one has to know how to introduce with its truly dignified character, though it is a questionable one on occasion. It is on this basis that we shall be able to uncover the cross-references that will enlighten and indeed enhance our attempt at theorisation.

I want to give due consideration – and this will be a reminder – to what we can call the fundamental situation with regard to the child's phallus in relation to the mother.

What do we have in the child's relation to the mother, which we spoke about in the preoedipal relationship? There the mother is an object of love, an object desired for its presence, an object that presupposes a relationship that is as simple as you may imagine, but very early on in the child's experience, in his deportment, his sensibility and his reaction, this relationship is very soon made manifest in its articulation in a presence–absence pair. As you know, this is our point of departure. Some difficulty has arisen regarding what might be called the child's first objectal world due to insufficient distinction of the term object. That there should be a primordial object that we can on no account constitute ideally, that is, in our ideation – the child's world as a bare state of hanging on to the undetermined limits of the organ that satisfies him, the nourishing organ – is something that I am not the first to contradict. The entire life's work of Alice Balint, to take one example among others, is there to articulate what I am telling you in a different way, one that I believe to be less sustainable, namely that the mother exists but that this does not presuppose that there is already such a thing as me and not-me.

The mother exists as a symbolic object and as a love object. This will be confirmed both by experience and by what I'm formulating for you in the position I've given to the mother on the chart. The mother is first of all, so we are told, a symbolic mother, and it is only in the crisis of frustration that she starts to become a reality through a certain number of confrontations and peculiarities that arise in the relationships between mother and child. The mother qua love-object can at any moment become the real mother in so far as she frustrates this love.

The child's relationship with the mother, which is a relationship of love, has something about it that can open the door to what is usually called, for want of knowing how to articulate it, the first undifferentiated relationship. But, in fact, what is it that occurs fundamentally in the first concrete stage in this relationship of love as such, this something that constitutes the ground on which the child's satisfaction may or may not be produced, along with the signification that it carries? It's that the child includes himself in this relationship as the object of the mother's love. It's that the child learns that he brings his mother pleasure. This is one of the child's fundamental experiences. He comes to know that if his presence commands, however little, the presence of the one who is necessary to him, it's because he himself introduces something into the experience, namely the radiance that means that this presence is there and that it surrounds him as something to which he brings a satisfaction of love. The fact of being loved, geliebt werden, is fundamental. It is the ground upon which everything that will develop between mother and child is played out.

As I have indicated to you, the question that is brought to the fore by the facts themselves is that of how the child apprehends what he is for the mother. Our starting hypothesis, as you know, is that he is not alone. Little by little, something is articulated in the child's experience which indicates to him that, in the mother's presence beside him, he is not alone. The whole dialectic furtherance of the mother's relationship with the child will be articulated around this.

One of the most commonplace experiences is that first of all he is not alone because there are other children, but our starting hypothesis is that there is another term at stake, which is constant, radical, and independent of the contingencies and peculiarities of his history and the presence or not of another child. This hypothesis is that the mother maintains, at varying degrees depending on the subject, her Penisneid. Her child may fulfil her or not, but the question is posed. The two discoveries, of the phallic mother for the child and of Penisneid for the mother, are strictly coexistent with the problem that we are now trying to broach.

They do not lie on the same level. I have chosen to start from one particular point in order to get to another, and it's on this level that we must take Penisneid as one of the fundamental givens of the analytic experience, as a constant term of reference in the mother's relationship with the child. Experience proves that there is no means of articulating the perversions in any other way, insomuch as, contrary to what is said, they are not fully explicable by the preoedipal stage, though they do indeed necessitate the preoedipal experience. We can see that it is in the relationship with the mother that the child experiences the phallus as the central focus of the mother's desire. And he places himself there in different positions, through which he is led to maintain, but more exactly to lure, the mother's desire.

The articulation from the lesson I was alluding to earlier bears on this. Either way, the child presents himself to the mother as being the very thing that offers her, in himself, the phallus. This happens to varying degrees and from different positions. He may identify with the mother, he may identify with the phallus, he may identify with the mother as bearer of the phallus, or present himself as the bearer of the phallus. Here, there is a high degree, not of abstraction, but of the generalisation of this level of imaginary relationship, of the relationship that I've been calling a luring relationship, wherein the child attests to his mother that he can fulfil her, not only as a child, but also with respect to her desire and, to spell it right out, with respect to what she lacks. The situation is certainly a fundamental and structuring one, because it's around this, and only around this, that the fetishist's relationship with his object can be articulated. Take for example the whole intermediary scale that links him to such a complex and elaborate relationship as transvestism, and to which analysis alone has been able to furnish its accentuation and its terminal point. Homosexuality is here set apart for what is at issue in homosexuality, that is to say, a need of the object, of the real penis, in the other party.

At what point will we see that something brings an end to the relationship that is sustained in this way? What, for example, brings this to an end in the case of little Hans?

At the start of the observation, through a kind of lucky encounter, through the illumination of a miraculous stroke of fortune, which is what has happened whenever we make a discovery, we see the child fully committed to a relationship in which the phallus plays a most evident role.

The father's notes on what he picked out from the child's development, up until the hour of reckoning when the phobia began, tell us that little Hans was constantly fantasising the phallus, questioning his mother about the presence of her phallus, then about his father's phallus, and then about the phallus of animals. He speaks about nothing but the phallus. Going by the comments that are reported to us, the phallus is truly the pivotal object, the central object in the organisation of his world. We have Freud's text before us, and we are trying to make sense of it.

What was it, then, that changed, since nothing of especial importance, nothing critical, occurred in the life of little Hans? What changed was that his penis started to become something altogether real. It began to stir, and the child started to masturbate. The important element is not so much that his mother intervened at that moment, but rather that his penis became real. This is the solid fact in the observation. From that point forth, it's quite clear that we need to ask ourselves whether there might not be a relationship between this fact and what appears at that time, that is to say, anxiety.

I have yet to tackle the problem of anxiety here in this Seminar, because things need to be taken in sequence. As you know, the question of how anxiety is to be conceived of is one of the abiding questions that runs throughout Freud's work. I'm not about to give you a single-sentence synopsis of the path Freud took, but I will note that, as a mechanism, anxiety is constantly present at each stage of his observation. The doctrine comes afterwards.

How are we to conceive of the anxiety that is at issue in this instance, while staying as close as possible to the phenomenon? I ask you to try out for a moment the fashion that consists in showing a little imagination and to notice that anxiety appears in this extraordinarily evanescent relationship when the subject peels away from his existence, however imperceptible this may be, and when he realises, though scarcely so, that he is on the verge of being drawn back into something that you may label as you wish depending on the occasion – image of the other, temptation, and so on – in short, the instant when the subject is suspended between a moment at which he no longer knows where he is, and a shift towards a moment when he will become something in which he will never be able to find himself again. That's what anxiety is.

Can't you see that right when there appears in the child, in the form of a drive in the most elementary sense of the term, this thing that stirs – the real penis – what formerly had long been the very paradise of happiness starts to feel like a snare? This snare is what formerly was the game of being what one is not, of being for the mother everything that she wants.

I can't speak about everything at once, so I shall make do with saying that all of this depends after all on the fact of what the child is really for the mother. Presently we shall be trying to introduce some difference into this, and to get much closer to what Hans was for his mother, but for the time being we shall stick with this crucial point that yields us the general scheme of things.

Until this point, the child is in the paradise of the lure. It may be satisfying or not, but either way there is no reason for us not to see that he can keep up this game for a very long while in a satisfying way. The child tries to slip into, to integrate himself into what he is for the mother's love, and, with a bit of good fortune, and even very little, he manages, because that's all it takes to authorise this relationship that is so very delicate. But as soon as his drive, his real penis, starts to interfere, the unsticking that I have just mentioned becomes apparent. He is caught in his own snare, the dupe of his own game, and falls prey to every discordance now that he is confronted with the particularly immense gap that lies between satisfying an image and having something to present – to present, so to speak, in full. What invariably happens is not merely that the child simply fails in his attempts at seduction, for one reason or another, or that he is rejected by the mother. The decisive factor is that what he ultimately has to present is something that seems to him to be something quite meagre. There are countless such experiences in analytic experience. The child comes face-to-face with the opening where he is the captive, the victim, the pacified element in a game in which he now becomes prey to the significations of the Other. There is a dilemma here.

As I indicated last year, it is very precisely at this point that the origin of paranoia branches off. Once the game starts to become serious, while still being a mere game of luring, the child is entirely left hanging on what the partner indicates to him. The partner's every expression becomes for him the verdict on his sufficiency or his insufficiency. This is what happens to the extent that the situation evolves, that is to say, when the term of the symbolic father does not intervene, having been left on the outside due to Verwerfung. We are going to see, concretely, just how necessary this term of the symbolic father is. But when the situation evolves without this term, it turns into the highly peculiar situation of being thenceforth delivered up entirely to the eye and the gaze of the Other. Let's leave to one side, however, this future paranoiac. On the other branch, in and of itself there is literally no way out of the situation. Of course, there is a way out, because I'm here to show you how the castration complex is the way out.

The castration complex takes up, on the purely imaginary plane, everything that is at stake in the phallus. This is precisely why it is most fitting that the real penis should in some sense be placed out of range. The Father introduces an order that intervenes with its prohibitions, with the fact that he introduces the reign of Law here, which means that the affair is taken out of the child's hands but is settled elsewhere. The Father is the one with whom there is no more chance of winning but to accept the distribution of stakes as they stand. The symbolic order intervenes precisely on the imaginary plane. It is not for nothing that castration bears on the imaginary phallus, but in some sense outside of the real couple. Order is thus re-established, within which the child will be able to wait out events as they evolve.

This might strike you as straightforward for the time being as a solution to the problem. It's an indication. It's not a solution. It's a bridge that's been quickly flung across the divide. Were it really so easy, were there just one bridge to be made, there would be no reason to do any bridging. What is of interest is the point we've reached, namely the point that little Hans had reached precisely when nothing of the sort had been laid out for him.

What is little Hans faced with? He is poised at the meeting point between the real drive and the game of the imaginary phallic lure, and this is in relation to his mother. What happens at that moment, because there is a neurosis? It will come as no surprise to you when I tell you that a regression occurs.

I would nevertheless prefer you to be surprised by this because I'm giving the term regression neither more nor less than the strict scope I gave it in the last session before the break, when we spoke about frustration. I told you back then that in the presence of the mother's failing, the child brings about a quashing in the satisfaction of being fed. Here too, where the child stands at the centre, regression occurs when it's no longer enough to give what is there for the giving, and he finds himself in the disarray of no longer sufficing. There is a feigning of the same shortcut by which primary frustration is satisfied, where the child snatches hold of the breast in order to fence off all his problems. The only thing that opens up before him as a yawning gap is exactly what is now happening elsewhere – to be devoured by the mother.

This is the first coat that the phobia dons, and this is exactly what appears in the case of our young fellow. Whichever horse becomes the object of his phobia, it is always a horse that bites. The theme of devouring is always to be found, in one aspect or another, in the structure of the phobia.

Is this the whole of it? Of course it is not. It's not just anything that bites or that devours. We find ourselves confronted with the problem of phobia whenever a certain number of fundamental relationships come about, some of which have to be left to one side in order to be able to articulate something cogent. What is certain is that the objects of phobias, which are animals in particular, are marked out from the first, even to the eye of the most casual observer, by something that turns them by their very essence into objects of the symbolic order. Whether the object of the phobia is a lion, a wolf, or even a giraffe, and above all when the child doesn't live in parts where this animal presents the faintest sign, not of danger, but simply of actual presence, they are foreign objects – among which we can see on this occasion that the horse presents as an extremely precise limit – which show very well to what extent they are objects that have been lifted, as it were, from a sort of list or category of signifiers that share the same nature, consistent with what can be found on coats-of-arms. These objects are the same that led Freud, when putting together Totem and Taboo, to the analogy, which even became a necessity, between the father and the totem. They have a very special function, which is to stand in for the signifier of the symbolic father.

We cannot see what the final term of this signifier is. One can wonder why it takes one form or another. There must be something in what we encounter that belongs to the realm of fact or experience, both of the positive and the irreducible kind. This is not a deduction but an apparatus necessitated by the support of what we find in experience. Besides, we are not here to sort out why the phobia takes the form of such and such an animal. This is not the question.

I ask you to take up, between now and next time, the text of the observation on little Hans. You will see that it's a phobia without a shadow of a doubt, but it's a phobia that is, so to speak, in motion. His parents seized the thread the moment it first appeared, and his father doesn't let go until it's over.

I should like you to read this text. You will have all the flitting impressions that one can have from it. You will even on several occasions have a sense of being utterly lost. Nevertheless, I would like those of you who will have been willing to put yourselves through the test to tell me next time whether you have been struck by a contrast in the text.

At the first stage, we see little Hans in full flow developing all sorts of extraordinarily fictionalised imaginings concerning his relations with all the children whom he adopts as his own. This is a theme of the imaginary in which he shows himself to be very much at ease, as though in this state he were extending in some way the luring game with his mother. He feels himself quite at ease in a position that combines an identification with the mother. At the same time, adopting the children entails a series of loving relationships of every stripe, going from the little girl whom he woos and courts at close quarters – the daughter of the landlord of their holiday lodgings – to the girl who inspires his long-range love. This locates him as already inscribed in all the forms of loving relationship, which he can pursue with great ease on the plane of fiction.

All of this contrasts with what will come to pass when, after the father's interventions under the pressure of a more or less directed analytic questioning, he gives himself over to a sort of fantasy novelising in which he constructs the presence of his little sister, years before her actual birth, in a box, in a carriage, and on a horse. In short, the coherence of this draws a firm line in the analysis of little Hans between what I would call the imaginary orgy and the intervention of the real father.

In other words, while the child reaches a most satisfactory cure – and we will be seeing what satisfactory cure means with respect to his phobia – this is quite clearly to the extent that the real father has intervened, a real father who hitherto had intervened so very little. Moreover, he was able to intervene because he had the symbolic father, Freud, behind him. However, commensurate with this intervention, everything that was tending to crystallise on the plane of a sort of premature real sets off again in a radical imaginary, so radical indeed that one no longer knows very well where one is. One keeps wondering whether Hans might not be making fun of everything, or producing a refined brand of humour, which moreover is incontestably the case because what we have here is an imaginary that is being played out to reorganise a symbolic world.

One thing is certain, however, which is that his recovery comes about when he expresses castration in the clearest way in the form of an articulated story, namely the plumber who comes and unscrews his widdler and gives him another one. It is right there that the observation stops. We can gather from this that the solution of the phobia is linked to the constellation of this triadic intervention of the real father.

We will be coming back to this next time. Supported and assisted as he is by the symbolic father, the real father enters here as a schmuck. Freud is constantly forced to say that it's better than nothing, that the child had to be allowed to speak. Above all, says Freud at the bottom of one page, It is not in the least our business to 'understand' a case at once. With all the questions that the father obviously presses on his son, he goes barking up the wrong tree. No matter. The result is punctuated by these two points – Hans's imaginary orgy, and the advent, as it were, of fully articulated castration.

This castration is spelt out as follows – what is real will be replaced by something more impressive, something bigger. The bringing to light of castration is both what puts an end to the phobia and what shows, I would say, not its finality, but what it stands in for.

You must have a fair sense of how this is but an intermediary stage in my disquisition. I simply wanted to give you enough to see where his repertoire of questions opens up. Next time we will take up this dialectic of child and mother, and we shall set about isolating the value, the true signification, of the castration complex.

THE SIGNIFIER IN THE REAL

The network of The Purloined Letter
Quite alone with Mariedl
A metonymic child
The black on the mouth
A world structured phobically

I should like to begin by setting things straight regarding the article published in the second issue of La Psychanalyse under the title Séminaire sur 'La Lettre volée', and especially its Introduction.

A number of you have had time to read it and to go into it more deeply. I am grateful for the attention of those who have devoted themselves to this inspection. It is to be believed, however, that the memory of the context in which what is there laid out in the Introduction was first delivered is not so easy for everyone to get back in touch with, because some have fallen back into a sort of real-ising error of another kind, which is what a few people allowed themselves to be overtaken by when I was first setting out these terms. For example, they imagined that I was denying that there is such a thing as chance. I allude to this in my text and I won't be coming back to this point.

I'm now going to clarify what is at issue.

It will be useful for me to remind you of the basic data.

We take the signs + and – , randomly ordered in a temporal succession, in groupings of three. We order these groupings as 1, 2 or 3, depending on whether they represent a succession of identical signs + + +, – – –, or an alternating succession + – +, – + –, or on the contrary a succession that is distinct from the others in that it has no symmetry, such as + + –, but also – – +. I call this last grouping odd, using an English term that cannot be translated into French. It's the one that is asymmetrical, and which stands out as being uneven and lopsided. It's a simple question of definition. It's enough to set it out like this for it to be established as a convention, as the existence of a symbol. While this was laid out unambiguously in my text, though perhaps in a way that was dense enough for some to have found it difficult, the context prevents one from taking it even so long as a second for anything but this definition, this convention that is the point of departure.

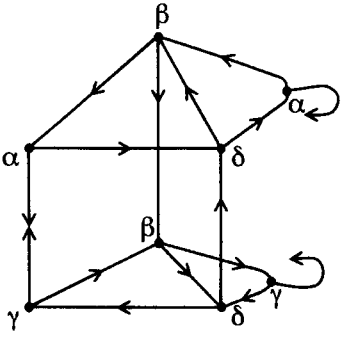
Next, it's a matter of using the letters α, β, γ and δ, to label a third series of symbols that is built from the second series. This is founded on the remark that when one knows the beginning and end term in the second series, the middle term is univocal. So, in order to define the terms α, β, γ and δ, we take into account only the two extremes of the series. In a case like this one here, γ, you can see that it goes from odd to odd. Therefore, the convention has been established whereby a sign is set down that captures within its range the five previous symbols from the first line. This will give the sign α when going from same to same, that is, from symmetrical to symmetrical, whether it's a matter of going from 1 to 1, from 1 to 3, or from 3 to 1.[1] Going from odd to odd gives γ. Starting from the same to arrive at odd will give β. Coming back to the same from odd will give δ. These are the conventions.

On this basis, if we want to define all the possibilities by means of a network, we can construct it as a parallelepiped formed of vectors. This has been found by one of the people who has best understood and best examined this thing, in the most precise way and even, I would almost say, in the most competent way.



The network has to be oriented, which is exactly how it is here. The α can reproduce indefinitely, which is not the case for the other points unless it is expressly indicated by the loop defined thus. So, this network provides an exhaustive summary of all the possible sequences. These are the only ones. A series that cannot be set into this network is an impossible series.

Why didn't I put this in my text? First of all, because I hadn't represented it for you here. It's a simple device for checking the calculations, which allows for the definitive envelopment and locking-down of the problem in such fashion as to ensure that none of the possibilities has been pretermitted. What is convenient about it is that you can always refer to it as something trustworthy. It will indicate when you might perhaps in a certain case have overlooked a possible solution, whichever the problem may be that you are posing with respect to the series, or even when you have gone completely wrong.

This brings me to a point of contention, which you can see in the network. The network shows you that there are in some sense two kinds of γ, two kinds of δ, and so on. If you look at any of the vertices, which have been labelled with these letters, you can see that a dichotomous division is always posited when starting from any one of them. Take for example γ. After γ there can be a β, and there can also after γ be an α, because this vector here has the privilege of running in both directions. Likewise, down here you can see a δ, and there are two possible outcomes – it can go to this δ up here, or to γ. So, there is another δ up here – which is not the same as the δ down here – after which there can be a β or an α.

The objection that some people have levelled at this way of laying out the evidence for functional diversity is that, according to them, one could for example label the vertices with eight different letters instead of four, or else put a lower-case a or a subscript 2. It was put to me that there was no clear and distinct definition of the symbol here, and that consequently everything I was representing and spelling out in my text was merely a sort of opacifying of the mechanism for how the symbols play out. It would be a sort of creation that would make some kind of internal law emerge from within. This is where a disquiet began to arise in some people's minds regarding one implication of something that is introduced by the creation of the symbol and which goes beyond the pure randomness that is given at the outset. I think I have to explain myself on this matter.

It's exactly that. And in one sense it can indeed be said that in the choosing of the symbols there is a certain ambiguity that is given at the outset, from the moment you set down the symbols, with the simple indication of oddity, that is to say, asymmetry, when in fact, given that we've spoken of a temporal succession, these items are oriented. Obviously 2 followed by 1 is not the same thing as 1 followed by 2. To confound them would be to introduce an ambiguity into the symbol itself when this can be expressed more clearly in the reference that has been set out.

However, what is at issue here is to find out what is meant by the clarity in question. There is something that you may call ambiguity, but be sure to tell yourself that this is precisely what one has to get a sense of. At every level, the symbol that is a + presupposes the – , and the symbol that is a – presupposes the +. The ambiguity is still there as we move further into the construction. By grouping them in threes, I took the smallest step one can take. I didn't demonstrate this in the article because my sole aim was to remind you of the context in which the purloined letter was introduced. Please accept for the moment that this is the smallest possible step, because it is precisely to the extent that the symbol harbours this ambiguity that what I have called law becomes apparent.

In other words, were you to assume that you could replace four of the vertices by ε, ζ, η, and θ, you would effectively obtain possible sequences that would be different and which would be extremely complicated because you would be dealing with eight terms, each of which would pair up with two others in keeping with an order that would be far from immediately obvious. Yet this is precisely the convenience of choosing these ambiguous symbols that pair up, because they do indeed pair up with something, this vertex α with another vertex that we have also labelled α, and which do indeed have different functions. It is in this respect that it's convenient to group them in this way, and from which, as you can see, there arises the exceedingly straightforward law that I expressed for you in one of the schematics in the text.

$$\underset{\text{Phase 1}}{\frac{\alpha, \delta}{\gamma, \beta}} \longrightarrow \underset{\text{Phase 2}}{\alpha, \beta, \gamma, \delta} \longrightarrow \underset{\text{Phase 3}}{\frac{\alpha, \beta}{\gamma, \delta}}$$

This schematic allows you to say that, while in the first or second phase you can have any one of the symbols, the third phase is subject to a dichotomy that rules out any possibility of obtaining γ or δ in the third phase if you began with α or δ in the first. Likewise, there is no possibility of obtaining an α or a β in the third if you began with a γ or a β in the first.

In my text I indicated some of the sequential effects this entails, certain properties that are interesting in that they always bring out other phrases of the same form, laws of syntax that can be deduced from this exceedingly straightforward formula. I tried to put them together in such a way that they would be metaphorical, that is to say, so that they would enable you to glimpse how the signifier truly is the organiser of something that is inherent in human memory. This is so to the extent that, by always implicating elements of the signifier in its weft, human memory turns out to be structured in a fundamentally different way from any possible conception of vital memory, of the persistence or the effacement of an impression. Why so? Because it's important to see that as soon as we introduce the signifier into the real – and it is introduced into the real simply from the moment we start speaking, less still from the moment when simply we count – everything that is apprehended in the realm of memory is taken up in something that essentially structures it in a way that is fundamentally different from anything that can be conceived of in a theory that is founded on the theme of vital property, pure and simple.

This is what I try to illustrate, clearly in a metaphorical way, when I speak to you about the future perfect, and when I bring in a fourth phase after the third. If one takes the fourth phase as a point of arrival, any one of the four symbols can feature there because the fourth phase has the same function as the second phase. If you set down an α, β, γ, or δ in this fourth phase, certain eliminations will result from it at the second and third phases. This can serve as an image of what comes into focus in an immediate future once it has become – in relation to a goal, a determined project – the future perfect. That certain signifier-elements should be rendered impossible by this simple fact is something that I will illustrate metaphorically as the function that we can give to what on this occasion I shall call the impossible signifier, the caput mortuum of the signifier.

What I want to stress today is that this is, of course, where I broke off my development. However, as people might quibble in the name of some kind of false evidence that might arise from the fact that not every facet of mystery vanishes away, because laws can be extracted from it – laws that are just as straightforward – upon consideration, in a differentiated fashion, of the terms at the different vertices in the parallelepipedic construction I have given you, this is not the question. What I would like you to hold in your minds for a moment is simply that this means that as soon as there is graphia, there is orthographia.

I'm going to illustrate this for you right away in a different manner, which might have a more conclusive value in your eyes, even though I didn't just concoct all this as some kind of mathematical excursion, with the incompetence that characterises me as much as everyone else. You would be wrong to think that. First, these are not items that I merely tarried with overnight. Second, I got a mathematician to check it. Please don't think, just because I've added this further precision, that the slightest element of incertitude or fragility might have crept into it.

So, as soon as there is graphia, there is orthographia. I begin with this simple hypothesis, but not in the sense that the word hypothesis is usually understood, rather in the sense of a definition of the action or the exceedingly straightforward premises that result therefrom. I begin with the odd, and do not do what I could equally have done at the start, which would be to distinguish, as I was told, between the odd with two light feet at the beginning and the odd with two light feet at the end, the anapaest and the dactyl. I didn't do that, and the interest of the question lies precisely here. I'm using certain definitions, which perhaps indeed are quite rudimentary, and from which certain intuitive elements have been purged, and especially this particularly gripping intuitive element that is grounded on scansion, which already entails a whole bodily engagement. This is where poetry begins. But we are not even moving into the realm of poetry. We are bringing in solely the notion of symmetry or asymmetry. I'm going to tell you why it seems to me to be of interest to curb the creation of the first signifier to this strict element.

Here I'm reproducing my table, with the second indeterminate phase, here – α, β, γ, δ. Now we come to the fifth phase. If we note down what is possible after an α, then what is possible after a β, and what is possible after each of the symbols, we can see that here [in the fourth phase] there can be α, β, γ or δ. You can see the excess of possibilities that we have. We have all the possible symbols, and we have them at two levels. Yet the most cursory examination of the situation shows you that if you choose this fifth phase as the point of arrival, and if you choose here for example the letter β – it could be any letter – and if you take as the point of departure another letter, for example the letter α, you will realise right away that in no case whatsoever can you have a letter from this line here [below the bar in the third phase – γ, δ]. By virtue of starting with α, you can have at the third phase only what features here above the line of dichotomy, that is to say α or β. However, what [exactly] is required in the third phase for you to have β in the fifth phase? It has to be an α, because β can only have α as its provenance.

The result of this is that when your design is to form a series in which two letters are determined at either end of a spacing of five moves, the middle letter, the one that stands at the third phase, is determined in an absolutely univocal way.

I could show you other properties that are just as striking but I'm confining myself to this one in the hope that this will succeed in bringing into your minds the dimension that has to be evoked. Indeed, what results from this property is that if you take any term in a sequence, by considering the term that lies two moves before and the term that lies two moves after, you can always check, and in a straightforward way that can be reckoned by eye without difficulty – this is a check that a typographer can perform – whether there is a fault at any point in the chain. It is enough to refer to the term that stands two moves before and the term that stands two moves after to see that in this case there can only be one possible letter here in the middle. In other words, as soon as there is the faintest emergence of a graphia, an orthographia emerges at the same time, that is to say, a means of checking for a possible fault.

This example has been put together for this purpose. It shows you how, from the most elementary emergence of the signifier, law emerges quite independently of any real element. On no account does this mean that chance is being steered. It means that law emerges with the signifier, in a way that is internally independent of any experience. This is what this speculation on the alphas, betas, gammas and deltas is intended to demonstrate.

It seems that for some minds these items entail very considerable resistance. This path nevertheless struck me as being a more straightforward one, to give a sense of a certain dimension, than recommending for example that you undertake a reading of Frege, or offering a commentary on his work. Frege was a mathematician of this century who dedicated himself to a science that at first blush looks to be as simple as can be, that of arithmetic. He thought it necessary to take wide detours – because the closer a thing is to simplicity, the harder it is to grasp – but detours that were surely altogether convincing when it came to demonstrating that there is no possible means of deducing the number 3 on the basis of experience alone. Of course, this leads us into a series of philosophical or mathematical speculations, and I didn't think it necessary to put you to this test.

Yet this is no less important because while, contrary to what Jung believed, no deduction from experience can make us accede to the number 3, it's quite certain that the symbolic order, as distinct from the real, enters the real like a ploughshare and introduces an originary dimension. In so far as we operate on this register of speech, we analysts have to take into account the originariness of this dimension. This is what is at stake in this instance.

I'm afraid I might wear you out, and I'll tell you something else. I'm going to share with you a more intuitive idea that occurred to me, one that is less certain in its affirmation.

This remark popped into my head one day when I was in a wonderful zoo, some thirty-odd miles north of London, where apparently the animals enjoy the greatest freedom since the bars are sunk into the ground at the bottom of concealed ditches. I was contemplating a lion surrounded by three magnificent lionesses that bore an altogether peaceful look of good temper and concordance. I asked myself why there was such good concordance among these animals, when as a rule, given what we know, I should have been seeing unmistakeable eruptions of rivalry and conflict. It seems to me that I didn't make such a big leap in my mind when I gathered that it's simply because lions don't know how to count up to 3.

You understand that it's because lions don't know how to count up to 3 that the lionesses do not feel the faintest sense of jealousy for one another, at least apparently. I offer this to your meditation. In other words, we ought never to neglect the introduction of the signifier when it comes to comprehending the emergence at issue whenever we find ourselves across from the appearance of the reality that is our principal object in analysis, the reality of inter-human conflict.

One could even go further and say that ultimately conflict exists because men don't know how to count any better than lions do, namely because this number 3 is never fully integrated. It is merely articulated. Of course, the dual relationship, which is fundamentally animal, maintains no less its supervalence across a certain zone, precisely that of the imaginary, and to the very extent that man does, even so, know how to count, in the final analysis something that we call conflict occurs. Were it not so difficult to manage to articulate the number 3, then this gap between the preoedipal and the Oedipal wouldn't be there. This is the same gap that of late we have been trying to cross as best we can, with the aid of little rope ladders and other contraptions. What I simply want to make you realise is that once one has started to try to cross it, one is always falling back on such contraptions. There is no veritable experiential crossing of the gap between 2 and 3.

This is exactly the point we have reached with little Hans.

We left little Hans at the moment when he is about to tackle the passage we defined, and which is called the castration complex.

We can clearly see that at the start he has not yet come to it, because he is playing with the Wiwimacher which is there and is not there. It's the Wiwimacher of his mother, or of the big horse, or the little horse, or his father's, and which is also his own, but ultimately it does not seem to amount to much more for him than a very fine object in a game of hide-and-seek, from which he is even capable of deriving the greatest pleasure.

I think that a certain number of you have consulted the text. This is the starting point, and it's the only thing at issue. At the start the child presents, without doubt to the attention of his parents, a sort of problematic of the imaginary phallus, which is everywhere and nowhere. It is presented as the essential element in his relation to what at that time is for him what Freud called the other person, in the most clear-cut fashion, namely the mother.

This is the point Hans has reached, and everything looks to be moving along perfectly well, as Freud underscores, thanks to a kind of liberalism, or even an educative laxity that was fairly typical of the pedagogy that, so it seems, emerged from these early days of psychoanalysis. We can see the child developing in the strongest, clearest, and happiest way. Now, it is after these fine antecedents that, to everyone's surprise, he comes to what we can call, without being too dramatic, a small hitch, the phobia. That is to say, from a certain point forth, the child took great fright at one privileged object, which happens to be the horse whose presence was already heralded in the text, metaphorically, when the child said to his mother, I thought you were so big you'd have a widdler like a horse. It's clear that if we can see the image of the horse appearing on the horizon, it's from this moment forth that the child enters the phobia.

In order to pursue this trajectory metaphorically through the observation on little Hans, it has to be understood how the child will pass from such a simple relationship, which ultimately is altogether blithe and clearly articulated, to the phobia.

Where then is the unconscious? Where is the repression? There doesn't seem to be any. It is with the greatest liberty that he questions his father and his mother about the presence or absence of the widdler, and tells them that he went to the zoo and saw an animal, a lion as it happens, endowed with a large widdler. The widdler plays a role that tends to become presentified for all sorts of reasons, which are not quite spelt out at the start of the observation, but which we can see appearing in hindsight. The fact that the child takes great pleasure in exhibiting himself, and some of his games too, show very well the essentially symbolic character of the widdler at the time. He will exhibit it in the dark. He will show it at the same time as a hidden object. He will also make use of it as an intermediate element for his relationships with the objects that catch his interest, that is, the young girls whom he asks to assist him and allows to watch him. The fact that his mother or his father assist him, which is also underscored, plays a major role in establishing his organs as an element of consideration from which he doubtless derives further pleasure by catching attention, interest, and even caresses from a certain number of people around him.

This is the point we've reached when this thing is about to arise. To get some idea of the prevailing harmony prior to the phobia, note how Hans is showing on the imaginary plane the most formally typical attitudes one may expect from what in our harsh language we call virile aggression. With the little girls he is performing a courtship that is present to a greater or lesser extent, and which is differentiated into two patterns – there are the young girls whom he hustles, clasps and molests, and there are others whom he treats in the manner of Liebe per Distanz. These two patterns of relationship are highly differentiated, and are already very subtle, I would almost say very civilised, very ordered and very cultivated. The term kultivierte is used by Freud to designate the differentiation that Hans makes between his objects. He doesn't conduct himself in the same way with little girls whom he considers to be refined ladies, ladies of his world, as he does with the landlord's young daughters. So, this has every appearance of opening out onto the favourable prospect of what one might call the transference towards other female objects, the reinvestment of his sentiments with respect to the female object in the guise of the mother. We can conceive of there being something that was produced which contributed to this development that was facilitated, so we are told, by the particularly open relationship of dialogue, which didn't forbid the child any mode of expression in the slightest.

What happens? How might we try to broach this problem, because now it's a matter of pursuing step by step a critical reading of the observation and not merely offering a conspectus, which is what I've done so far?

I don't think I'm forcing the text when I tell you already what the sign of the underlying structuration is. This is the same structuration as the one I pointed out to you, of the child's relationship with the mother, on the basis of which the onset of the crisis can be conceived of in the form of the entrance, the bringing into play, of the real penis. There is something in the text that has never been commented on. The child dreams he is with little Mariedl, one of his playmates from the summer resort in the Austrian lakes. He gives his account of being with the young girl, and then, when his father is retelling the dream to the mother in his presence and saying how amusing it is that he should have dreamt about being with her, Hans makes a very nice rectification, Not with Mariedl, but ganz allein mit der Mariedl, quite alone with Mariedl. Like many other elements that abound in the observations, people cast this aside as mere childish talk, but this retort has all its importance. Freud puts it very well, everything carries a signification. Hans's retort is conceivable only within the imaginary dialectic which I laid out for you as the initial plane of the child's relations with his mother. Indeed, this scene occurs when he is three and three-quarters, his little sister having been born just three months before. So, not only with, but quite alone with, that is to say, one can be quite alone with her, and not have this intruder there, as is the case with the mother. There is no doubt about it, Hans takes six months to get used to the presence of his little sister.

I think that on the plane of such typical and classical remarks, this can only strike you as evident and satisfactory. Nevertheless, you know very well that this is not the plane on which I shall be staying. While the real intrusion of the other child in the relationship between the child and his mother certainly has all it takes to bring about some such critical moment or some such decisive anxiety, it still remains that I have no hesitation in accentuating this quite alone with because, whatever the position may be, a child is never alone with his mother. The full progression of a child's apparently dual relationship with his mother is marked by one absolutely essential element, which is that the child comes in – as the experience of the analysis of female sexuality assures us, this being the referential axis that has to be staunchly maintained given what Freud upheld to the very end concerning female sexuality – only as a substitute, as a compensation, in short as a reference to what the mother essentially lacks. This is what means that the child is never left quite alone, ganz allein, with the mother. Little by little the child learns that the mother situates herself as being marked by this fundamental lack, which she strives to fill, and in relation to which the child only ever brings her a satisfaction that we could provisionally call substitutive.

It is essentially on this basis that we are to conceive of any kind of fresh opening of the gap, any kind of reopening of the question, and especially the question that arises with real genital maturity, that is, in the boy, with the introduction of masturbation, this real jouissance with his own real penis. Nothing can be understood unless within this initial constellation, through which the crucial elements can be introduced that open onto the various outlets that constitute either an Oedipus complex with a normal outcome or an Oedipus complex that is broached more or less in a way that is negativised to a greater or lesser extent, and which is not at all a neurosis, as you are usually taught.

So, let's pick up from the point we've reached and make a brief remark.

The child has to uncover this dimension wherein the mother desires something beyond him, that is, beyond the object of pleasure that at first he feels himself to be for her and which he aspires to be. This situation can be conceived of, like any analytic situation, as I have taught you, only within the essentially intersubjective reference that always includes, simultaneously and correlatively, the originary dimension of each subject, yet also the reality of this intersubjective perspective such as it anchored in each subject. In other words, I am making the passing remark that something is veiled at the start and we will only come to unveil it at the end.

Yet you already know the observation well enough at least to be able to ask yourselves the question, and to refer to terms that I have used in the past, whether wisely or unwisely, namely the two essential terms of an altogether major division in the signifying approach to any reality whatsoever in a subject, metaphor and metonymy. This is very much a case where this distinction is to be applied, at least giving vent to so many question marks.

In any intersubjective situation such as it becomes established between child and mother, we will have, as it were, a preliminary question to ask ourselves. It will be preliminary, and probably it will be settled only at the end. In this function of substitution, what ultimately forms an image, as a way of expressing it, doesn't mean a thing. It's easy to say substitution. But try substituting a pebble for a hunk of bread when you put it in an elephant's trunk. He won't take it with quite the uniform tone you might suppose. It's not about substitution. It's about what this signifying substitution signifies. To spell it right out, it's a matter of finding out, in relation to the phallus that is the mother's object of desire, what the function of the child is for her. It's clear that if the child is the metaphor of her love for the father, this is not quite the same thing as being the metonymy of her desire for the phallus, which she does not have and never will have.

Which is it in this case? Everything in the mother's conduct with little Hans, whom she literally drags around with her everywhere, from the WC to her bed, clearly indicates that the child is an absolutely indispensable appendage for her. Hans's mother, of whom Freud is very fond, to whom Freud had previously been of assistance, this excellent and devoted mother, sehr besorgte, and pretty to boot, still finds the wherewithal to take off her knickers in front of her child. This is a very peculiar dimension. If there is one thing that illustrates very well what I just said about the essential dimension that lies behind the veil, then the observation on little Hans is it. Though there are many others too. Can't you see that in this case the child is the metonymy of the phallus for the mother?

This doesn't mean that she has greater consideration for the child's phallus. In truth, she shows very well – this person who is so liberal in matters of childrearing and what may be spoken of – when it comes to deeds and to laying a finger on the little thingummy that the child whips out for her, she is seized by a sudden dread – Das eine Schweinerei ist. After all, this is how it is in this kind of live dynamic. We need to try to give another lick of polish to this observation on little Hans to restore its shine.

So, you see, saying that the child is taken as a metonymy of the mother's desire for the phallus does not mean that he is taken up in the metonymy as a phallophore, but on the contrary that he is metonymic as a totality. This is where the drama takes shape. Everything would be all well and good for him were it a matter of his Wiwimacher, but it's not. It's him as a whole that's in question, and this is why the difference starts to become very seriously apparent when the real Wiwimacher comes into play. This real Wiwimacher becomes an object of satisfaction for Hans, and this is when what is called anxiety starts to be created. What is called anxiety hinges on the fact that he is able to gauge the full difference that lies between what he is loved for and what he is able to give.

Given the child's originary position in relation to the mother, what can he do? He is there to be an object of pleasure. Therefore, he is in a relationship that is fundamentally an imagined one. The best thing that can happen to him is to come out of this purely passive state. This primordial passivation is what is essential, and if we fail to see that this is where it is inserted, we understand nothing of the Wolf Man case study. Beyond this imaginary capture in which he has become ensnared on account of being his mother's object, and in which he gradually becomes aware of what he truly is, the best thing he can do is to imagine himself such as he is imagined, to pass over, so to speak, to the middle road. Once he starts also to exist as real, he doesn't have a great deal of choice. He can quite certainly imagine himself to be fundamentally other and rejected, something other than what is desired and as such outside the imaginary field where hitherto his mother could derive satisfaction from the place he occupied.

Freud underscores this. What is at issue is something that supervenes. An anxiety. But anxiety over what? We have traces of it. There is a dream from which he wakes up in tears because his mother was going to leave. On another occasion he says to his father Suppose you were to go away. It's about separation. We can complement these terms with numerous further details. His anxieties arise when he is separated from his mother and when he is with someone else. What is quite certain is that the anxieties are the first to appear, and Freud underscores how the sense of anxiety is distinct from phobia. But what is a phobia? It's not so easy to grasp.

We are going to try now to ascertain what it is.

One can, of course, blithely skip forwards and say that the phobia is the representative element in this. Fine, but where does it get you? Why is it such a singular representation? What role does it play?

Another trap consists in telling oneself that there is a finality and that the phobia must serve some purpose. Why, then, would it serve a purpose? Might there not also be things that serve no purpose? Why take it as settled in advance that the phobia serves a purpose? Maybe it serves precisely no purpose and everything would have come equally to pass had it not been there. Why have preconceived ideas about finality in this instance?

We are going to try to find out what the function of the phobia is. What is the phobia in this instance? In other words, what is the particular structure of little Hans's phobia? This will perhaps lead us to form some notions about what the general structure of a phobia is.

Either way, at this stage I would like to point out how the difference between anxiety and phobia is altogether tangible here.

I don't know whether the phobia is as representative as all that, because as we are going to see, it's rather hard to figure out what Hans is afraid of. He voices it in umpteen different ways, but an altogether singular residue remains. If you've read the observation, then you know that this horse, which is white, brown, black . . . – and these colours are not devoid of a certain interest – poses a riddle that through to the end of the observation is never solved. It has to do with goodness knows what black stain that it has around its muzzle, lower than the bridge of the nose, which turns it into a prehistoric animal. His father asks him, What do you mean? The piece of iron they have in their mouths? Hans replies No. It doesn't seem to be the harness either. And then when later Hans says it looks like a muzzle, for the last three days not a single horse has passed on which he could point out this 'muzzle'. Then finally, worn out, Hans says, Here comes a horse with something black on its mouth, and wants no more to do with it. What is most certain is that we never know what this black on the horse's mouth is.

A phobia is not, therefore, such a straightforward matter because it even includes these quasi-irreducible elements and so can scarcely be a representative. If there is one thing that gives a good sense of the negative hallucinatory element on which someone has recently expressed himself in one of those theoretical forays that periodically sprouts up in analysis, it's this kind of blurriness, because ultimately this is what appears to be the clearest thing about this horse's head. It is somewhat reminiscent of the horse's head above Venus and Vulcan in Titian's painting.[2]

One thing, however, is quite certain, and this is the radical difference between the two feelings, the sense of fear and the sense of anxiety that is created when all of a sudden the child feels himself to be something that in one fell swoop can be completely side-lined. Of course, the little sister prepares the question to the highest degree. The crisis opens against a backdrop that reaches much deeper, when the ground falls away from under his feet upon his realisation that he can no longer fulfil his erstwhile function in any way whatsoever. He can no longer be anything. Quite simply, he is nothing more than something that looks like it is something, but at the same time is nothing, and which is called a metonymy.

I'm using a term which we have already seen. Metonymy is the procedure of realist novels. If a realist novel can hold our interest it's not because of all the minor realistic glimmer that is put before us, because ultimately such a novel only ever amounts to a piling up of snapshots. If these snapshots hold our interest it's precisely because, behind it, they always aim at something else. They take aim exactly at what looks to be most contrary, that is to say, everything that is missing. This means that, far beyond these many details, beyond the entirety of scintillating pebbles laid out for us, there is something that tethers us. The more metonymic the novel is, the more it aims at this beyond-zone.

So, our dear little Hans suddenly finds himself precipitated, or at the very least precipitable, through his metonymic function. To say this word in a way that is more vivid than theoretical, he imagines himself as a nothingness.

What happens once the phobia has entered the fray of his existence? One thing in any case is certain – faced with the anxiety-horses, the Angstpferde, it's not anxiety that he feels, it's fear. He is afraid that something real will happen. He tells us that there are two things that make him afraid – that the horses might bite, and that they might fall. The difference between anxiety and phobia is quite literally that anxiety is without object. Here, I'm merely repeating what Freud said, because he spelt it out perfectly. What is at stake in the phobia is not at all anxiety, in spite of the tonality that Hans here lends to the horses. The horses arise from anxiety, but what they bring is fear. In a certain sense, fear always bears on something real that can be voiced and named. These horses can bite, and they can fall.

They have a good many further properties that can harbour within them the trace of the anxiety that is at issue, and perhaps indeed there is some relation between them. We will be taking a look at the relations between this blurriness, this kind of black stain, and something that appears beneath, which shines through from behind the blackness that starts to blur, but in the lived experience of anxiety. Little Hans is afraid, but afraid of what? It's not a fear of one horse, but of horses, such that from this moment forth the world seems to be punctuated by a whole series of points of danger, points of alarm, which in a certain sense restructure it.

In keeping with the indication from Freud, who on one page poses himself questions about the function of phobia and advises us to refer to other cases to settle these questions, let's not forget that one of the most widespread and typical forms of phobia is agoraphobia. Afterwards we will be seeing what constitutes a phobia, whether is it a morbid entity or a syndrome, but agoraphobia is surely something that in itself brings its own value. Here we have the world punctuated by alarm signals which sketch out a field, a domain or an area. If we have to try absolutely to indicate in which direction takes shape not the function, because we mustn't rush here, but rather the sense, of the phobia, it's that it introduces a structure into the child's world. In a certain sense it brings to the fore the function of an interior and an exterior. Until then the child was, all in all, in his mother's interior. He has now been rejected from it, or has imagined himself to be rejected from it, into anxiety. And so here he is, trying, with the aid of the phobia, to establish a new order of interior and exterior. A series of thresholds starts to bring structure to the world.

It's not so easy. I'm sure there would be a great deal to learn here from a study of certain elements that have been furnished by ethnography, from the way spaces are constructed in a village. In primitive civilisations, villages are not built just any old how. There are fields that have been cleared and others that have been left untouched, and in the midst of all this there are further limits that signify things that are truly fundamental with respect to the bearings at the disposal of these people who stand in greater or lesser proximity to their extrication from Nature. There would be much to learn from this and perhaps in time I shall say a word or two about it.

Either way, there is a threshold, and there is also something that presents as an image of what protects the threshold, the Schutzbau or the Vorbau, the defensive outpost or the barrier, these being the terms with which Freud expressly articulates phobia. It's something that is erected further out towards the point of anxiety.

Already, something is becoming apparent to us here. It is starting to hold together and to show us its function. I simply want to avoid going too quickly, and I ask you not to stick at this level. One generally contents oneself with little. And after all, to have transformed anxiety into fear is a nice idea. Fear is apparently more reassuring than anxiety. But nor is this certain.

Today I simply want to punctuate how we absolutely cannot mark out fear as a primary element, a primordial element, in the construction of the ego, contrary to what has been voiced in the most categorical manner, as the base of his entire doctrine, by someone whom I'm not about to name and who occupies a leadership position in a certain school that is more or less rightfully termed Parisian. On no account can fear be regarded as a primitive element, as a final element, in the structure of neurosis. We can see that fear intervenes in neurotic conflict as an element that defends, from a point that is posted further out, against something that is utterly other and which of its very nature is without object, namely anxiety. Phobia is precisely what allows us to articulate this.

I shall stop for today on this Vorbau of my disquisition, having led you to the precise point at which the question of phobia is posed, in relation to what it is led to respond to. I ask you to take the word respond in the most profound sense of the term. We shall try next time to see where the ensuing sequence of items can lead us.

Symbolic transposition of the imaginary

Let's resume our walk through the observation on little Hans.

Walking is not a bad way of recognising that one is within a considered space. For me, however, it's a matter of teaching you to imagine the topography of a field without falling back onto the routes that have already criss-crossed it. It's a matter of perceiving when, for example, you might have come back to your starting point without realising, or else to reflect, when you are in a place as perfectly independent and familiar to you as your bathroom, that were you to drill through the wall you would be on the first floor of the neighbouring bookshop. This is not something that will often pop into your minds. I would even say that it's a matter of perceiving, when you take your bath each day, that work is going on in the bookshop next door and that this is an arm's length away. And then they say, He's one hell of a metaphysician, this Lacan fellow!

Yet this is more or less what it's about. It's about enabling you to spot certain connections and, by the same stroke, making you perceive the elements of the overall plan such that you will not be reduced to what I would call, quite intentionally, the cérémonial, the protocol, of charted itineraries.

So, here we are with little Hans, having reached the point at which, in a situation where everything had been moving along fairly well, anxiety and phobia arise. I remind you that I distinguished one from the other and in this respect I was in strict conformity with what you can find in Freud's text.

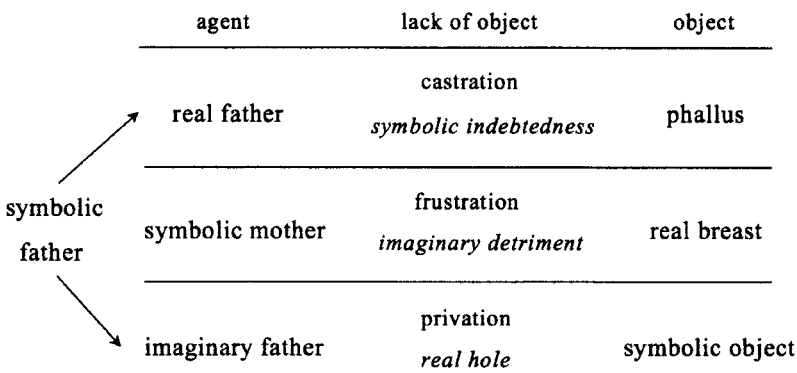
It's about topography, and not some random walk, though indeed it's by taking you on an unusual walk that I hope to represent this topography for you. Unusual as it is, this walk has already been paced out. It was paced out in the observation on little Hans.

I simply want to show you the kinds of things that the first imbecile who comes along could find here – except a psychoanalyst, because an analyst is not the first imbecile who comes along.



The symbolic mother becomes real precisely in so far as she manifests herself in her refusing of love. The object of satisfaction itself, the breast, becomes symbolic of frustration, the refusing of the love object.

The real hole of privation is this thing that does not exist. The real being full by its very nature, one has to introduce a symbolic object into it in order to make a real hole.

What's at stake? We have arrived at a point in the so-called preoedipal process that can be defined as follows. To turn himself into an object of love for this mother, who for him is the most important thing there is and who is even what essentially carries import, the child is progressively led to realise that he must shift into a third-party position. He must slide in, squeeze himself in, somewhere between his mother's desire, which he learns to experience, and the imaginary object that is the phallus.

We have to posit this because it's the most straightforward representation that allows us to synthesise a whole series of accidental happenings that are inconceivable unless they are taken as the product of this structure of the imaginary and symbolic relationship during the preoedipal period. As I told you, this is strictly spelt out in the chapter from the Three Essays on Sexuality entitled Die infantile Sexualforschung, that is to say, The Sexual Researches of Childhood or Infantile Theories on Sexuality. There you will find it formulated that what are broadly called perversions are to be conceived of and explained in relation to the childhood theory of the phallic mother and the necessity of passing through the castration complex.

One can still hear people maintaining that perversion is something fundamentally instinctual, an underlying trend,[1] something like a direct cutting of corners in the direction of the satisfaction that constitutes its true density and balance. They think that in this way they are interpreting Freud's notion that perversion is neurosis in negative, as though perversion were in itself the satisfaction that is repressed in neurosis, as though the latter were the same thing in positive. It's actually the exact opposite, because the negative of a negation is on no account necessarily its positive, as is demonstrated by the fact that Freud roundly affirms that perversion is structured in relation to everything that takes on an order around the absence and presence of the phallus. Perversion always bears some relation, even if only on the horizon, to the castration complex in its own right. In consequence it stands – as it were from the genetic point of view – on the same level as neurosis. It is structured in such a way as to be its negative or, more exactly perhaps, its inverse, but it is just as structured as neurosis. It is structured by the same dialectic, to employ a vocabulary that is closer to the one I use here.

The importance that Freud ascribed at a very early date to the notion of childhood sexual theories and their role in the child's developing economy means that it is incontestably worthwhile us tarrying with this, though its full opening-up, in the form of the chapter I just mentioned, was only added to the Three Essays long after its first edition, in 1915 I believe. One shortcoming of the German edition is that it doesn't include any mention of the date on which each chapter was integrated into the book's composition.

The importance of childhood theories of sexuality in libidinal development ought in itself to instruct a psychoanalyst to maintain some sense of proportion when it comes to the sweeping notion of intellectualisation which has been wielded here, there and everywhere with its somewhat pejorative tone. I mean that it ought to teach us to realise that something which on first blush might present as being situated in the intellectual domain clearly holds an importance that the simple and sweeping opposition between the intellectual and the affective could never account for. What are called childhood theories, or the child's activity of research concerning sexual reality, correspond to a necessity that is quite different from what we label – unduly, but it has to be recognised as a kind of diffuse notion – as the superstructural character of intellectual activity which is more or less implicitly admitted in what might be termed the font of belief with which common consciousness aligns.

Something quite different is at issue in this activity. It concerns something that lies, if this term may also be employed, in the body as a whole, where its common sense runs much deeper. It lies much deeper because it envelops all of the subject's activity and motivates what might equally be called the affective themes, which means that it steers the subject's affects or affections along the lines of key images. All in all, it is correlative to a whole series of things carried out in the widest sense, things which become manifest in actions that are fully reducible to utilitarian ends. Let's classify this full set of actions or activities under a term that is perhaps not the best, nor the most encompassing, but which I select for its expressive value when I qualify such activities as cérémoniales [in the sense of protocolic], and not only as cérémonielles.

I'm referring to the entirety of everything that can be included within this register in both individual and collective life, and you know that there is not a single example of a human activity that supresses them. Even civilisations with a firm utilitarian and functional bent peculiarly see these ceremonial activities being reproduced in the most unexpected corners. There has to be some reason behind this. To spell it right out, what we must refer to in order to bring into focus the exact value of what are called childhood theories of sexuality, and indeed the full order of the child's activities which are structured around them, is the notion of myth.

There's no need to be a mental giant, I mean, to have gone into this notion of myth in detail, though this nevertheless is my intention here. I'm going to try to do so carefully, stage by stage, because it also strikes me as necessary to accentuate further the continuity between our field and the referential elements to which I believe they need to be linked. Not that I claim on any account, as I once was told, to be offering you a general metaphysics, nor to be covering the whole field of reality, but simply to be speaking to you about our reality and the realities that border on it, those that are most immediately connected to it. This is precisely so as not to fall into an unwarranted world-system, into a projection that is quite insufficient and impoverished yet very often performed when our domain is projected into a whole series of realms and layered fields of reality on the pretext that they might have something to do with what we do, since the macro can always be found in the micro. No such projection could ever exhaust reality, or even the sum of human problems. On the other hand it would be wrong to isolate our field completely and to refuse to see what within it is, not analogous to, but directly in connection with, I mean directly geared into, a reality that is accessible to us through other disciplines and other human sciences. This has to be done if we are properly to situate our domain and even, simply, to find our bearings within it.

This is how we are now coming quite naturally to the notion of childhood theories, because for as long as I've been speaking to you about Hans you've been able to note that this observation is a labyrinth and even, on first approach, a muddle, precisely due to the place held by a whole series of Hans's flights of fancy. Some of these flights of fancy are very rich and give the impression of a proliferation, a wealth, which cannot fail to strike you as falling within this class of theoretical elaborations that plays such a major role.

We are going to approach myth simply as though it were a primary fact.

What is called myth, whether it's religious or folkloric, at whichever stage of its passing down it might be taken, is something that presents as a sort of narrative. Many different things may be said about this narrative and various structural aspects may be taken up. For example, it may be said to be atemporal. One might also try to define its structure with respect to the sites it defines. One can take it in its literary form, which quite strikingly shares some kinship with poetic creation while at the same time being very distinct from it, in the sense that myth is linked to certain constants that are absolutely not submitted to subjective invention. It is also something that would allow us at least to indicate the problems it poses.

I think that on the whole we can say that myth has a fictive character but that in itself this fiction harbours a stability which means that it is scarcely malleable to any modification that might be brought to it. Or, more specifically, it entails that any modification implies, ipso facto, another modification, and this invariably suggests the notion of a structure. On the other hand, this fiction is but a singular relation to something that is always implied behind it, and which even carries within it its formally indicated message, to wit, a singular relation to truth. This is also something that cannot be detached from myth.

Somewhere in the Séminaire sur 'La lettre volée', I wrote, in connection with the fact that I was analysing a work of fiction, that at least in a certain sense this operation was quite legitimate because in any correctly structured fiction one can lay one's finger on the structure that in truth itself may be designated as the same as that of fiction. The structural necessity brought forth by any expression of truth is precisely a structure that is the same as that of fiction. Truth has a structure, so to speak, of fiction.

These truths, or this truth, this aim of myth, presents with a character that is still utterly striking, a character that presents first and foremost as inexhaustible. I mean that it partakes of what may be called – to employ, briefly, an old term – the character of a schema, in the Kantian sense. It's much closer to structure than to any content, and can be found again, re-applied, in the most material sense of the word, across all sorts of data, with the kind of ambiguous efficacy that typifies all myth. That which is structured, that which is most adequate to this kind of cast furnished by the category of myth, is a certain type of truth, and, to restrict ourselves to our field and our experience, we cannot fail to see that what is at issue here is a relationship of man – but with what?

We are not about to give an immediate reply to this with what?, and when we do, it will be neither randomly nor lightly. Were we to reply with Nature, this would, I think, quickly leave us dissatisfied, in view of the remarks I've made on the fact that Nature, such as it presents to man, such as it coapts to him, is always deeply denatured. Were we to reply with Being, we would certainly not be inexact, but perhaps we would be going a little too far and ending up in philosophy, indeed the most recent philosophy of our friend Heidegger, as pertinent as this reference is. We surely have references closer at hand and terms that have been more fully articulated, which we can immediately broach in our experience.

We need only perceive that this has to do with themes of life and death, of existence and non-existence, and especially of birth, that is, the appearance of what does not yet exist. On the one hand, this is linked in particular to the existence of the subject himself and to the horizons that his experience brings him. On the other, this is linked to the fact that he is the subject of a sex, and most especially his own, his natural sex. Our experience shows us that the mythical activity is limited to these themes, and it is deployed in the child. Therefore, we can see here, and with ease, that in its content and its aim, this mythical activity is at once in agreement yet not completely in coincidence with what we find under the specific term of myth in ethnographic exploration.

In their presentation as fiction, myths always aim to a greater or lesser extent not at man's individual origin but at his origin as a species – the creation of man, the genesis of his fundamental nurturing relationships, the invention of the so-called major human resources such as fire, agriculture, animal domestication, and so on. This is also the fiction that explains how man came to be in relation with something that is constantly brought into question in myths, namely a secret force which may be maleficent or beneficent but which is essentially typified by its sacred character.

This sacred might is variously designated in the mythical narratives, but it certainly allows us to situate it in a manifest identity with man's relationship to the power of signification and most especially to its power as a signifying instrument. This power is what means that man introduces into Nature something that, on account of distancing him, brings him closer to the universe. It makes him capable of introducing into the natural realm not only his own needs and factors of transformation submitted to these needs, but something that certainly goes beyond this, the notion of a profound identity, which is never completely grasped nor even grasped in anything but a roundabout way, between the power that he possesses, to wield or to be wielded on account of being included in a signifier, and the power that he possesses to incarnate the agency of this signifier in a series of interventions that, at the start, are not posited as gratuitous activities, as the pure and simple introduction of the signifying instrument into the chain of natural things.

These myths, whose relation of contiguity with the mythical creation of childhood is indicated well enough by the comparisons I have just set out, pose us the problem of something that has already been going on for some time now, namely the investigation of myths or, if you prefer, scientific or comparative mythology. This has steadily developed into a method of formalisation which is already indicating that a certain step forward has been taken. The fruitful character of this formalisation further indicates that this is the direction that ought to be pursued, rather than turning to the method of analogies and the various culturalist or naturalist references that have thus far been employed in the analysis of myths.

This formalisation extracts from myths what might be called elements or units which at their own level possess the character of a structural functioning that is comparable, without for all that being identical, to the one that in the study of linguistics extracts elaborations of various modern taxemic elements. It has been possible to build and to put into effective practice an isolation of elements that we may define as the units of mythical construction, which have been labelled mythemes.[2]

By pursuing the experiment through a series of myths that have been put to this test of decomposition so as to see how their recomposition functions, a surprising unity has been noted between myths that in appearance stand very far apart, on the condition that analogies between the face-value of the different myths are set aside. For example, saying that an act of incest and a murder are two equivalent things is not something that would come to mind on first approach, but the comparison of two myths, or two stages of a single myth, can bring such a thing to light. Consider for instance what happens to a myth across two different generations. By positing a constellation that looks altogether comparable to the little cube I drew on the blackboard last week, and by arranging at the different vertices of this construction the terms father and mother, a mother who is unknown to the father–subject, you will also find, in this first generation, incest. When you move on to the following generation, you will find point by point, and in keeping with laws of which the sole interest is that they can offer a strict and unambiguous formalisation, the overlapping notion of twin brothers, which is in some sense the predicted transformation of the father–mother couple from the first generation. Thus you can see the murder of Polynices taking up its place, through this operation of transformation, in the stead of the incest. This operation is already regulated by a certain number of structural hypotheses about how myth ought to be treated.

So, this gives us an idea of the weight, the presence, and the instance of the signifier as such, its specific impact. What is isolated here is always in some sense what is most hidden, because it has to do with something that in itself signifies nothing but which assuredly bears the full order of significations. If something of this nature exists, nowhere is this more tangible than in myth.

This necessary preamble indicates the angle from which I think we should approach, in order to put them to this test, the abundance of themes that we meet in the observation on little Hans and which on first blush look, quite frankly, as though they have been made up.

How genuine are Hans's imaginative themes? Freud himself mentions the possibility that they might have been suggested to him by comments that could be supposed of an interlocutor.

But is the term suggestion to be taken in its simplest sense? Is it to be taken as something that is voiced by one subject then to pass into another subject in the state of an admissible truth, at the very least in a form that is accepted with a certain character of belief, like a garment that clothes the reality that is being received? The very term suggestion implies some doubt as to how genuine the construction in question is. It's a construction that is received by the subject, and of course there is no notion that can more easily be seen – why not? – as a legitimate critical element. And who more than us could imagine that there is something here that warrants fuller consideration still? We maintain that the cultural elements of the symbolic organisation of the world are elements that, by their very nature, belong to no one and so have to be received and learnt. Isn't this something that furnishes the incontestable fundament to this notion of suggestion?

What is equally striking is that not only does this suggestion exist in the case of little Hans, but we are able to see it unfolding, out in the open. The father's way of questioning Hans is tantamount to a continual and sometimes insistent inquisition, even bearing the signature of a steering of the child's responses. As Freud underscores several times, the father certainly intervenes in a way that is rough, coarse and even downright heavy-handed. Furthermore, he shows all kinds of misunderstanding in his reception of his son's responses, which he scrambles to understand, but all too hastily. This is also underscored by Freud. What is likewise utterly explicit when reading the observation is that something occurs that is far from independent of this paternal interference, with all its defaults which are pointed out and designated by Freud. One can see Hans's deportment, and his constructions too, responding in the most palpable manner to one or another of his father's interventions. One can even see this taking on its own momentum from a certain point forth, and the phobia assumes a character of acceleration and hyper-productivity that is quite tangible.

Of course, it is of the utmost interest to see what these different moments of Hans's mythical production correspond to. There is something else that is quite manifest, which is the fact that this production, while having a character that is implicitly made-up, in the sense of gratuitously invented, is playful. After a recent patient presentation that I conducted, someone pointed out the imaginative character of some of the patient's constructions, which seemed to him to indicate an hysterical note of suggestion, of suggested effect in what the patient produced, when in fact it was easy to see that it was not that at all. Even though it was provoked or stimulated by a question, the patient's pre-delusional productivity manifested itself with its own stamp and force of proliferation, in strict accordance with its own structures.

This is not at all the same impression one has with Hans. At no point whatsoever does one have the impression of a delusional production. I would further say that one has the distinct impression of a playful production. It's not only about play, yet it's quite clear that everything is so playful that even Hans himself is in something of a pickle when it comes to bringing the whole thing to a close and sustaining a single path to which he can commit, after having come out with goodness knows what magnificent tall story verging on farce, for example the story of the stork's intervention in the birth of his little sister Hanna. He is quite capable of stating, I say, what I'm telling you isn't a bit true. Nevertheless, it still remains that what is apparent in this very game is not so much constant terms but rather a certain configuration. And while this configuration is sometimes fugitive, at other moments it can be grasped in a striking fashion.

This is what I wanted to introduce, this sort of structural necessity that presides over not only the construction of each of what may be called, with caution, Hans's little myths, but also their furtherance and transformation. I would especially like to draw your attention to the fact that what is important is not always necessarily their content. By content I mean the revival, which is arranged to a greater or lesser extent, of previous states of the soul, the anal complex for example.

The anal complex will be exhausted in everything that Hans allows himself to demarcate with respect to the lumf. Its appearance was perfectly unexpected for the father, and Freud tells us that he entirely concealed from Hans's father my expectation that there would turn out to be some such connection. Freud names the two themes that arise in the course of Hans's probing by his father – the anal complex[3] and, no more no less, the castration complex.

Let's not forget that in the analytic theory of the time, around 1906–1908, the castration complex was already a kind of crucial key for Freud but had not yet been brought into the full light of day that would reveal it as the central key. Far from it. It was one small key, lying around among others, that almost seemed to be nothing at all. What Freud ultimately means here is that the father was in no respect aware of something that is related to the essential relation that makes the castration complex the major peg through which passes both the establishment and the resolution of the constellation, the ascendant and descendent phases of the Oedipus complex.

So, we can see little Hans reacting. He reacts all along to the interference of the real father, to being put in the hothouse under the crossfire of the father's interrogation to which he is exposed for a certain while, and which, when the observation is taken as a whole, proves to have been favourable to a veritable development in little Hans, even to a veritable culture. This is something that, given its richness, allows us to think that the phobia would not have borne such extensions and echoes without the paternal intervention, nor would it have borne in its centre this development and this richness, nor even perhaps a certain insistence that at one stage is so prevalent. This is admitted by Freud, and I would even say that he takes it on board when he admits that there might have been a momentary flaring-up, a precipitation, an intensification of the phobia under the father's action.

These are just some basic truths, but they still needed to be said. Let's pick things up from the point we've come to. So as not to leave you completely at a loss before this wealth of elements, I'm going to indicate the general scheme of what we will be trying to understand in the phenomenon of the analysis of Hans, its point of departure and its results. I think that with this scheme these elements will fall into order for us in a satisfactory way.

So, Hans is in a certain relation with his mother, into which is mixed his direct need for his mother's love and something that we have called the game of the intersubjective lure. It is enough to read the beginning of the observation to see that this luring game is manifest in the clearest fashion in the child's remarks, and this indicates that for him his mother must have a phallus. This doesn't mean, however, that this phallus is something real for him. On the contrary, in his remarks there is a constant eruption of the ambiguity that is made apparent by this relation within a playful perspective. In the end the child is fully aware of something, and at the very least indicates as much when he says, I was only just thinking . . ., and then breaks off. What he was thinking was, Does she have it or not? And he asks her, and he gets her to say – and who knows whether or to what extent the reply was satisfactory – that she has a Wiwimacher. This is the word in the observation. The French rendering, fait-pipi, does not fully translate this macher. It's a maker of wee, with the suggestion of a worker, an agent, as in Uhrmacher. A masculine gender is implied here, which can be found in other words that carry the prefix Wiwi.[4]

The child is in this intimacy, this connivance of the imaginary game with his mother, when suddenly he finds himself in a situation where, from one angle or another, a decompensation arises, because something happens that manifests itself through an anxiety that touches precisely on these relations with his mother.

Last time, we tried to see what this anxiety was responding to. We said that it was linked to various real elements that complicate the situation in some way. These real elements are not univocal. Among the mother's objects there are real elements that are new, for instance the birth of the little sister with all the reactions that this leads to in Hans, but these reactions do not come about immediately. It's only after fifteen months that the phobia breaks out. There is also the interference of the real penis, but this had also been there for a while before the complications arose. At least a year had gone by following the masturbation to which the child confessed thanks to the good relations that exist on the plane of speech between him and his parents.

We also noted, last time, whence these elements of decompensation can come into play.

From one angle, Hans is excluded. He falls out of the situation. He is ejected by the little sister. From another angle, something else is at stake. This is the interference of the phallus in a different form. I'm speaking about the masturbation. It's the same object, but it presents in an altogether different form. Let's say it right out. It has to do with the integration of sensations linked at the very least to turgescence and very possibly to something that we can go so far as to qualify as orgasm. Of course, it's not a matter of ejaculation. There is a question and a problem in this regard, which Freud doesn't resolve. At this stage he hasn't amassed enough observations to broach this difficult problem of orgasm in childhood masturbation. I'm simply pointing out to you that this lies on the horizon of our questioning.

It's peculiar that Freud doesn't ask himself the question of whether the row, the racket, the Krawall, which is one of the dreads that the child feels when faced with the horse, might not bear some relation with orgasm, and even an orgasm that would not be the child's own. It might be related to some scene he perceived between the parents, for example. Freud readily accepts his parents' assertion that the child could not have glimpsed anything of the sort. This is a small riddle, and we shall have the absolutely certain solution to it.

All of our experience indicates to us that in children's pasts, in their lived experience and their development, there is something that is very hard to integrate yet which is clearly manifested. I've been insisting for a long time now – I believe it's in my medical thesis or an almost coeval text – on the ravaging character, most especially for paranoiacs, of the first climactic, orgasmic sensation. Why for paranoiacs? We shall try to answer this en route, but we assuredly find in a very constant way such testimony of a character of harrowing invasion, of destabilising upsurge, that this experience presents for certain subjects. This is enough to indicate for us, here at this turn in the path, that the fact that the real penis is something new must play a role as an element that is integrated with difficulty.

None the less, given that this had already been going on for some time, it's not what presents at the forefront with respect to the outbreak of anxiety. What is it, in the end, that causes anxiety to arise at this moment, and only at this moment? The question plainly remains.

Here then is our little Hans, who has now arrived at the moment of the apparition of the phobia.

It wasn't Freud, but rather and without doubt – as the ensuing part of the text of the observation shows – the father who is corresponding with Freud who promptly forms the notion that there is something going on here that is linked to a tension with the mother. As to what triggers the phobia in particular, he states in the very first lines of his letter to Freud, with clarity that lends its full bearing to this first communication in the case history proper, that he is not able to specify the actual exciting cause. Whereupon he begins his description of the phobia.

What is it? Let's leave to one side the appearance of the phobia, and reflect.

We have attributed all this importance to the mother and to the child's imaginary symbolic relation with her. We have been saying that for the child the mother presents with the requirement of what she lacks, of this phallus that she doesn't have. We have said that this phallus is imaginary. For whom is it imaginary? It is imaginary for the child. Why have we been speaking about it like this? Well, because Freud told us that this always plays a role for mothers. Why so? Well, you will tell me, it's because he discovered this. But let's not forget that if he discovered it, it's because it's true. So, if it's true, why is it true?

It's a matter of finding out in what sense it is true, because analysts, and especially analysts of the feminine sex, regularly raise the objection that it's not so clear why women should be given over more than the rest to desiring precisely what they don't have, or to believing themselves endowed with it. Well, it's precisely for reasons that belong – let's limit ourselves to this – to the order of the existence of the signifier and its specific insistence. It's because the phallus has a symbolic value in the signifying system and is thereby retransmitted through each and every text of inter-human discourse in such a way that it imposes itself among other images, and in a supervalent way, on woman's desire.

Isn't the problem, precisely at this turn in the path, at this moment of decompensation, that the child should be taking this step that is literally an insuperable hurdle for him on his own? What is this step? Hitherto, he was playing with the phallus desired by his mother, with the phallus that for him became an element of his mother's desire, and so this was something he had to pass through in order to captivate his mother. This phallus was an imaginary element. What is at stake now is for him to manage to do something that in itself is insurmountable, namely to realise that this imaginary element has a symbolic value.

In other words, the system of the signifier, or the system of language, to define it synchronically, or the system of discourse, to define it diachronically, is something that the child enters at the outset, but without entering the full breadth, the full scope, of the system, because he enters on an occasional basis in connection with his relations with his mother, who is there or who is not there. However, this first symbolic experience is something that is utterly insufficient. The full system of relations with the signifier cannot be constructed around the fact that something that one loves is there or is not there. We cannot content ourselves with just two terms. There have to be others.

A minimum of terms is necessary for the symbolic to function. It's a matter of knowing whether it's three of them, whether it's four of them – it's certainly not three, because the Oedipus complex gives us three terms, yet certainly implies a fourth when it tells us that the child has to come through the complex. This means that there has to be someone who intervenes in this business, and this is the father.

We've been told how the father intervenes. We've been told the whole little story about rivalry with the father and inhibited desire for the mother, but at the level we've reached, moving forward step-by-step, when we found ourselves in one particular situation we said that the father has a very curious presence. We shall see whether it's simply this role of presence, in other words this degree of paternal shortcoming, that plays its role in the affair. Are we to fall back on these so-called real and concrete characteristics to which it is hard to bring a final word? For what does it mean that the real father falls more or less short in this instance?

On this point, each commentator contents himself with an approximation. In the end, we are told, and we are not supposed to linger over it, in the name of goodness knows what logic that is purported to be our own, that things are even more than contradictory. Well, we are going to see that, on the contrary, all of this falls into order in accordance with the fact that certain images have a symbolic functioning for the child.

What does this mean? It means that those images which thus far reality has afforded Hans may well be abundant, present and profuse, but they lie in a state of manifest incoordination. For Hans, it's a matter of aligning the world of the maternal relationship – which, up to now had been functioning harmoniously for him – with this element of imaginary opening, or lack, which made him so amusing and even so exciting for his mother. At one point we are told that his mother becomes somewhat fretful when the father tells her to send the child out of the bed, and she protests, she plays around and starts to flirt. What has been translated as rather irritated is wohl gereizt, which here means to be all worked up. There's a reason for Hans's being there of course. We will learn why he is there in his mother's bed. It's one of the main axial lines of the observation.

I'm going to illustrate what I've just said about these images which are first and foremost those that arise from the relationship with the mother, but which are also other images, new images, which the child confronts rather well. Since his little sister has been around, and since things have simply no longer been holding together in the world with his mother, two notions have arisen, which he knows how to face up to very well on the plane of reality – the notion of big and small, and the notion of what is there and what is not there, but which appears. So, there is a notion of growth and emergence, a notion of proportion and size. These are different phases in which big and small find themselves confronted with different antinomies, depending on the pairings. We can see him handling all this exceedingly well. When he speaks about his little sister, he says, She's not got any teeth yet, which implies that he has a very accurate notion of this emergence.

Freud ironises on the side, because he has no need to think that the child is a metaphysician. What the child says is quite sane and normal. He very rapidly faces up to notions which are by no means self-evident. First, there is emergence, the appearance of something new. Second, the growth of the other – she will grow, or what she doesn't have will grow. There's no reason to be ironic about this. And then there is a third term, which seems to be the simplest but which is not given immediately – that of proportion or size.

They will speak to the child about all this, and it seems that it's still too soon for him to accept the explanations they will give him. The father will tell him that there are some who are without, that the feminine sex has no phallus. But this child – who is quite capable of handling these notions in a cogent manner because previously he handled them both deftly and pertinently – far from being content with these explanations, takes detours that on first approach look astounding, frightening, morbid, and which look to be part of the phobia. Where does this lead him? Well, to something that we shall see at the end, to the solution that he finds to the problem. But what is quite plain to see is that there are paths to this solution, paths that he must follow, and which, while they amount to this apprehension of forms that might be satisfactory for objectifying the real, nevertheless take a frightfully wide berth in relation to it. From one instant to the next we will meet this passing over, this raising up, from the imaginary to the symbolic, and you will see of course that this cannot be produced without something that is invariably a structuration in circles that are at least ternary. Next time I shall be showing you some consequences of this.

For now, however, I'm going to choose an example for you.

On Freud's instruction – and you will be seeing next time what these instructions of Freud's mean – the father hammers it home to Hans that women do not possess a phallus and so his searching for one is futile. That it should have been Freud who told the father to step in in this way is an enormity unto itself, but let's leave that to one side.

What happens after this intervention by the father? Hans reacts with the giraffe fantasy.

In the middle of the night the child comes into his parents' bedroom to take refuge. They ask him whether perhaps he is afraid, but it's not clear whether he's afraid or not. Either way, he falls back to sleep in his parents' bed and they carry him into his room. The next morning they ask him what it was all about. It's a fantasy. There are two giraffes.[5] A big giraffe, and a little giraffe that is zerwutzelte, which is translated as crumpled but really means rolled into a ball. They ask him what he means and he shows them by taking a piece of paper and scrunching it up into a ball.

How is this interpreted? Right away, the father has no doubt that of the two giraffes, the big one is the symbol of the father. The little one, which the child grabs and sits on top of while the big one cries out, is a reaction to the maternal phallus. The longing for the mother and her lack are named, perceived, acknowledged and pinpointed by the father, straightaway, as the signification of the little giraffe. Moreover, this doesn't stop him, in a way that doesn't strike him as contradictory, from reading the couple of the big and small giraffe as the father–mother couple. Naturally, all of this poses the most interesting problems. One can endlessly debate whether the big giraffe is the father, whether the little giraffe is the mother. Indeed, for the child it's a matter of regaining possession of the mother, to the father's greatest irritation and even anger. Yet this anger is never a real anger. The father never allows himself to slip into anger, and little Hans puts his finger on this – You ought to be cross, you should be jealous. Unfortunately, the father is never there to embody the god of Thunder.

Let's pause for a while on what is quite obvious and visible. A large giraffe and a small giraffe are of the same stuff. One is the double of the other. There is the aspect of big and small, but there is also the aspect of always being a giraffe. In other words, here we find something that is altogether analogous to what I was telling you last time when I said that the child was caught in the mother's phallic desire as a metonymy. The child is the phallus in his totality. So, when it's a matter of restoring to the mother her phallus, the child phallicises the mother as a whole entity in the form of a double. He produces a metonymy of the mother, which hitherto was merely the enigmatic phallus that is at once desired, credited and not credited, submerged in ambiguity, in belief, and in the term of reference, namely the luring game with the mother. All of this turns into something that starts to hang together as a metonymy. And as though it weren't enough simply to show us the creation of the image and its introduction into a properly symbolic game, in order to explain to us that we've passed from the image to the symbol – this little giraffe about which no one in the observation comprehends anything, even though it's so visible – Hans tells us that the little giraffe is so very much a symbol that it can be crumpled like a little giraffe on a sheet of paper. We have come to the point that the little giraffe is no more than a drawing.

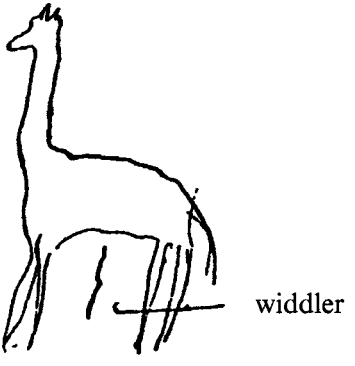
The passage from the imaginary to the symbolic can be no better translated than in these things that in appearance are absolutely contradictory and unthinkable, because you always turn what children say into something that from either side partakes of the domain of three dimensions when actually there is also something in the play of symbols that is in two dimensions. I pointed out to you in The Purloined Letter the moment when there remains nothing more of the letter than something that the queen holds in her hands, when there is nothing more to be done but to scrunch it up into a ball. This is the same gesture by which Hans strives to make his parents understand what is at issue in the little giraffe. At that moment, the little crumpled up giraffe signifies something that belongs utterly to the same realm as the drawing of the giraffe that had been made once before.



The drawing of the giraffe

Here it is, with its widdler, which was already on the path to the symbol. Whereas the drawing of the giraffe is freely sketched and each of the members is in its right place, the widdler that has been added to it is something that is truly graphic. It's a linear stroke, and, to boot, so that we are fully aware of this, it is separate from the giraffe's body.

We are now entering the major play of the signifier, the game on which I gave a seminar, on The Purloined Letter. The little giraffe is a double of the mother, reduced to the support that is always necessary as a vehicle for the signifier as such. It is something that can be held, crumpled and sat on. It's such a loving testimony that, even so, it has something of a draft or a jotting about it.

Observe if you will that this is not the only point at which we can grasp the passage from the imaginary to the symbolic. There are all kinds of other points. We can see a parallel gradually settling in between the Wolf Man case study and the observation on little Hans, which allows us to compare these paths along which the phobic image is approached. We have yet to determine the signification of this phobic image, but in order to determine it we need to turn to how it is approached in the child's experience. In the case of the Wolf Man, it is plainly an image, but an image that is in a picture-book, and the child's phobia is the wolf from the book. In the case of Hans, this is not absent either. The image comes from a page of his picture-book, the same page that shows the stork bringing children to a chimney top, which Hans reads as a red box. As chance would have it, on this same page there is a picture of a horse being shod.

Now, what are we going to find? Since we are looking for structures, what we are going to find throughout this observation are logical instruments being played out in a kind of turning game where each complements the other, forming a kind of circle through which little Hans seeks a solution, but a solution to what? In this series of elements or instruments that are called mother, child and phallus, the phallus is the new element that is no longer merely something that is played with, because it has become unruly. It has, if it may be expressed like this, its whims and fancies. It has its needs, its demands, and it wreaks havoc everywhere. It's a matter of finding out how this is going to be settled, that is to say, how, at least within this original trio, things are going to be fixed down.

We are going to see a triad emerging.

First, my penis is angewachsen, fixed in. Here we have a form of guarantee. Unfortunately, no sooner had he been led to profess that his penis is fixed in than the phobia promptly flared up. It has to be believed, therefore, that there is also some danger to its being fixed in.

Then we see another term appearing, the boring of a hole. We can see it appearing in umpteen different forms when we know how to hunt it out in a way that conforms to the mythical analysis of themes. First of all, in a dream, Hans himself has a hole bored in him.[6] Then he cuts a hole in a rubber doll. There are things that are bored with a hole from the inside out, and others from the outside in.

Next, Hans comes across a third term, one which is particularly expressive because it cannot be deduced from natural forms. He introduces it as a logical instrument in his mythical passage, and it truly constitutes the third term at the apex of the triangle formed together with the fixing-in and with the gaping hole that leaves an open void. If the penis is not fixed in, then there is no longer anything. So, there is a mediation. It can be put there and put back, removed, and put back again. In short, it is detachable. What does the child use for this? He introduces the screw thread. The plumber or the fitter come by and do their unscrewing. Then the plumber comes by and unscrews his penis so that another, bigger one can be screwed in.

The introduction of this logical instrument, of this theme borrowed from his limited childhood experience, of this mythical element, will lead to a veritable resolution of the problem, which is that ultimately, through the notion that the phallus too is something that is taken up in the symbolic play, this phallus can be combined. It is fixed in when it has been put in, but it can be mobilised, it can circulate, and it is an element of mediation. It is from this moment forth that we find ourselves on the slope upon which the child will find his first respite in this frantic search for conciliatory myths that are never satisfactory, and which will lead us right to the final term of the solution that he will find, the approximate solution of the Oedipus complex.

This is to indicate for you the direction in which we need to analyse the terms and the child's use of the terms. Another problem, a no lesser one, is taking shape, which is the problem of the signifier-elements that he brings in by borrowing them from symbolised elements. The horse being shod is just one of the solutions, buried in the observation, to the problem of fixing-in the missing element and which as such can be represented by anything at all. Indeed, it is most readily represented by any object that in itself possesses sufficient hardness. We will see that ultimately the object that symbolises the phallus in the simplest way in the mythical construction is the stone. We find it everywhere in the major scene from the true resolutive dialogue with his father. The role of the stone can also be found in the horseshoe that is hammered into the horse's hoof. It also plays its role in the child's auditory panic, in his fright when the horse is pawing with its hoof, to which something is attached that surely is not properly attached, for which the child will at last find the solution of the screw thread.

In short, this progress from the imaginary to the symbolic constitutes an organising of the imaginary into myth, or at the very least into something that is on the way to a true mythical construction, that is to say, a collective mythical construction. This is why it reminds us in every respect of myth, to the point that in some cases it reminds us of the systems of kinship. Strictly speaking, it never reaches these kinship systems because it's an individual construction, but it's along this path that something has to be accomplished, that a certain minimum number of detours have to be taken in full, so that the efficacy of the relation between terms can be found. A model for this is presented in the skeleton or, if you prefer, in the metonymy, of my stories of α, β, γ, δ. Up to a certain point, the child needs to have roamed something of this order, to have crossed this difficult passage that becomes a reality in a certain gap or shortcoming, in order to find his rest and his harmony. Perhaps not every Oedipus complex needs to pass in this way through such mythical construction, but it's absolutely certain that each Oedipus complex needs to make a reality of this same plenitude in symbolic transposition. It might take another shape that is more efficient, because it is in action, because the presence of the father would have symbolised the situation by his Being or by his non-Being.

The crossing of something of this order is implicated in everything we find in the analysis of little Hans, and I hope to show you this in greater detail next time.

What have we been trying to do this year?

It's been a matter of preserving the depth and the Freudian articulation of what is infamously claimed to be an object relation, which on examination, as they say, proves not only to be not so straightforward, but never to have been as straightforward as all that. Otherwise one wouldn't really see why Freud's oeuvre in its entirety gives such a prominent place to two dimensions in particular – which are perhaps still enigmatic, and now even more so – known as the castration complex and the phallic mother. This has led us over the course of our research to focus our examination on the case of little Hans, in which we are now trying to broach the application of our analysis to the disentangling of the subject's fundamental relationships, to what in one analytic persuasion of relational types is called his environment.

Yesterday evening we were able to see how this instrument leaves a lot to be desired. When we try to approach the relationship between child and mother as a fundamental reference and we tell ourselves that by sticking to the general terms of the dual relationship as fixed upon the phallic mother – as enveloped by the mother or not enveloped by the mother – we find ourselves faced with characteristics that are perhaps like those we were told about yesterday at our Society's meeting, characteristics that are excessively general when it comes to allowing us to circumscribe the points of impact – I mean, the efficient points of impact – that stand to be pointed out. Indeed, it is quite peculiar that categories as flexible as those that Freud introduced cannot, in this current use, be corroborated in a way that would be fairly commonplace and would enable us to differentiate, at any given moment, within a single family of relationships, between a character trait and a symptom, for example. It's not enough to establish an analogy between them. Since they occupy different functions, there must be a different structural relation.

This is precisely what we have been trying to put a finger on in these eminent examples that are Freud's case studies. As you know, over the years we have been giving a direction to the experience, a direction that we have been striving to make more specific, because there is no better way of defining a concept than to put it to use. We claim that without the distinction introduced by the three relations that are called symbolic, imaginary and real, these three essential and profoundly distinct modes of our experience, it is utterly impossible to orient oneself in the most everyday experience.

Last time, we arrived at the notion that little Hans, whom we are taking at a particular biographic moment, is marked by a certain type of relationship with his mother, the fundamental terms of which are defined by the manifest presence of the phallic object between him and his mother.

This should come as no surprise to us after our previous analyses because we have already seen, through other case studies and then since the start of this academic year, the extent to which the term of the phallus as an imaginary object of the mother's desire constitutes an absolutely crucial point in the mother–child relationship. We saw the extent to which, during a first stage, the child's accession to his proper situation in the presence of his mother could be defined as the necessity of his recognising, and indeed his taking on board, the essential role of this imaginary object, the phallic object, which enters as an altogether primary compositional element in the primordial structuration of the mother–child relationship.

No other observation can serve us better in this regard than the observation on little Hans. Indeed, everything begins with the game between Hans and his mother – seeing, not seeing, being on the lookout for where this phallus is. Let's underscore how at this point we remain in total ambiguity regarding what might be called Hans's belief. When the observation begins, we have a firm impression that for some time, from the real standpoint, he has formed, as people say, his own little idea. Ich hab' gedacht, he says, I've already been thinking about all this, which comes in response to the glib replies designed to cloud the issue, these being the kind of replies that his parents feel obliged to make whenever he poses a somewhat abrupt question.

While the imaginary relationship might be taken for the reaction of seeing and being seen par excellence, I want to punctuate how it is important to uphold, already at this level, an intersubjective articulation that is far from being a dual one, as you are about to see. If the relationship that is called scoptophilic, with its two opposing terms of showing and showing oneself, deserves to hold our attention for a moment, it's because it is already distinct from the primordial imaginary relation, which is this kind of mode of capture in the field that we may call a reciprocal visual confrontation.

I insisted on this at length, back when I was referring to the animal kingdom and these peculiar visual duels between pairs of animals in which one can see the animal, be it a lizard or a fish, caught in certain typical reactions which [in French] are called parades. Between the two adversaries or partners, everything is set up through an array of adnexa and signals, through apparatuses of visual capture that are present in each of the two, and then, solely on the plane of this visual confrontation, something in one of them gives way. The animal yields. One might say that the animal effaces itself, to use a term that conjoins in some way the motor withdrawal and the paling of colour. One animal turns away from the vision of another that has taken the dominant position. Experiments have shown that it's not always a matter of something that occurs strictly to the benefit of the male against the female, because sometimes a manifestation of this type arises between two males. What occurs on this plane of visual communication prepares, and extends directly into, the act of seizure, indeed the act of oppression, of ascendency, which bends one of the subjects to the other, whereby the latter gains the upper hand.

While certainly we have here the point of biological or ethological reference that allows us to provide the right accentuation to the imaginary relationship in its articulation with the whole process, not of parade, but of pariade, of courtship displays, I don't want there to be any doubt about how one can see from the outset that everything that is being referred to this domain, which I have called the child's divining of the mother's imaginary world, is actually quite different from it. We can see that what is at issue here is not so much to see and to submit to being seized by what has been seen, but rather to seek to behold, to be on the lookout for, what is both there and not there. What is aimed at in this relationship is something that is there in so far as it remains veiled. In other words, what is at issue in this fundamental relationship is to sustain the lure so that something can be maintained that is literally there and not there. This culminates in the fundamental situation the crucial character of which we cannot fail to recognise in the imaginary drama such as it tends to be inserted into something else, which will give it a yet more elaborate meaning – the fact of surprise.

Don't overlook the ambiguous character of the French term surprise, in the sense that it refers to the act of surprising, as in, I glimpsed him by surprise. There is the surprising of an enemy force, or else the surprising of Diana, which is indeed the surprise that culminates in the mythology that I'm not mentioning again just for the sake of it because the whole Acteonesque dimension that I allude to at the end of my text La Chose freudienne is grounded on this essential moment. Yet there is another facet to this word. If there is a surprise, it's not the astonishment that is felt. On the contrary, being surprised is something that happens through an unexpected discovery. Those of you who have been attending my patient presentations might have noticed in one of our transsexual patients the truly harrowing character that he depicted for us of the painful surprise he felt the day he saw his sister naked for the first time.

So, at a higher degree than mere seeing and being seen, the imaginary dialectic culminates in offering to view and being surprised by an unveiling. This dialectic is the only one that enables us to comprehend the fundamental sense of the act of seeing. We have seen how essential it is in the very genesis of everything that amounts to perversion, for example. Or, conversely, how it is only too clear in the technique of the exhibitionist act that the subject shows what he's got precisely insomuch as the other party hasn't got it. The exhibitionist strives, as he himself asserts to us in his declarations, to capture the other party, by means of this unveiling, in something that is far from merely holding her in a visual enthrallment, but which literally gives him the pleasure of revealing to the other party what she is supposed not to have, in order to plunge her at the same time into the shame of what she lacks.

It is on this ground that each of Hans's relationships with his mother is played out. We can also see that his mother fully participates in this and, with great indulgence, allows the child to partake of everything to do with her bodily functioning. However, when little Hans solicits her exhibitionist participation, she loses her mastery and issues rebuffs, severity, and even condemnations. It is on this basis that we see the imaginary object, which is already caught in this dialectic of veiling and unveiling, playing its fundamental role.

This is the turn in the path at which we shall now take up little Hans. We shall ask ourselves why he produces his phobia after an interval of a whole year subsequent to the major occurrences that arose in his life, notably the birth of his little sister and his discovery that she too is an essential term in his relationship with his mother.

We have already indicated that this phobia needs to be mapped into a process that cannot be conceived of unless we see that what is at stake for the child is profoundly to change his entire pattern of relationships with the world and to accept – which will ultimately be accepted at the end – what subjects sometimes require a whole lifetime to take on board, namely that in this privileged field of the world which is that of their fellow semblables, there are effectively subjects who are deprived, for real, of this infamous imaginary phallus.

You would be wrong to think that it's enough to have a scientific notion or even an articulable notion of this for it to be accepted among the subject's beliefs as a whole. The deep complexity of men's relationships with women emanates precisely from what we could call in our coarse language the resistance of male subjects effectively to admitting that female subjects are truly not endowed with something, and all the more so given that they are endowed with something else.

This is what needs to be firmly articulated on the basis of facts and support from our analytic experience. It is literally on this level that a misrecognition takes root which is often maintained with a tenacity that influences the subject's entire world-conception and especially his conception of social relationships. It is maintained beyond any limit in subjects who would never fail to deem themselves, and with a smile, to have roundly accepted reality as it is. The effacing of this fact from our experience shows the extent to which we have been incapable of benefiting from the most elementary terms of Freud's teaching. Why this is so hard to accept surely needs to be accounted for, and this is perhaps what we shall manage to do by the end of this year's path.

For the time being, our point of departure is the observation on little Hans, so let's articulate how the problem of a similar recognition is posed for him. Why does an acknowledgement such as this suddenly become necessary when hitherto what had been most important was precisely to play at this not being so? It is retroactively that we shall clarify why it was so important to play at this not being so.

Let's also look at how it is that, for this real privation to be somehow taken on board, it cannot not be operative, if it is to produce results that are subjectively liveable for the subject, by which I mean that they enable him to integrate into the sexual dialectic in such a way that it allows the human subject to live it and not merely to endure it. This necessitates the integration of a fact that is already given, the fact that the mother is already an adult and that she is taken up in the system of symbolic relationships in which inter-human sexual relationships have to be situated. The child himself has to take this path. He has to experience the Oedipal crisis and its essential moment of castration. This is what the example of little Hans illustrates, but perhaps neither completely nor perfectly. It is perhaps indeed in this incompleteness that we can find the hardest evidence of what I have indicated as the essential movement of the observation.

This is a privileged case of analysis in that the transition from the imaginary dialectic can be seen being produced out in the open. We can see the child passing from this intersubjective game with the mother around the phallus to the game of castration in the relationship with the father. This passage occurs through a series of transitions that are precisely what I have called the myths that little Hans creates.

Why are we seeing this in such a pure way? I started to spell this out, and now I shall pick up from the point we were at last time.

I left you, last time, on the riveting phenomenon of Hans relating the fantasy of the two giraffes, in which we can truly behold, like an illustration given in a seminar, the passage from the image to the symbol.

Quite literally, little Hans is showing us, like a conjurer, the duplicated image of the mother, what I called the metonymy of the mother, to become a piece of paper, to become a crumpled giraffe that the child sits on.

There is something like a sketching out of the overall scheme here, which is the sign that we are on the right path. Had I wanted to invent something by means of a metaphor that would spell out the passage from the imaginary to the symbolic, I could never have invented the tale of the two giraffes in the way that little Hans dreamed it up and articulated it with these elements. He shows that it's a matter of transforming an image into a ball of paper, into something that is wholly a symbol and, as such, an element that can be mobilised. He sits on his mother, reduced at last to a symbol, to this scrap of paper, which they snatch hold of and exclaim, Ah! Le bon billet qu'a le petit Hans![1] Of course, this is not enough. Otherwise he would have been cured. But through this act he shows what he has been ruminating, because the spontaneous acts of a child are far more direct and lively than the mental conceptions of an adult, after the long years of deepening cretinisation that make up the common run of what is called upbringing.

Let's see what happens when we turn to our chart, as though it had already been proved correct. What does it mean that it should be an imaginary father who definitively sets the order of the world, namely that not everyone has a phallus? It's easy to recognise that the imaginary father is the all-powerful father. This is the grounding of the world in the commonplace conception of God, the guarantee of universal order. All things real and physical, the Lord God made them all.

When I tell you this, I'm not merely forging my table. You have only to turn now to the observation on little Hans. When he speaks about God, which he does on two occasions, he speaks very nicely of him. His father has started to clarify certain matters for him, and there is an improvement, though it is fleeting. Then, on 15 March, when he goes outside and notices that there are fewer horses and carriages than usual, he says, How sensible! God's done away with horses now.

What does this mean? We don't know. Does it mean that on this day there is less need of horses? It could mean that, but the word gescheit doesn't mean kind, but rather indisputably clever. People tend to believe that the good Lord has spared him some difficulty, but if one deems that the horse is not merely a difficulty for Hans but an essential element, then it could indeed mean that there is less need of horses. Whichever is the case, it tells you that God is there as an essential point of reference.

It's utterly striking to see that after the meeting with Freud – on 30 March, just after he had turned mother into a ball of paper, which is not entirely satisfactory for Hans but had set him on the right path – the child alludes to God once again. Hans supposes that the Professor must talk to the good Lord, to be able to say everything he has just said. Freud himself doesn't fail to be tickled by this, though scruples to note that he had provoked it himself, because out of his own vainglory he had peculiarly taken the high and mighty position of bragging to the child, Long before you were in the world, I had known that a little Hans would come who would be so fond of his mother that he would be bound to feel afraid of his father because of it.

It is certainly quite striking to see Freud taking this position. On no account have we dreamt of reproaching him for this. A long while ago I noted the original and exceptional dimension that Freud would open in each of his analyses precisely by uttering such interpretative words to the subject. It's not something that he is transmitting. It's truly something that he has found himself, that comes in some way directly from the lips of Freud. I've given you a reference that seems to me to be altogether essential regarding the authenticity of speech, namely that it has to be seen how different is an interpretation by Freud from all the rest that we might give in his wake. As we have very often seen, Freud doesn't impose any kind of rule on himself here. He truly takes what I could call the divine position. He speaks to young Hans from Mount Sinai, and Hans doesn't fail to feel the force of this.

Mark well that on this occasion the position taken by the symbolic articulation – the symbolic father also remains veiled to Hans – is that of Freud's poising himself as the absolute master, as something that is not the symbolic father but the imaginary father. This is important because we are about to see that this is how Freud tackles the situation.

It is very important to appreciate the particularities of Hans's relationship with his analyst. I mean that if we want to comprehend this observation we should note that it has something about it that is absolutely exceptional compared with all other child analyses. The situation is developed in such a way that the element of the symbolic father is rather distinct both from the real father and, as you can see, from the imaginary father. It is doubtless to this – which we will be able to confirm later – that we owe the absence of phenomena that could be qualified as transferential, for example. Likewise there are no phenomena of repetition, and this is why we have pointed out the pure state of the functioning of the fantasies.

A further interest of this observation is to show us that the Durcharbeitung is not, contrary to what is commonly accepted, animated merely by some endless iteration at the end of which what had not been intellectually assimilated will at last work its way under the subject's skin, like gnawing on a bit or slowly permeating. Durcharbeitung is doubtless a necessary thing because a number of circuits need to be travelled in several different directions so that the function of symbolising the imaginary can be efficiently completed. This is why we can see little Hans roaming along a whole labyrinthine path, to the extent that we can indeed reconstitute this path because of course it is broken off from one moment to the next, chopped up by the father's interventions which, as Freud underlines for us, are certainly neither the best oriented nor the most respectful. Nevertheless, we can see a series of constructions being produced and reproduced, in which it's a matter of discerning what the veritable component-elements are. Rather than constantly contenting ourselves with covering each fact with a catch-all term of such-and-such a complex – anal relation or mother attachment – we would be better off trying to see what functions, what representative and figurative elements, are brought before us in the tight articulations of ancient myths.

We have got used to matching sweeping equivalents to these terms and functions – saying that this represents the father, or that represents the mother, or something else represents the penis – but were we to try to perceive these elements, this effort would show us that each of them, the horse for example, is conceivable only in its relationship with a certain number of other elements that are equally significant. It is impossible to make such an element correspond to a univocal signification. I've taken the example of the horse, but this is so for all the other elements of these Freudian myths. At the start the horse is the mother. At the end, it's the father. Between the two, it might have been little Hans himself, who plays horsey once in a while, or even the penis, which is manifestly represented by the horse at several points in the case history.

This is true in the most evident way for the horse but is no less so for any other signifier that you might care to pluck from the different modes of mythical creation in which little Hans indulges and which, as you know, are exceedingly profuse. For example, at one point the bathtub is clearly the mother, but at the end it is Hans's behind. This is understood in the observation as much by Freud, by the father and by little Hans himself. You can equally perform the same operation for each of the elements that is involved, the biting or even the nakedness for instance.

In any case, in order to perceive these things it is absolutely necessary to force yourselves, at each point of the observation, not to understand straightaway. This is a point of method. You must strive, as Freud expressly recommends twice in the observation, not to understand immediately. The best way of not understanding on this occasion is to jot down some brief notes, to record day-by-day on a piece of paper the elements that Hans broaches and which have to be taken as such, as signifiers. I insisted for example on Quite alone with Mariedl. While you understand nothing about it, you retain this signifier-element and, as the intelligence will come to you when you sit down to eat, you will see that this overlaps strictly with something else that you can write down on the same page. What is supposed in the fact of being, not alone with someone, but quite alone with someone? It supposes that there could be someone else.

This method for analysing myths is the very same that Monsieur Claude Lévi-Strauss has set out for us in an article in the October–December 1955 issue of The Journal of American Folklore under the title The Structural Study of Myth. By proceeding in the way he describes, you will see that each of the elements of the observation on Hans can be ordered in such a way that, when read in a certain direction, it forms the sequence of these myths. After a while, however, one is compelled by the element of recurrence alone, which is not a straightforward recurrence but a transformed recurrence of the same elements, to put them in order not merely on a single line but by making bundles of lines that take on an order as though they were an orchestra score, and then you can see a series of successions being established which can be read both horizontally and vertically. The myth is told in one direction, while its meaning or its understanding are referred to the bundles of analogous elements that recur in various forms. At each point these elements are transformed, doubtless in order to complete a certain path that goes very precisely from the point of departure – to state the obvious – to the point of arrival, and which means that by the end something has been integrated that at the start was inadmissible and irreducible.

So, in the little Hans case history, the point of departure is the eruption of the real penis in the play between mother and child, and the end point is when this real penis comes to be accommodated in a way that is sufficient for life to go on without anxiety. I said sufficient. I didn't say necessary. This sufficient means that it could be even fuller, and this is indeed what we shall see. In the end, little Hans's Oedipus complex perhaps doesn't lead to a solution that would be completely satisfactory. It suffices simply to free him from the interference of the phobic element. It renders unnecessary the conjunction between the imaginary and anxiety that is known as phobia. In other words, it culminates in the reduction of the phobia.

Indeed, let's not forget something that can be gleaned from the 1922 postscript. When Freud meets Hans again at the age of nineteen, the youth had just read the full case history for the first time, but the whole of it came to him as something unknown. Freud draws a very neat comparison – Any one who is familiar with psychoanalysis may occasionally experience something similar in sleep. He will be woken up by a dream, and will decide to analyse it then and there; he will then go to sleep again feeling quite satisfied with the result of his efforts; and next morning dream and analysis will alike be forgotten.

This is indeed something we are familiar with, and Freud's comparison is highly appealing. It allows us to think, as does Freud himself, that what is at stake in the observation on little Hans, as we ourselves can grasp, is in no way comparable to the subject's integration or reintegration of his history as a lifting of amnesia that allows for the elements that have been won back to be preserved. On the contrary, what is at issue here is a very special activity that stands on the borderline between the imaginary and the symbolic, and which does indeed belong to the same realm as dreams. This dream realm is equally the realm of the mythification that is involved throughout the observation on Hans, which plays an economic role that is comparable in every respect to that of Hans's fantasies and even his mere games and inventions.

However, let's not overlook what Freud tells us in passing. He says that, even so, as Hans was reading his case history, there dawned on him a kind of glimmering recollection that it might have been he himself that it happened to. It has to do with all the fantasmatisations in the case concerning the younger sister. Hans's parents are now divorced, as might have been anticipated from reading through to the end of the observation, and Hans is no less spirited as a result. There is just one thing that he still harbours as a wound, and this is the fact that he lives apart from his sister. This little sister has come to represent for him, over the course of his life, the term that has been distanced beyond what is accessible to love. She is the idealised love-object, the girl-phallus that we took as a point of departure in our analysis and which will remain – there is no cause for doubt here, even though this is just a supposition, an extrapolation – the mark that will lend its style and its type to Hans's love life in its entirety thereafter.

So, in spite of the masterful analysis of which Hans was the object, not everything was fully brought to a close, nor did it culminate in an object relation that would in itself be fully satisfactory.

Let's come back to the starting point, to Freud, to the child's father who is Freud's acolyte, and to the instructions that Freud gives him, because we have now seen how Freud assumes his role here. How will he tell the one who is his agent to conduct himself? He gives two recommendations.

The first recommendation has two aspects. After being informed of little Hans's demeanour and the painful and anguishing phenomena of which he is the object, Freud tells the father to explain to the child that the phobia is a piece of nonsense, eine Dummheit, and that the nonsense in question is linked to his desire to get close to his mother. Furthermore, since Hans has for some time been greatly preoccupied with Wiwimachers, he needs to be told that this is not right, unrecht, and that this is why the horse is so bad and wants to bite him.

This goes a long way. We have here a sort of direct and immediate manoeuvre bearing on guilt, which on the one hand consists in easing the guilt by saying that such things are quite natural and straightforward but simply need to be put in order and dominated a little. On the other hand, however, Freud doesn't hesitate to accentuate the element of prohibition, at least relative prohibition, of the masturbatory satisfactions. We shall see what the result of this is for the child.

The second recommendation that Freud gives is even more characteristic of the language he uses. Since Hans's satisfaction is clearly derived from hunting out – this was why earlier I took up the dialectic of discovery and surprise – the hidden object that is the penis or the phallus of the mother, this desire is to be taken away from him by taking away the object of his satisfaction. You are to tell him that this desired phallus does not exist. This is voiced by Freud at the start of the observation, on pp. 263–4 of volume VII of the Gesammelte Werke. It has to be said that as an intervention from the imaginary father, it would be hard to do any better. He who puts the world in order is saying that there is nought to be found.

One can also see the extent to which the real father is incapable of taking on such a function. In truth, when he tries to do so, Hans reacts by taking a completely different path from the one that has been suggested to him, just as previously he had reacted by producing the story of the two giraffes. Right after the absence of the phallus has been asserted to him, he fantasises a very nice story – I saw Mummy quite naked in her chemise, and she let me see her widdler. I showed Grete, my Grete, what Mummy was doing, and showed her my widdler.

This is a superb response, and utterly in line with what I was trying to spell out for you earlier. What is at stake is very precisely to see what is veiled insomuch as it is veiled. The mother is both naked and in her chemise, just like Alphonse Allais's tale L'engraisseur, about a friend of his who was wont to exclaim with a flamboyant gesture, You see that woman over there, she is naked under her clothes! It's quite possible that you have never gauged the impact and scope of this remark in the metaphysical underpinnings of your social deportment, but it is fundamental to interhuman relationships as such.

With that, Hans's father, who doesn't distinguish himself by any especially shrewd perception in these matters, tells him that she can only be one or the other. He could only mean 'in her chemise' or 'quite naked'. Yet this is the whole issue. For Hans, she is at once naked and in her chemise, just like all of you here. Hence the impossibility of taking on board the order of the world simply through an authoritarian intervention that stipulates there is nought. Clearly the imaginary father has existed for a long time, for all time. The imaginary father is also a certain form of God. But this is not what will resolve our difficulties in a way that is any the less permanent and experiential.

Before this attempt, Hans's father had made a first approach, under Freud's instruction, to easing the child's guilt. He made a first clarification concerning the relationship between the horse and the forbidden act of putting his hand on his penis. Analysts of our generation, after some twenty or thirty years of experience, now know that such an intervention aiming to alleviate guilt-ridden anxiety is always doomed to fail. Guilt should never be confronted head on, lest it should be transformed into the various metabolic forms that will never fail to arise. So, once the child has been told that the horse is merely a more or less frightful substitute for something that he ought not to be making such a fuss about, we see him here in the observation, in the most articulate fashion, starting to feel compelled to look at the horses. He says, I have to look at horses.

Let's pause for a moment on this mechanism, which is altogether noteworthy. What does everything that he has just been told mean? In the end, it amounts to saying that looking at the horses is permitted. Just like in totalitarian systems, which are defined by the fact that everything that is permitted is compulsory, he now feels himself compelled. Little Hans has been told that he is allowed to go towards the horses because the problem lies elsewhere. The result of this is that he feels ordered, forced, to look at the horses.

What can this mechanism mean, which I have summarised as the permitted becoming the compulsory? We have first a transition, that is, the elimination of what was previously forbidden. Doubtless this transformation – because it does indeed amount to a transformation – must be caused by the fact that what is permitted is clad at the same time with the term of obligation. This must be something like a mechanism that preserves the right to what was forbidden, yet in a different form. In other words, what now has to be looked at is precisely what previously was not supposed to be looked at.

As we have already seen, something was forbidden by means of the horse. We know that the phobia is an outpost, a protection against anxiety. The horse marks out a threshold, and we know that at this level this is what it does above all else. But now there is also what has just been said to the subject, and so the horse also bears a relation to what is at stake in the new element that has sown disorder across the subject's play as a whole, namely the real penis. Even so, does this mean that the horse is the real penis? It most certainly does not. As umpteen examples hereafter will show you, the horse is a long way from being the real penis because, over the course of the transformations of Hans's myth, the horse is also the mother, at the end the father, and also on occasion little Hans himself. Let's bring in here an essential symbolising notion, the same that I developed for you during the Seminar of the year before last concerning the play on words that Angelus Silesius makes on Ort/Wort.[2] We shall say that, on this occasion, this is the place where the real penis must be accommodated, and not without giving rise to fear and anguish.

With this first contribution from the father, which is still hardly reassuring, we can nevertheless see the child reacting and committing to the structure that is strictly speaking the signifier-structure, the structure that resists against imperative interference, the structure that will nevertheless react to the father's addled and clumsy interventions, and which will produce the series of mythical creations that, through a series of transformations, will gradually integrate the new element of the real penis into Hans's system. This new element necessitates no longer merely the intersubjectivity of the lure – which even so is fundamental and allows Hans to play at surprising, at being caught by surprise, and at presenting himself as absent – but at the same time, through this play which is still ongoing, a third-party object, which is the first element in his relation with his mother and which ultimately must itself be integrated into it. This new and inconvenient element – which actually turned up a while ago – the real penis, Hans's own penis, with its own reactions that run the risk of throwing the whole thing up in the air, as they say, is clearly for him, as you will see in the series of imaginary creations, the element of perturbation and disturbance.

Since today is the 3rd of April, let's go straight to what happens on the 3rd of April 1908, when father and child are at their apartment window speculating as to what is going on in the courtyard across the street. The elements that will become the first props to Hans's problem are already to be found in this yard. With these he will produce his first mythical construction under the sign, as Freud tells us, of means of transport.

All this is going on constantly under his nose – the horses and carts that shift around, that load and unload, that bring boxes onto which the street-boys climb. What will Hans make of it all? Do you think that there was some kind of preadaptation, planned for all eternity by the eternal imaginary father, between these means of conveyance in use during the imperial reign of Franz Joseph in pre-war Vienna, and each drive and natural tendency that surges up hereabouts in accordance with a solid order of instinctual development in a child like little Hans? It's exactly the opposite. These elements also have their order of reality, but the child will make use of them as elements that are necessary to his game of permutation.

Let me say it again. The use of the signifier is conceivable and comprehensible only when you take as your starting point the fact that the elementary and fundamental playing-out of the signifier is permutative. However civilised and learnèd you might be, as you go about your everyday life you couldn't be clumsier when it comes to exhausting all the possible permutations. I'm going to prove this for you with the example of myself. I have a necktie that is lighter on one side and darker on the other, and for the lighter side to be underneath and the darker side showing on the front, I have to make a mental permutation. I get it wrong every time.

The permutative order is what is being played out in everything that little Hans will construct. Before you try to understand anything about what the horse means, about what the cart means, about little Hans getting onto it, or the unloading of the cart, you have to retain the fact that there is a cart, a horse, and little Hans who wishes to get onto it and who is afraid. But afraid of what? Well, that the cart might set off without him before he gets up onto the loading dock. There's no need to rush and to start saying that we are familiar with this, that he must be afraid of being separated from his mother, because little Hans reassures you straightaway, I can always come back to Mummy, in the cart or in a cab. Little Hans stands quite firm in reality. Something else is thus at stake. What counts is the fact of being on a cart looking onto something that can separate from the cart, that can displace.

Once you have isolated the element in relation to which the cart can displace, you will find it in countless features in the observation on little Hans, for example in connection with one of the fantasies that crops up later, that of travelling in the train to Gmunden, when they don't have time to put on their clothes before getting off and the train carries them on. There are many others. For instance, one of his last fantasies, on 22 April – A street-boy was riding on a truck, and the guard came and undressed the boy quite naked and made him stand there till next morning, and in the morning the boy gave the guard 50,000 florins so that he could go on riding on the truck. You cannot fail to see the patent kinship between these different stages and moments in Hans's fantasmatisation.

You will also see all the fantasmatisation around the splendid and intrepid little Hanna. At one point she is with little Hans in another carriage that greatly resembles the previous ones, because it has the same anxiety-horses. Hanna will go and ride on one of the horses, in this first myth that we may call the carriage myth.

You will try to see how these different signifiers constitute the hitching, because this really is what is at issue. Everyone goes on all the time about the horse, but it can be hitched or unhitched to a carriage. You will see how these different elements that compose the hitching, both the coachmen and the referring of the carriage to a fixed map, turn out to have different significations as the case history progresses. You will try to see what is most important in all this. Is it the role of the signifier, as I explained for you in my Séminaire sur 'La Lettre volée', or more precisely the displacement of the signifier-element onto the different personages who each find themselves caught in some way under its shadow and inscribed in its possession? Does the vital part of Hans's progress consist in the movement of the signifier as it turns around the different personages in whom the subject shows greater or lesser interest, and who may be caught, captivated, or captured in the permutative mechanism? Or, on the contrary, does it lie in something else? On this occasion, we can't really see what kind of progress this would be if it's not a progress through the order of the signifier.

One can say that at no point do any of the elements of reality that surround little Hans really lie beyond his means. There is no trace in this observation of what might be called regression. If you think that there is regression at one point because little Hans produces all that immense anal phantasmagoria around the lumf, you are sorely mistaken. It's a fantastic mythic play, which at no point entails any kind of regression. From beginning to end of the observation, little Hans holds onto his right, so to speak, to masturbation, without allowing himself to be ruffled. If there is one thing that distinguishes the overall style of Hans's progress, it's precisely its irreducible aspect. As Freud underlines in his discussion, it is precisely because the genital element is utterly solid, present, resistant, and firmly installed in a subject such as this, that he doesn't come out with a hysteria but a phobia. This is very sharply articulated in the observation.

This is what we will be trying to see next time. We are going to see that little Hans doesn't employ just one myth, just one alphabetic element, to resolve his issue, the issue of passing from a phallic apprehension of the relationship with his mother to a castrated apprehension of relations with the parental couple as a whole. There is also the infamous story of the bathtub and the borer, to which last time I referred with the element of the screw thread. It's something that revolves entirely around what I would call the logical function of manufactured instruments. One cannot help but be quite struck by the way in which this child takes elements that are grouped around highly developed patterns of coaptation in human adaptation and turns them into logical instruments. They enable him to create an opposition between that which is enrooted, or even simply that which is naturally fixed in, and that which has a hole bored through it. The latter is the point of apprehension, in the sense of fear. It is the formidable polarity before which the child effectively comes to a standstill. The introduction of the element of the unscrewing, or else the pincering – I mean, that which is gripped in the pair of pincers[3] – plays an absolutely essential role in what I shall call the other myth, the myth of the bathtub and the tap.

All the progress that Hans brings about over the course of the observation hinges on the detail of this mythical structuration, that is, on the use of imaginary elements in order to exhaust a certain exercise of symbolic exchange. This is what will allow the threshold element to fall into disuse, the element that was the first symbolic structuration of his reality, which is exactly what his phobia was.

THE SIGNIFIER AND DER WITZ

A golden rule
The combinatory value of the signifier
Hans through the looking-glass
Raillery and naivety
What passes out through the hole

Our progress through the observation on little Hans has led us to highlight the function of myth in the psychological crisis that the child is going through, a crisis that is inseparable from the paternal intervention being guided by Freud's counsel.

This all-pervasive notion of the function of what is called myth – not metaphorically but at the very least technically – is something that we suppose may be appreciated in its rightful scope to the extent that Hans's imaginative creation always follows on from his father's interventions, which can be adroit, not so adroit, or maladroit, but which are certainly sufficiently well oriented not to stem this series of productions but ultimately to stimulate it. This series presents to us as something that it would be hard to separate from his symptom, his phobia, and indeed it can be put into order in relation to this symptom.

Last time, we arrived at the anniversary day of 3 April, when Hans's remarks on the content of his phobia are aired.

The father says, all in all, that while that same afternoon his son became more courageous in his conduct under the effect of the most recent occurrences, and notably the effect of Freud's unmediated intervention to Hans on 30 March, the phobia too had plucked up courage. Indeed, in this ambiguity which clearly was indiscernible, the phobia seemed to be just as much enriching itself from details of finer scope and incidence, of higher complication, now that Hans knew better how to make such confidences about the way in which the phobia was pressuring and oppressing him.

I'm venturing to overturn in your minds, or more exactly to re-establish in your minds, the true function both of the symptom and of its variously qualified productions which have been rounded up under the name transitory symptoms of analysis. To summarise for you the scope of what is meant by our approach, I shall try to set out a certain number of terms, definitions and, while I'm at it, rules.

I told you last time that if we want to work in a way that is truly analytic, that is truly Freudian, and which is in true conformity with the major examples that Freud developed for us, then we ought to become aware of something that can be understood and confirmed only on the basis of the distinction between signified and signifier. As I told you, not one of the signifier-elements of the phobia carries a univocal meaning or is equivalent to a single signified.

There are many such signifiers that we could tarry with. The first of them is, of course, the horse. It is impossible to regard the horse in any way whatsoever as something that could be the pure and simple equivalent of the function of the father, for example. One can take this easy route and hastily declare that, like in the classic formula from Totem and Taboo, the horse is responding to some shortcoming of the father, as a sort of neo-production or equivalent that somehow represents him or incarnates him, thereby playing a role determined by what does indeed seem to be the difficulty at that time, namely the passage from the preoedipal state to the Oedipal moment. The word moment is here intended in the sense it carries in physics, and this passage is in effect what I have been teaching, but of course such a declaration about the horse would be utterly incomplete and insufficient. The horse is not merely the horse that perhaps at the end it may indeed become, when Hans sees a proud horse trotting past in the street and associates it with something equivalent to the virile pride of the father.

At one moment near the end of the treatment, Hans has the much-vaunted conversation with his father when he tells him something along the lines of, You ought to be cross with me, you must hold it against me that I'm in this place, that I monopolise mother's attention and take your place in her bed. And this comes in spite of the father's denegations, telling Hans that he has never scolded him. Das muß wahr sein, Hans says again. It must be true. Thus, for a brief instant, doubtless having been duly indoctrinated some time hence, the child makes the Oedipal myth loom up with an altogether special imperiousness. Moreover, this has not failed to strike a few authors, notably Robert Fliess, who wrote an article on this in the January–February 1956 issue of the IJP devoted to Freud's centenary.

Before it came to fulfil this metaphorical function in a terminal fashion, so to speak, the horse played a good many other roles. On 3 April, Hans gives all the possible explanations on this matter. Is the horse to be hitched, or not? Is it hitched to a cart with just one horse, or two horses? In each case there is a different signification. What becomes apparent to us is that at this time the horse is symbolic of something. As the next part of the observation will show in a more developed way, on one side the horse is symbolic of the mother. It is also symbolic of the penis. At any rate, it is irreducibly linked to the cart, which is itself a loaded dray, as Hans insists all along the session of 3 April when he is explaining his interest and the brand of satisfaction he derives from all the traffic that passes in front of their apartment, these drays that drive into the yard and drive back out again, and which, while they are there, are unloaded and reloaded. Gradually the equivalence becomes apparent between the function of the dray, together with the horse, and something that obviously belongs to a very different realm, suggestive of what refers essentially to the mother's pregnancy. As we are told in the observation, by Freud and by the father, it refers essentially to the problem of the situation of children in their mother's belly and how they come out. So, at this moment, the horse has a very different scope and a very different function.

Similarly, another element becomes a subject of lengthy examination both for the father and for Freud, namely the notorious Krawall, the idea of noise, of a row, of a disorderly racket, with some Austrian overtones whereby it seems that the word can further be used to designate a fracas or a rumpus. In each case, there appears the troubling and especially anguishing character of this Krawall, which is apprehended by little Hans when it arises with the bus-horse that fell down, umfallen. In Hans's own words, this was one of the events that precipitated the phobic value of the horse. This fall, which occurred but once, will thereafter be found as the constant backdrop to the fear. He fears that this may happen to certain horses, especially big horses hitched up to large, heavily laden vans. The fall and the attendant noise of the horse's pawing, the Krawall, keep cropping up, from more than one angle, during the questioning of little Hans, yet not once in the observation will anything be yielded that would amount to an overt interpretation of the Krawall.

Furthermore, it should be noted that for the full run of the case history of little Hans, Freud and the father alike are led to remain in doubt, to float, and even to abstain, when it comes to the interpretation of a certain number of elements. It turns out that, try as they might to press the child to come out with it, try as they might to suggest every possible equivalent and solution, they obtain from him no more than evasions, allusions and side-stepping. Sometimes one even has the impression that the child is to some extent making fun.

Actually, this is not to be doubted. The parodic character of some of the child's figments and confabulations is patent in the observation. I'm thinking above all of what happens in relation to what could be called the stork myth, which in Hans's rendition is so rich and lush, teeming so with humorous elements – The stork came up the stairs . . . and he had the right key . . . and then he took his hat and went away again, and so on and so forth. This parodic and caricatured aspect of the child's figments has just what it takes to have struck the various commentators.

In the end this brings us to the heart of something that is re-established not from a perspective that deems the observation to be incomplete, but on the contrary from a perspective that appreciates its distinctive demonstrative phase. This is not an insufficiency. On the contrary, it is along this path that it must show us the way to a mode of comprehending what is involved both in the symptomatic formation – the phobia, which is already so simple and yet already so rich – and in the working-through itself. This aspect is expressed, and it finds its place. There is no better illustration of this observation, to the extent that it's a Freudian observation, that is, an intelligent observation.

What we can see essentially is the signifier as such in its distinction from the signified. The symptomatic signifier is constituted in such a way that by its very nature, all along its development and evolution, it covers signifieds that are the most multiform and the most varied. Not only is it in its nature to be able to do this, it is its function to do so.

The full set of signifier-elements that are put before us in the course of this portion of the observation, its kit of signifiers, is assembled in such a way that if we want the observation to be something more than a mere riddle, a confused and failed observation, then we need to impose upon ourselves a certain number of rules about how we tackle it. Why should this case be singled out as a failed one, and not any other case to which we customarily refer? Even so, we cannot help but be struck by the arbitrary, solicited and systematic character of the interpretations made in the case history in particular, yet also of the analytic interpretations vis-à-vis the child. Precisely inasmuch as this observation is so remarkably rich and complex, we have here a testimony given in a register that is exceedingly rare on account of its abundance. If there is one impression that one receives upon moving into it, it's the sense of constantly getting lost in it.

The rules that I would like to propose in this regard are as follows.

Be it the analysis of a child or of an adult, no element that we may regard as a signifier – in the sense that we have been promoting here, that is to say, whether the signifier is an object, a relationship or a symptomatic act, and however primal or vague it may be – fails to appear as bearing already the firm and singular stamp of something that is dialectical.

Such vagueness is characteristic of the first emergence of the horse, when it appears after a certain interval during which the child's anxiety manifests itself. The horse will hold a function that needs to be defined, but this dialectical stamp is already apparent. This is precisely what we are going to try to grasp, and it is already quite palpable enough in the fact that the anxiety emerges exactly when it's a matter of Hans's mother leaving. He is afraid that the horse will come into the bedroom. But what comes into the room? It is he, little Hans. In every aspect of this we can see a highly ambiguous double relationship that is linked on the one hand to the function of the mother by way of a sentimental tonality of anxiety, but on the other hand to little Hans through his movement and his act. From its very first appearance, the horse is already loaded with profound ambiguity. It is already an all-purpose sign, just like any typical signifier. We take just three strides forward into the observation on little Hans and we can see this come pouring in from every side.

So, we posit the following rule. No signifier-element, thus defined as an object, a relationship or a symptomatic act, in neurosis for example, can be regarded as having a univocal scope. In no way is it equivalent to any one of these objects, relationships, or even these imaginary actions in our register upon which the currently used notion of the object relation was founded. In our time, object relations, with everything that is normative and progressive about them in the subject's life, with how they are genetically defined as mental development, belong to the register of the imaginary. This register is not, of course, without value, but when one tries to articulate it, it presents all the characteristics of untenable contradiction that I told you about when I was sharply caricaturing the texts that had been published at the start of the academic year in a two-volume collection. We had before our eyes the flagrant contradictions in how this notion of the object relation plays out when it starts to be expressed in terms of a pregenital relation that is becoming genital, with the idea of progress that this entails. These contradictions are upon us immediately, and so the task ahead is to arrange the terms in the most basic fashion.

If we follow what for us is a golden rule, and which draws on our notion of the structure of symbolic activity, the signifier-elements must first be defined by their articulation with the other signifier-elements. This is what justifies our rapprochement with the recent theory of myth.

This theory has imposed itself in a way that is peculiarly analogous to the way in which the simple apprehension of the facts compels us to articulate things. What guides Monsieur Lévi-Strauss in his article in the Journal of American Folklore? What does he use to introduce the notion of The Structural Study of Myth? He quotes a remark from one of his colleagues, A. M. Hocart, who says that if there is one thing that we need to overturn at the outset, then this is the stance that down through the ages has been taken in the name of goodness knows what deep-seated anti-intellectualist bias, which consists in withdrawing psychological interpretations from what is presumed to be an intellectual field only to introduce them again in a field that is qualified as one of affectivity. As the author categorically concludes, this thereby adds, to the inherent defects of the psychological school . . . the mistake of deriving clear-cut ideas . . . from vague notions.

What is here called the psychological school is the school that seeks to find the source of myths in a so-called constant of human philosophy that is somehow generic. We are constantly dealing with such clear-cut ideas, as much in myth as in symptomatic productions. We ascribe to some vague drive something that presents in the patient in a way that is very broadly articulated, which is even what makes for the paradox of how it appears to our eyes as a parasite. It is enough simply to avoid conflating what amounts to a mental play, goodness knows what superfluity of intellectual deduction – which can only be qualified as such from a perspective of the rationalisation of delusion, for example, or of the symptom, but which is an utterly outmoded perspective – with our perspective, from which, on the contrary, the play of the signifier snatches hold of the subject and takes him far beyond all that he can intellectualise therein, but which amounts no less to the play of the signifier with its own specific laws.

I would like to presentify this for you with an image. What is it that becomes palpable for us when little Hans starts coming out with his fantasies one-by-one, and also, from a certain perspective, when we have our eyes peeled for it, in the development of a neurosis when we start to perceive its history and development in a subject, the way in which he has been taken up by it and seized by it? I would say that it's something that he doesn't enter face on. He backs into it somehow. It seems that little Hans, from the moment the shadow of the horse is looming over him, gradually enters a stage-set that takes on an order and organisation, that is erected around him, but which captures him much more than being developed by him. What we see is the articulated aspect by which this delusion develops.

I've just said delusion. It slipped out almost as a parapraxis because what is going on here has nothing to do with a psychosis, yet the term is not inappropriate. On no account can we content ourselves with deducing anything from vague emotions, as Hocart puts it, cited by Lévi-Strauss. On the contrary, we have the impression that the ideational edification – if we can use this expression in the case of little Hans – has its own motivation, its own specific plane and occurrence. It might correspond to some need or other, to some function or other, but surely not to anything that might at any moment be justified by a drive, by an impulse, by a particular emotional movement that would be transposed here to find plain expression. A very different mechanism is at issue, and it necessitates what has been termed the structural study of myth, the first step of which is never to consider any of the signifier-elements independently of the others that arise, and then to reveal this. When I say to reveal it, I mean to develop it on this same plane of a series of oppositions that belong first and foremost to the realm of combinatorics.

What we can see looming up in the course of the development of what is happening for little Hans is not a certain number of themes that would have more or less some affective or psychological equivalent, but rather a certain number of grouped signifier-elements that progressively transpose from one system into another. An example will illustrate this for you.

After the father's first attempts at enlightenment, under Freud's guidance, an especially penile element is isolated in the horse, which will lead Hans to react to this piece of enlightenment by the compulsion to look at the horse. Next, we find that the child is relieved at certain moments by the prohibitive aid that the father brings him concerning his masturbation. We are edging closer to a first attempt at analysing Hans's concern over what has to do with his urinary organ, the Wiwimacher, as he calls it. Hans certainly absorbs the full force of the Aufklärung, the real enlightenment, this being the strong intervention that the father makes so as to connect more directly with what he reckons to be the only real support of the child's anxiety, and which amounts to saying, as Freud incites him to say, that little girls don't have one, while he does have one. And, in a way that does not escape Freud's notice, Hans underscores that his widdler is angewachsen. It is fixed in or enrooted. It is something that will grow and get bigger with him.

Isn't this already a first adumbration of something that appears to lead in the direction of somehow allowing the phobia to fall into disuse, if indeed it is purely and simply the equivalent of the anxiety that is bound to the apprehension of a real that hitherto had not been fully realised by the child? It is then that we see the fantasy of the big giraffe and the little giraffe appear.

I showed you that this fantasy casts us into the field of a creation characterised by a style and a symbolic exigency that are utterly riveting. I'm repeating this for those of you who weren't here. I restored its full scope – and this can only be done from our perspective – to the fact that for Hans there is neither contradiction nor even ambiguity in the fact that one of the giraffes, the little one, is a crumpled giraffe, just as one can crumple up a sheet of paper. He shows this for us. We have an object that until then had its imaginary function and which is now passing over to a sort of radical intervention of symbolisation. This is formulated as such by the subject himself and is underlined by the gesture that he then makes of taking possession of this symbolic position, of occupying it, by sitting on top of the crumpled giraffe, in spite of how the big giraffe calls out and protests. There is something especially satisfying about this for little Hans. It's not a dream. It's a fantasy that he has come up with himself. He goes into his parents' bedroom to speak about it, and he develops it.

The bafflement they evince yet again as to what this is about is firmly underscored. You will have noted the wavering in the observation itself. According to the father, the big giraffe and the small giraffe are initially the father and the mother. Yet right after he says categorically that the big giraffe is the mother and the little one is her genital organ, ihr Glied, and so this is another form of the relational value of these two signifiers. But will this suffice us? Surely not, because the father makes a fresh intervention, telling the mother, Good-bye, big giraffe! Having so far accepted a different interpretative register, the child doesn't reply Oh yes! – which is what the French [and the English] translation has, and which fails to get across the point and the scope of his interjection – but rather Nicht wahr, that can't be true! And he adds, and Hanna's the crumpled giraffe, isn't she?

What are we touching on here? What is this other mode of interpretation doing here? Does this really have to do with Hanna and her Krawall, in the sense that further on in the observation we shall see little Hanna appearing to be quite bothersome on account of her crying? We cannot fail – so long as we keep our ears open to the signifier-element – to identify this crying with the mother crying out in the fantasy.

What ultimately, and what alone, is meant by this ambiguity?

Hans's moment of cheerfulness, which even carries a touch of raillery, is something that all by itself designates for us the false path his father is taking in his attempts to make pairs of correspondences between the two terms of the symbolic relationship and some imaginary or real element that they would be there to represent. Hans is right beside the father from one moment to the next to demonstrate that this is not the right path and never will be.

Why will this never be the right path? What Hans is dealing with when the phobia emerges – this being the moment in the observation that we are talking about – is an apprehension of particular symbolic relations that so far have not been constituted for him and which have their own value as a symbolic relationship.

Man, because he is man, is poised in the presence of problems that are problems of the signifier as such. The signifier is introduced into the real by its very existence as a signifier, because, for example, words are being spoken, or because sentences are being articulated and linked up, bound together by some medium, a copula, such as wherefore or because. The existence of the signifier introduces into the world of man something that I expressed near the end of the little Introduction I made in the first issue of La Psychanalyse, to the effect that it is in crossing the flow of things diametrically that the symbol is tethered, in order to lend it another meaning. These are problems to do with the creation of meaning, with everything that this entails in terms of freedom and ambiguity, and everything that might possibly be reduced at any moment to nothingness by the utterly arbitrary nature of a sudden spirited remark.

Just like Humpty-Dumpty in Alice through the Looking-Glass, little Hans is quite capable of saying that this is how things are because this is just what I choose, because he is master. This doesn't stop him from being completely subordinate to the solution of the problem, which arises from his having to adjust the way he had hitherto been relating to the maternal world, the world that was already being organised by the dialectic of the luring between him and his mother, the importance of which I have already underscored for you. Who out of the two of them has the phallus and who doesn't? What does mother desire when she desires something other than me, the child? This was where the child was, but he can stay there no longer.

The function of myth takes hold at this juncture. Once we are on the path to the right way of analysing myth – that of structural analysis – we can see that a myth is always an attempt to articulate a solution to a problem. It's a matter of passing from a certain mode of explication, let's say, bearing on the subject's relationship with the world, or on a society's relationship with the world, to a transformation that is necessitated by the fact that different elements have come to stand in contradiction to the first formulation. These new elements require a shift that as such is impossible, an impasse, and this is what affords the myth its structure.

The same goes for Hans, who at this moment is faced with something that necessitates the adjustment of the first adumbration of the symbolic system that was structuring the relationship with the mother. This is what is at issue in the appearance of the phobia and, far more than this, in the development of everything that the phobia brings with it in terms of signifier-elements. Hans is faced with this, and, by like token, it is what makes his father's every foray into a piecemeal reading appear derisory to the child.

Regarding the style of Hans's responses, I simply must urge you to refer to the absolutely admirable passages that constitute Freud's immense work – which has still scarcely been exploited for our experience – called Der Witz.

This book perhaps has no equivalent in what might be called psychological philosophy. I know of no other that has yielded anything so fresh and trenchant as this work. All the other books on laughter, be it Bergson's or any of the rest, will always be of lamentable poverty alongside this one.

What is the crucial thing that is put before us in Freud's book Der Witz? It targets directly the essential nature of the phenomenon, without dipping off and without falling wide in its considerations. Just as in the very first section of the chapter on The Dream-Work in the Traumdeutung he foregrounds the notion that the dream is a rebus, and no one takes heed – the sentence has gone completely unnoticed – so it doesn't seem to have been realised that section A, the analytic part of Der Witz, opens with the famous layout of his analysis of the phenomenon of condensation as grounded in the signifier. In the example of famillionär, there is a superposition of familiär and Millionär, and everything Freud will develop from it consists in showing us that it is on the level of the suppressed case that the truly destructive term is located, the term that disrupts the play of the signifier as such in relation to what could be called the existence of the real. By playing with the signifier, man calls his world into question, right down to the root. The value of the spirited quip, which distinguishes it from the comical, is its possibility of playing on the nonsense that is fundamental to any use of sense. It is possible, at any moment, to call any element of meaning into question insomuch as it is grounded on a use of the signifier. That is to say, it is grounded on something that in itself is profoundly paradoxical in relation to any possible signification because, in establishing this use, the use itself is what creates what it is designed to sustain.

The distinction between the domain of wit and the domain of the comic is one of the clearest there is. When Freud does touch on the comic in this book, he broaches it only as an ancillary by which to clarify wit by means of a contrast. First of all, he will come upon intermediate notions, highlighting for us the dimension of the naive, which is so ambiguous, and which is my reason for making this excursus.

While on the one hand this dimension of the naive does indeed need to be defined – because it exists – in order to see what manifestations of the naive can arise from the comic, we can clearly see on the other hand the extent to which this naivety is intersubjective. We are the ones who impute naivety to the child, and in a way that some doubt always lingers over it. Why so?

Once again, let's take an example. Freud begins his illustration of the naive with the story of the children who gather an audience of adults for their little drama piece. The show begins. The young actors tell the tale of a poor fisherman and his wife who have fallen on hard times. In an attempt to change their fortune, the husband decides to set off for faraway lands. He comes back after his many exploits, laden with riches, which he shows to his wife. She listens to him, then opens the door of their hut saying, Look, I too have not been idle. A dozen large dolls lie sleeping in a row.

This is the example that Freud gives to illustrate naivety. It is one of the forms in which, were the definition of the comic to be implicated here, the discharge would arise from an economic gain brought about spontaneously by someone who is less naive, and in this different realm would entail a share of tension that even generates a certain degree of embarrassment. The fact that the child goes straight to this enormous gaffe without incurring the least trouble triggers something that transforms into laughter. That is to say, it becomes very droll, with all the overtones of the strange that this word can entail.

But what is at issue here? While on this occasion we are in a zone that borders on the comic, the economy at stake is very precisely the gain that is made from bypassing what such a construction would have undergone if the same things were to be evoked from the lips of an adult. The child somehow makes a reality, directly, of something that takes us to the height of the absurd. He produces what is called naive wit. It's a funny story that triggers laughter because it has come from the mouth of a child, leaving all the room for the adults to rejoice, These kids are priceless! They are assumed to have found, in all innocence and in one shot, what an author would necessarily have taken a great more trouble to find, or what he would have had to enrich with some further subtlety, so that it might pass for something droll, properly speaking.

However, this allows us also to see that it is not altogether certain that the ignorance that has been given free run to hit the bulls-eye is really so complete. To spell it right out, when children's stories possess this disconcerting character of triggering our laughter, we include them in the perspective of the naive, but we know that this naivety is not always to be taken at face value. There is being naive and there is feigning naivety. If we attribute a feigned naivety to the children's drama play, we restore to it its full character of Witz in its most tendentious form, as Freud puts it. It takes very little, indeed it takes no more than for it to be assumed that this naivety is not so very complete, for the children to gain the upper hand and effectively become the masters of the game.

In other words, what is called for is something that Freud highlights, and which I ask you to look up in the text, namely the third person who is always implied in the spirited remark. The first person makes a remark about a second to a third. Whether or not there really are three people standing there, there is always this ternarity which is essential for the remark to trigger laughter. The comic, meanwhile, can be triggered simply between two people, like Freud's example of seeing someone slip and fall down, or when you see someone making a meal out of some task which for us is one of the most straightforward there is. This on its own suffices to trigger the comic relationship. However, in the naive, we can see essentially that the perspective of the third person, even if it remains virtual, is always implicit to some degree. Beyond the child whom we take to be naive, there is but another, who is precisely the one whom we suppose to be there for it to make us laugh so much. After all, it could be that he is feigning to feign, that his being naive is affected.

This dimension of the symbolic is exactly what is there to be felt in the kind of hide-and-seek game, the perpetual mockery, that sets the tone of Hans's every reply to his father.

We see this kind of phenomenon being produced when, at another moment, the father asks Hans, What did you think when the horse fell down? This has to do with the fall from which Hans says he got the nonsense. His father blurts out the question, Was the horse dead when it fell down? As he notes just afterwards, Hans's expression was quite serious when he first replied, Yes! But then the child has a sudden change of mind, and lets out a laugh – this too is noted – saying, No, it wasn't a bit dead. I only said it in jest, im Spaß.

What can this mean? The observation is punctuated by all these little remarks. After Freud allows himself to take in for a moment the tragic resonance of the horse's fall – though is it really certain that this tragic resonance is present on any occasion in the psychology of little Hans? – he becomes mindful of the other, this moustachioed father, the bespectacled one whom he depicts for us, whom he had seen during the consultation sitting beside little Hans. Beside the funny little fellow . . . with all his self-assurance, this other is there, heavy set, eyeglasses full of reflections, trying his hardest with the best will in the world. Freud wavers for a brief moment. The matter at hand is the notorious black on the horse's mouth, which they are now wondering about, peering into it with a lantern, and Freud tells himself, Why, here he is, the long-headed one, it's this ass right here! And when I say this ass . . .

Even so, get it into your heads that this kind of floating blackness around the horse's mouth, which is never elucidated, is nevertheless the real gap that is always concealed behind the veil and the mirror, and which always stands out against the background like a stain. Ultimately, there is a sort of short-circuit from a divine character of professorial superiority, which Freud accentuates with some humour, and the appraisal – which the experience and confidences of his contemporaries show us was always on the ready to come flying out of his mouth – which in French starts with the third letter of the alphabet followed by an ellipsis.[1] What a great . . . president . . . this is, thinks Freud, telling himself that he has right there in front of him the figure that cuts across and joins up with the intuition of the fundamentally abysmal character of what stands out from the background.

So, in these conditions, no doubt little Hans is leading the game rather well from one turn to the next when he corrects himself, when he laughs, and when in one fell swoop he cancels out a long series of what he has just been developing in front of his father. We have the impression that he is telling him, I saw you coming. On first approach, he accepts the word dead as an equivalent to fallen, but in a second moment he tells himself, You're repeating the Professor's lesson to me, that is, precisely what the Professor has just insinuated, namely that Hans is against his father to the point of wishing him dead.

This is something that comes to contribute, therefore, to these rules of ours. As I said, first of all one maps out the signifiers in accordance with their essentially combinatorial value. The full set of signifiers that is brought into play is there to restructure the real by introducing this newly combined relationship. To take up again the reference to the first issue of La Psychanalyse, it is not merely for the sake of it that what you can see on the cover is the symbol of the signifier-function as such.[2] The signifier is a bridge in a domain of significations. The consequence of this is that the signifier doesn't reproduce significations. It transforms and recreates them.

This is what is at stake, and this is why we always need to focus the lens of our question on the signifier.

We need to be attentive to the twist in the signifier that little Hans brings about. What is its point of departure and what is its point of arrival?

So it is that in each of the stages that he travels through over the first five months of 1908, we can see him turning his interest successively to what is loaded and unloaded, or to what heaves into motion with more or less of a jolt, and which also might tear prematurely away from its landing dock. Among all these linkages of variously fantasmatic signifier-elements revolving around the theme of movement, or more exactly, if you will allow this, within the theme of movement, the term of modification, acceleration, there is specifically the word Bewegung, motion. This element is absolutely essential in the structuration of the first fantasies and gradually brings out other elements, among which are the mother's drawers, a pair of yellow ones and a pair of black ones. We must pay particular attention to what happens in relation to this element of the drawers.

Without the perspectives that I have been trying to introduce for you, this passage is utterly incomprehensible. The father gets his knickers in a twist, if you will forgive the pun. As for Freud himself, he says simply that the father led the analysis to become obscure and uncertain, but nevertheless in a side note at the end of the exchange he indicates a certain number of perspectives, and in particular that doubtless the father had failed to recognise a fundamental distinction linked to the difference between the sounds made by a man micturating and a woman.

Little Hans says things that are quite incomprehensible. Surely he wants to tell us that the longer a pair of drawers is worn, the blacker they become. This follows a number of developments in which one can see that when the drawers are yellow they have such-and-such a value, and when they are black they don't. When he sees the yellow drawers separate from his mother, it makes him want to spit. When his mother is wearing them, it doesn't make him want to spit. In short, Freud insists and says in a footnote that without doubt what little Hans wants to indicate here is that the drawers have a different function for him depending on whether his mother has them on or he sees them on their own account.

We have, therefore, enough signposts to see that Freud himself is heading towards an adumbration of the total dialectical relativisation of this pairing of the yellow drawers and the black drawers. In the course of the long and complicated conversation in which little Hans and his father try to unravel the question together, it transpires that this pairing only takes on a value when it manifests a series of oppositions, which have to be sought out in remarks that at first go quite unnoticed. At any rate, they go drastically unnoticed when one tries sweepingly to identify the yellow drawers with something like urination, for instance, and the black drawers with something that in Hans's language is called lumf.

Furthermore, it is quite wrong to identify this lumf with defecation, thereby overlooking what is essential to Hans about this element. We have his father's own testimony that Hans's word Lumpf is a transformation of the word Strumpf, a stocking, and in another part of the observation little Hans associates it with a black blouse. It partakes of the crucial function of clothing as a concealing function. It is also the screen onto which is projected the major object of his preoedipal questioning, namely the missing phallus. The fact that excrement as such should be designated by a term allied to this symbolisation also shows us clearly enough that the instinctual relationship, the anality concerned in the mechanism of defecation, is a trifling matter alongside the symbolic function. Here, once again, this is the dominant register.

For little Hans, the symbolic register is linked to a questioning that is vital for him – What can be lost? What can pass out through the hole? These are the first elements of what might be called a symbolic instrumentation which thereafter little Hans will examine while developing his mythical construction that includes, in the first dream, the bath that the fitter comes to unscrew, or later, in the second dream, his behind, which will also be unscrewed, along with his penis as well. All of this gives rise to the greatest delight in Freud and the father alike, it has to be said.

They are in such a rush to impose their signification on little Hans that they don't even wait for him to finish his remarks on the unscrewing of his little widdler before they tell him that the only possible explanation is that, quite naturally, this was so that he could be given a bigger one. Little Hans doesn't say that at all, and on no account do we know whether he would have said it had he been allowed to speak to the end. Nothing indicates that he would have said it. Little Hans speaks only of replacement. This is an instance where we can touch on the countertransference. The father is the one who comes out with the idea that if Hans's widdler and behind are being changed, it's so that he can be given bigger ones. This is an example of the kinds of wrongs that are done all the time. After Freud, people have not held back from perpetuating this tradition, following a mode of interpretation that goes hunting out in goodness knows what affective proclivity whatever might prompt and justify what actually possesses its own laws, its own structure, its own gravitational pull, and which ought to be studied as such.

We are going to draw to a close by saying that, in the mythical development of a symptomatic signifying system, one should always take into consideration its systematic coherence, at each step of the way, along with the kind of development that is specific to it in the diachrony of time. The development of any mythical system in a neurotic – I once called it the neurotic's individual myth – presents as the issuing, the progressive dislocation, of a series of mediations that are resolved by a chaining-up of signifiers which always bears a circular character. This may be more or less apparent but is none the less fundamental in that the point of arrival bears a deep relation to the point of departure, without being exactly the same. I mean that the impasse that is always there at the start is to be found again at the point of arrival, where it can be regarded as a solution in an inverted form, just with a change of sign. But the impasse from which one began is always found in some fashion at the end of the operative displacement of the signifying system.

I will be illustrating this for you in the next part, along the winding paths that we shall take after the holiday break, by taking up the hand that Hans was dealt.

At the start, little Hans was faced with something that until then had been the game of the phallus, which was already a sort of luring relationship that was sufficient to maintain a progressive movement between him and his mother, and which offered him the meaningful prospect and goal of perfect identification with the object of maternal love. But then a new element came on the scene.

On this score, I concur with the authors, with the father and with Freud. A problem arises, the importance of which in the child's development cannot be overestimated. It is grounded on the fact that nothing in the subject himself has been pre-established or arranged in advance which might allow him to take on board the prospect that sharply confronts him at two or three moments during his childhood development, namely the prospect of growth. Given the fact that nothing is pre-established or predetermined on the imaginary plane, what brings in an essential element of perturbation is very precisely a phenomenon that is quite distinct, but which for the child comes to be annexed imaginarily at the time of his first confrontation with the prospect of growth, namely the phenomenon of turgescence.

That the penis should go from being smaller to larger during the first childhood masturbations or erections is no different from one of the most fundamental themes in the imaginary fantasia of Alice in Wonderland, and which lends this work its absolutely choice value in the matter of childhood imagination. Hans is confronted with a problem of this sort, that of integrating something that is linked to the existence of the real penis, the distinct existence of a penis that can itself become bigger or smaller, but which is also the penis that belongs to the small one or to the big one.

To spell it right out, the problem of Hans's development at this moment is linked to the absence of the penis of the big one, that is to say, of the father. And the phobia is produced in so far as Hans must face up to his Oedipus complex in a situation that necessitates a particularly difficult symbolisation.

However, the fact that the phobia develops as it does, and that the analysis produces this abundance of mythical proliferation, indicates to us, in the same way that the pathological reveals the normal, the complexity of the phenomenon at stake when it comes to the child integrating the real of his genitality, along with the deeply and fundamentally symbolic character of this moment of passage.

Wherefore the horse?
From horse to railway
Hans's back and forth
Wegen and Wägen

If you needed reminding of the constitutive character of the impact of the symbolic in human desire, it seems to me that, for want of any accurate focus upon the most common and everyday experience, a quite riveting example may be found in the following formula, the immediacy and omnipresence of which should be lost on no one. What is at issue here is a formulation of the desire that is perhaps the keenest of all human desires, the most constant at any rate, which at certain turning points in the lives of each and every one of us we cannot fail to recognise, not to mention in the lives of those to whom we grant the closest attention, those who are tormented by some subjective unease. This desire, to name it at last, is called the desire for some other thing.

What is meant, in terms of instinctual coaptation, by this desire for some other thing? What can it mean in the register of the object relation, which is conceived of as a sort of developmental evolution that is immanent to itself, arising by way of successive thrusts that it would be a mere matter of fostering? If the object relation is referred to a type object that is somehow preformed, where can this desire for some other thing come from?

This preliminary remark is intended to put you, as Freud expresses it somewhere in his letters in connection with Egyptian realms, in [. . .].[1]

What I have just said is not unrelated to my subject, namely little Hans.

What have we been trying to detect in the mythical fomentation that is the essential characteristic of the observation on little Hans?

What I'm calling mythical fomentation refers to each of the different elements, the ambiguity of which I have pointed out to you, along with how they are essentially designed to cover just about any signified, but not all the signifieds at the same time. When one of the signifiers covers one such element of the signified, the other signifier-elements that are in play cover other signifieds. In other words, the signifying constellation operates by means of something that we may call a system of transformation, that is, a turning motion which, when looked at more closely, covers the signified, from one moment to the next, in a different way, and by the same movement seems to exercise upon it an action that profoundly reshapes it.

Why is this so? How are we to conceive of the dynamic function of this kind of sorcery, the instrument of which is the signifier and the goal of which, or the result of which, must be a reorientation of the signified, its repolarisation and reconstitution after a crisis?

We are posing the question from this angle because we believe that it has to be posed in this way, for the simple reason that if we are turning our interest to the child's mythical fomentation, or, to call it by a name that is more common, which says exactly the same thing yet in a form that is not so well adapted, childhood theories of sexuality, it's not because they are merely a kind of superfluity, an insubstantial dream, but rather because in themselves they harbour a dynamic element. This is what is at issue in the observation on little Hans, without which it wouldn't make any sense whatsoever.

We ought to tackle this function of the signifier without any preconceived idea about the observation, because this observation is more exemplary than any other. It was seized in the miracle of origins where, if I may say so, the mind of the inventor and of those who followed him had not yet had time to become weighed down with all sorts of taboo elements, with the reference to a real that is founded on prejudices that somehow find goodness knows what support in earlier references, which are precisely those that are called into question, shaken up and discredited by the field that had just been discovered. In its freshness, the observation on Hans still maintains its revelatory power. I would almost say its explosive power.

Over the course of this complex evolution, the dialogue with the father that Hans is caught up in plays a role that is inseparable from the furtherance of the said mythical fomentation. It may even be said that with each new intervention from the father, this mythi-cal fomentation that is in some sense prompted, bounces back and starts afresh, before falling back into a state of vegetation. However, as Freud expressly remarks at one turn, it has its own laws and its own particular necessities. What Hans gives us is not always what is expected of him, far from it. He comes out with things that surprise, which the father in any case was not expecting. While Freud indicates that he had forewarned the father of them, Hans comes out with things that go beyond what Freud himself could foresee, because Freud doesn't hide the fact that many elements remain unexplained and, on occasion, uninterpreted.

But do we need all of them to be interpreted? We can sometimes press a little further the interpretation made by the two collaborators, Hans's father and Freud, but what we are trying to do here is to reconstitute the specific laws of gravitation behind the coherence of the signifier which appears to accrue around the horse.

Freud tells us quite purposefully that we might be tempted to qualify the phobia by its object, the horse in this instance, so long as we perceive that the horse extends far beyond what appears as something of a supervalent figure, a heraldic figure, which focuses the entire field and is laden with all sorts of implications, and above all signifying implications.

So, a certain number of reference points are necessary in order to mark out where our path is now to lead.

We are not broaching anything new, because Freud himself articulates this in the most deliberate fashion. This passage is to be found after Hans's first dialogue with his father in which the child starts to draw out of the phobia what I am calling its signifying implications. What Hans is able to construct around this is rich in mythical or even in novelistic aspect. It is rich in a fantasmatisation that bears not only on the past but also on what he would like to do with the horse, or in relation to the horse. There is no doubt that it accompanies and modulates his anxiety, but it also carries its own constructive force. After the dialogue that we are coming to now, between Hans and his father, Freud indicates that the phobia has plucked up courage, that it is developing, that it is venturing to show itself in its various phases. He writes the following – in this we get to see how diffuse it really is. It extends on to horses and on to carts, on to the fact that horses fall down and that they bite, on to horses of a particular character, on to carts that are heavily loaded. I will reveal at once that all these characteristics were derived from the circumstance that the anxiety originally had no reference at all to horses but was transposed on to them secondarily and had now become fixed upon those elements of the horse complex which showed themselves well adapted for certain transferences.

So, Freud formulates this in the most deliberate fashion. We have two poles. The first pole is that of the signifier, and this signifier will serve to support the full series of transferences, that is to say, the reshaping of the signified across all the possible permutations of the signifier. We may suppose as a working hypothesis, to the extent that it conforms to everything that our experience requires, that in principle the signified will be different from what it was at the start. Something has happened on the side of the signified. By means of the signifier, the field of the signified will be either reorganised or extended in some way.

So, wherefore the horse? Things can be spun out in this regard. The horse is a theme that is rather rich in mythology, in legends and fairy tales, and in what is most constant yet opaque in the oniric thematic, namely the nightmare, the mare of the night. Dr Jones dedicated a whole book to this to show us that it is no accident that the mare of the night is not simply the anguishing apparition of the night-fiend, but that the mare is a substitute for the fiend. Of course, in keeping with the good old custom, Dr Jones goes searching in his analysis on the side of the signified, which brings him to the finding that everything is in everything. He shows us that there is no god in antique mythology, or even in modern mythology, who eludes this fact of having been a horse in some respect or other. And so Hippios, Mars, Odin, Hermes and Zeus are all horses. It's a matter of finding out why. They are horses. And they have horses. Everything is a horse in this book. Clearly it's not hard to show on this basis that the root MR, which is at once mare and the Gaelic mara, and also mer in French, is a root that in itself comprises a signification that is that much easier to find in that it covers pretty much everything.

Obviously this is not the path along which we are to proceed. We are not about to imagine that all the explanations stand on the side of the horse. There is certainly on the side of the horse something that entails all sorts of analogous inclinations that turn it into something that, as an image, can be a favourable receptacle for all sorts of symbolisations of natural elements that come to the fore in childhood preoccupations, which indeed is the turn in the path at which we find little Hans. The accentuation that I'm trying to give here, which has always been neglected in every quarter, is that this is not what is essential. The essential point is that a certain signifier is brought in at a critical moment in Hans's evolution, and this signifier plays a polarising and re-crystallising role. Doubtless this looks to us like something pathological, but it is assuredly a constitutive factor. From this moment forth, the horse starts to punctuate the outside world with what Freud will much later qualify – looking back on Hans's phobia in Hemmung, Symptom und Angst – as a signal function. These signals effectively restructure the world for Hans, a world that thereafter is profoundly marked by all sorts of limits, the property and function of which we must now try to grasp.

What can it mean that, these limits having been constituted, there is by the same stroke a constitution of the possibility, through the fantasy or through desire, of a transgression of the limit at the same time as a constitution of an obstacle, an inhibition, that checks the subject within this limit? All of this is done with an element that is a signifier, the horse.

To understand the function of the horse, the path to be taken is not that of trying to find what the equivalent of the horse is, whether it's little Hans himself, or Hans's mother, or Hans's father, because it's all of these and many other things besides. It can be anything and everything in all this, in that little Hans makes successive attempts to apply to his world, in order to structure it, the signifying system that is coherent with the horse. Throughout these attempts, the horse manages to cover one or another of the major composite elements in the world of little Hans, notably his father, his mother, himself, his little sister Hanna, his little playmates, the fantasmatic girls, and many more. So, what is at stake, what we need to consider, is that the horse, when it is introduced as the central point of the phobia, introduces a new term that has precisely the property of being an obscure signifier. There is a wordplay here, in that I would almost say that un signifiant can be taken as a complete whole, as insignifiant. In some respect, it is insignificant. This is where it has its most profound function. It plays the role of a ploughshare that will furrow the real in a new way.

We can conceive of how necessary this is.

Up to that point, everything had been all well and good for little Hans.

The appearance of the horse is secondary. Freud firmly underscores how it is shortly after the appearance of the diffuse signal of anxiety that the horse will start to function. It is by following the development of this function step-by-step, right through to the end, that we can manage to comprehend what has happened.

So, little Hans suddenly finds himself in a situation that has assuredly decompensated. Why did this come about? Up to a certain date, 5 or 6 February 1908, that is to say, a couple of months before his fifth birthday, he seemed to be bearing everything rather well. Something happens, and let's take it as directly as possible in the terms of reference that are set out in the observation. The game was being pursued with the mother on the basis of the lure of seduction that thus far had been fully sufficient. The love relation with the mother introduced the child to the imaginary dynamic into which he would gradually be initiated. I would almost say, to introduce the relation to the bosom, in the sense of lap, from a new angle, that he insinuated himself into it. We have seen how at the start of the observation this was spreading out constantly as the game with the hidden object that Hans played in a sort of perpetual veiling and unveiling. Now, into these relationships with his mother, which were being pursued on a playful basis, certain real elements are introduced. The rules of the game, which revolved around dialogue on symbolic presence and absence, are suddenly violated for Hans.

Two things appear. The first arises when Hans is no longer in a position to respond in full. I mean when he is no longer able to show, actually and in in its most glorious state, his little penis. Right there and then, he is rebuffed. His mother tells him word for word not only that it's forbidden but that it's eine Schweinerei. It's piggish. It's something repugnant. We assuredly cannot fail to see an element that is utterly essential here. Moreover, Freud underscores that the effects of the depreciative intervention did not arise straightaway but in the manner of aftershocks. He underscores the term that I've been repeating and pushing to the fore of analytic reflection, namely après coup, retroaction. He says nachträgliche Gehorsam, which means deferred obedience. Gehör is hearing, an attentive audience. Gehorsam is submission, docility. Such threats and rebuffs are not brought to bear immediately, but after a lapse of time.

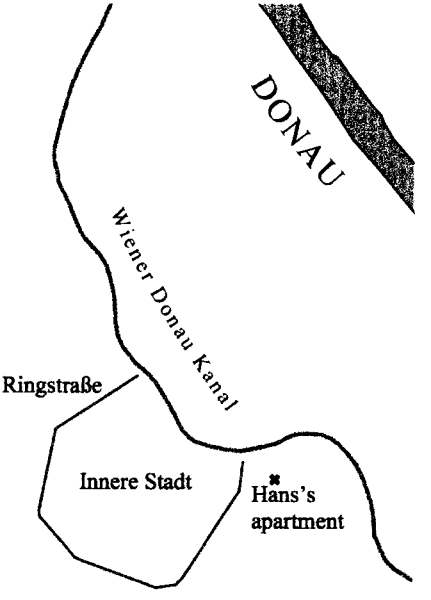
And so my position would be far from a partial one. Freud also underscores, and not merely between the lines, a real element of comparison, of Vergleichung. In making comparisons between big and small, Hans has accurately assessed the reduced, minuscule and ridiculously insufficient character of the organ in question. It is this real element that comes to be added to the rebuff, lending it a weight that shakes the edifice of the relationships with his mother right down to its foundations.

To this we may add a second element, the presence of little Hanna. At first this presence is taken from multiple angles of highly diverse patterns of assimilation. Further to this, however, it comes increasingly to vouch for another element of the game that is very present here, and which also calls into question the whole edifice, all the principles and all the bases of the game, perhaps even to the point of rendering it superfluous in this instance. Those who have experience with children know that these are facts of common experience that the analysis of the child puts constantly before us.

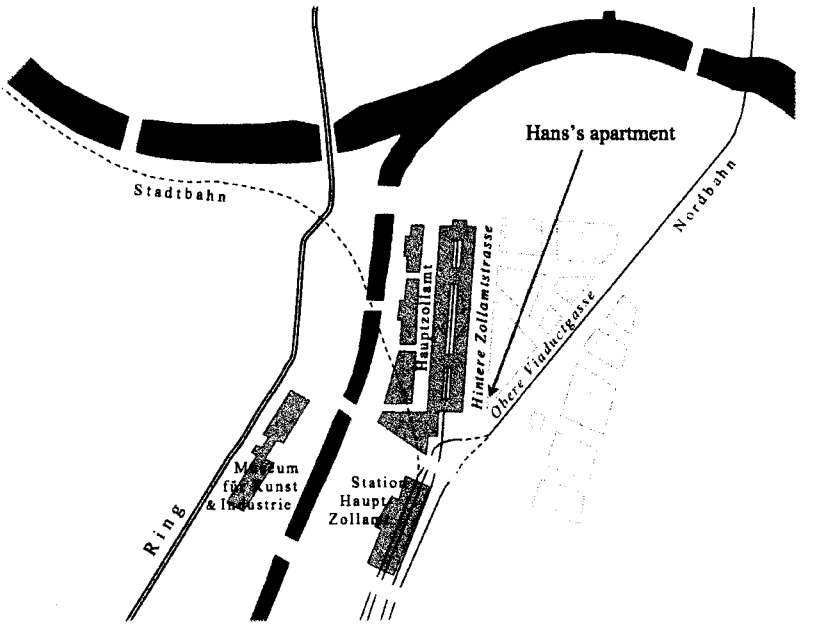
For the time being, what is occupying us is the way in which the signifier will operate in the midst of all this. What is to be done? One has to go to the text and make the construction. One has to know how to read. When we see things recurring in a certain way, with the same elements but recomposed in a different fashion, one has to know how to register them as such, without hunting out remote analogous references, without alluding to earlier events that we might extrapolate or assume in the subject. It is not, as we say in everyday language, the symbol of something that he is cogitating. It's something else entirely. It's a matter of laws that manifest this structuration, which is not real but symbolic. These laws will start to play out amongst themselves, to operate, as it were, by themselves in an autonomous fashion. At least they need to be regarded as such for a while, so that we can perceive whether this operation of reshaping, of reconstruction, is in itself something that is operative in this instance.

I'm going to illustrate this for you.

On 22 March, the father takes little Hans to see his grandmother in Lainz, as he does every Sunday. This is a crucial point. Let's sketch out a map.



Vienna's Innere Stadt is located on a bank of the Donaukanal, a former arm of the Danube. The home of Hans's parents is in this part of the old town, delimited by the Ringstraße.



Across from their apartment stands the Hauptzollamt, the Head Customs House, and a little further off stands the Hauptzollamt station that is frequently mentioned in the observation. Facing the Customs House [on the other side of the Wien river], you have a square where now stands the Kriegsministerium and a very nice museum, the Museum für Kunst und Industrie. The Hauptzollamt is where Hans thinks of going once he has made some progress and is able to get beyond a stretch of space that lies in front of their apartment. I am inclined to think that their apartment is right at one end of the block, on the road behind the Customs House, because there is an allusion to the fact that the Nordbahn runs past opposite our house. Now, the Nordbahnhof is on the other bank of the Danube Canal. There are quite a few of these light railway networks in Vienna, feeding in from east and west and from north and south. But there are also a number of local lines, in particular a circle line that is sunk into a cutting. It's probably the same one that the young homosexual woman, whom I spoke about at the start of the year, threw herself into. There are two lines that are of interest to us as far as little Hans's adventures are concerned. There is a link-line, the Verbindungsbahn, connecting the Nordbahnhof to the Meidling Südbahnhof, which runs nearby the apartment block in which Hans's apartment is located, and it is on this line that Hans can see the truck, what Freud calls eine Draisine, on which he would like so much to ride. Before then, he had also been to another station, to take a train that for some stretches runs underground, and this is the line that goes to Lainz.

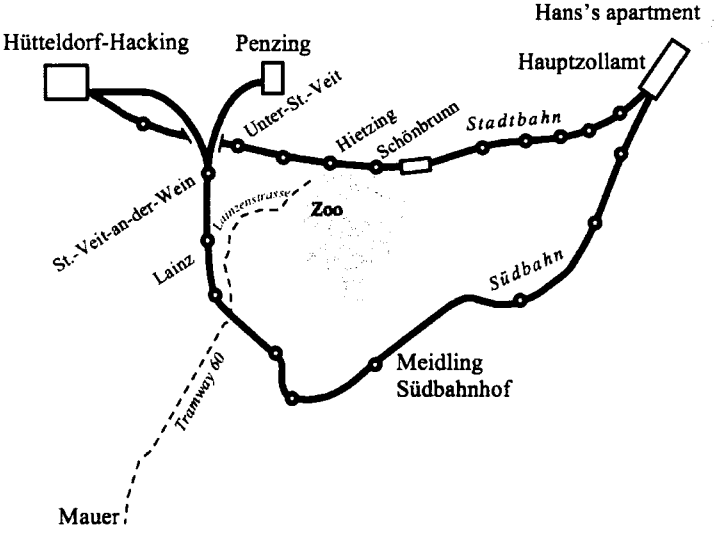
On Sunday 22 March, Hans's father proposes that they take a route that is slightly more complicated than their usual one.



They will take the Stadtbahn and stop at Schönbrunn palace, which is like a Viennese Versailles. This is where the zoological garden is that little Hans visits with his father and which plays such an important role in the observation. It's far less grandiose than Versailles. The House of Hapsburg was probably much closer to the people than was the House of Bourbon, because you can see how even at a time when the city didn't spread out quite so far, its profile was visible on the horizon. After the visit to Schönbrunn park, they will take the steam tramway, which at the time was line 60, and this will bring them to Lainz. To give you an idea of scale, Lainz is about the same distance from Vienna as Vaucresson is from Paris.[2] The tramway carries on beyond Lainz to Mauer and Mödling. Usually, when they just go to the grandmother's house, they take a south-bound tramway that goes straight to Lainz. A further tramway line links this direct line and the Stadtbahn. The connection is made at the station Unter-St-Veit.

This will allow you to understand what little Hans will say on the day that he has the fantasy of coming back home from Lainz, when he says that the train left with him and his grandmother on it while his father missed it, and that he can see the second train coming from Unter-St-Veit. The network forms a loop, a virtual loop because the two lines don't connect. They simply allow each of them to get to Lainz.

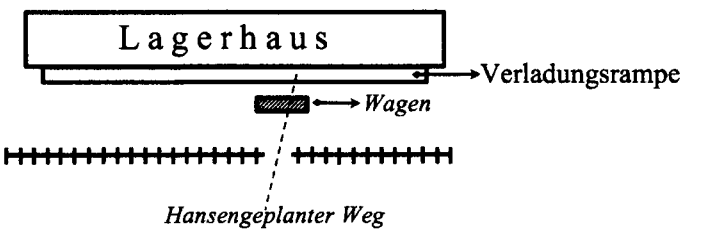
A few days later, in conversation with his father, little Hans will come out with something that is classified among the many things that he shows us he has been pondering. Even when everyone wants to make him say that he has been dreaming, he underlines very firmly that these are things he has thought – Nein, nicht geträumt; ich hab' mir's gedacht.

The essential point to keep in mind is that this is where the Verkehrskomplex makes its entrance. Freud himself indicates that it is quite natural, given how matters stand, that what refers to the horse and everything that the horse will do, the Pferdekomplex, extends much further into the transport system. In other words, on the horizon of the circuits traced by the horse there are the circuits of the railway.

This is so evidently true that the first explanation Hans gives his father on how he experiences his phobia concerns the fact that there is a large yard and a wide lane in front of their apartment. It's easy to understand why it's such a big deal for little Hans to cross over them. Across from the house, these horses-and-carts come to load and unload, and they line up along the length of the loading dock.



The tangency, as it were, between the circuit system of the horse and the circuit system of the railway is indicated in the clearest fashion the very first time that little Hans starts to explain himself a little on the horse phobia.

What does little Hans say on 5 April? He says that he should so much like to climb onto the cart where he has seen the boys playing on the boxes. If the cart stands still, then I can get on to the cart quick, geschwind, and get on to the board. By board he means the loading deck. What is he afraid of? He fears that the horses will set off and prevent him from making this swift movement, and then he will have to get straight back off again.

There must be some meaning to this. To comprehend this meaning, and to comprehend anything in the functioning of the signifying system, one should not start with the question of what the board might be doing here, or what the cart might be doing here, or even what the horse is doing here. The horse certainly is something, and at the end we will be able to say what its purpose is, when we find this out from its functioning. But as yet we can't know anything.

We need to pause on this horse. His father pauses here. Everybody pauses here, except the analysts who pore endlessly over the observation on little Hans, trying to read something into it. The father takes an interest in this and asks him why he is afraid. Perhaps you're afraid you won't come home any more if you drive away in the cart? he says. Oh no! replies little Hans, I can always come back to Mummy, in the cart or in a cab. I can tell him the number of the house too. There's no difficulty.

No one seems to have paused on this, yet it's striking that while Hans is afraid of something, this something is absolutely not what it would suit us so well for it to be. This could even lead in the direction of the comprehension of things that I've been trying to mobilise for you, namely the theme of being dragged along by the situation. That would be a nice metaphor. But this is not at all the case. He knows very well that he will always come back to his point of departure. If we have just a little comprenoire,[3] we could tell ourselves that perhaps after all this is what is at stake, namely that, whatever is done, there's no getting out of it. This is a simple indication that I'm making in passing, but to stick with this might well be overly subtle and insufficiently rigorous.

We ought rather to perceive that there are situations in the observation that we are compelled to fetch alongside this one. We have to pause over this because this is the very phenomenology of the phobia. Here we can behold the total ambiguity of what is desired and what is feared. In the end, we might believe that it's the fact of being dragged away, of leaving, that anguishes little Hans. But by his own testimony, this fact of leaving falls quite short because he knows full well that one always comes back. What, then, is meant by his wanting in some sense to go beyond?

Surely this formula – that he wants to go beyond – is something that we can provisionally maintain in a sort of minimal construction. If his whole system is in disarray due to the fact that the rules of the game are no longer being respected, he can feel himself to be caught, purely and simply, in an untenable situation, the most untenable element in the situation being that of no longer knowing where to locate himself.

I am now going to bring in other elements that in a certain way reproduce what is indicated in the fantasy of the phobic dread.

In the first fantasy, Hans will drive off with the horses, carrying him further away from the loading dock. And he will come back to re-converge with Mummy, which maybe he desired too much, or feared too much, who knows?

When we have read and reread the observation, we should remember at least two further stories.

There is another fantasy, which doesn't crop up at just any moment, and which is supposed to have happened. He imagined the rest with his father. The date is 11 April. We were travelling in the train to Gmunden. Gmunden is where they spend their holidays. In the station we put on our clothes; but we couldn't get it done in time, and the train carried us on. It seems that at that time, gathering together one's luggage and getting it on board was more of a worry than it is for us these days. Freud himself hints at this in the case of the young homosexual woman when he makes his analogy with the two stages of a journey. The first entails all the necessary preparations, today so complicated and hard to effect, the second involves getting the luggage and oneself aboard. So, Hans and his father don't have time to put on their clothes before the train starts off again.

There is then a third fantasy, which Hans tells his father on 21 April and which we shall call the platform scene. These are just conventional labels to help us find our bearings later on. It occurs just before the major dialogue with his father to which we have been referring. Hans tells his father, There was a train at Lainz and I travelled with my Lainz Grandmummy to the Hauptzollamt station. This grandmother is the woman they visit every Sunday, about whom we are told absolutely nothing in the observation, and I must say that this is rather suggestive of a fearsome character, because at that time it was much easier for contemporaries to situate the whole family than it is for me today. So, die Lainzerin, as Hans later calls her, is supposed to be on board the train with him. His father, meanwhile, hadn't got down from the bridge yet, and they have left without him. Given that the trains pass frequently, and one can see down the line as far as Unter-St-Veit, Hans says that he arrives at the platform in time to catch the second train with his father.

If little Hans had already left, how did he come back? This is precisely the impasse. In truth, it's an impasse that no one has managed to elucidate, but the father does ask himself these questions. In the observation, a dozen lines are devoted to what might have occurred in Hans's mind. As for us, let's content ourselves with our schemas.

In the first schema, the two of them leave, Hans and his grandmother. The second, mysteriously, is the path of the impossible, of non-solution. In the third, they end up leaving as two, Hans and his father. In other words, there is something that cannot fail to strike us if we are already roughly acquainted with the two poles of the observation on little Hans, namely, at the start, the whole maternal drama that is constantly underlined, and, at the end, I am now with father. One cannot overlook how there must be a certain relation between this implacable back and forth to his mother and the fact that one fine day he dreams of marching off with his father. This is a simple indication, but it's clear. Only, it's quite impossible. That is to say, one really can't see how little Hans, having set off with his grandmother, can now set off again with his father. This is possible only in the imaginary.

What we can see appearing here between the lines is the fundamental schema that I told you was the schema for mythical furtherance on the whole – one starts from a point of impossibility, or an impasse, to arrive at another impasse and another point of impossibility. In the first case, it is impossible to leave the mother behind, one always comes back to her. Don't tell me that this is why I'm anxious. In the second case, one may indeed think that all that has to be done is to permute and to leave with the father, as Hans himself thought, to the point of writing as much to the Professor, which is the best use one can make of one's thoughts. Only, what also appears in the text of the myth is that this is impossible, that there is always something left half-open somewhere.

If we start with this schema, we will see that matters are not limited to these elements alone, in that they offer us quite easily, all by themselves, the opportunity of placing them alongside the schema of the hitching.

What is hitched to what? This is surely one of the absolutely primary elements behind the appearance of the choice of the horse signifier, or the use of the horse. It is quite useless to discern in which direction the coupling is made, because the sense in which Hans operates is dictated just as much by the favourable occasions provided by the horse function. We can even say that this is what guided his choice of the horse. In any case, he is careful to show the origin of this when he tells us about the moment he got the nonsense. He tells us this on 9 April, in dialogue with his father, at a moment that is no less noteworthy than any of the other moments, and we shall see what this comes on the heels of.

Hans tells us that he was playing horsey, when something happened that will be of great importance in that it will furnish the first model of the fantasy of injury that will manifest later on with respect to his father. First of all, however, it was extracted from the real, precisely from one of these horsey games, when his friend Fritzl sustains an injury to his foot.

In response to his father's query, Hans says that they played at horses ohne Wagen, without carts, and in this case, the cart can stay at home. However, the horse can also be hitched to a cart. Hans himself articulates how first and foremost the horse is an element designed to be hitched. It is detachable and attachable. This amboceptor characteristic, which we meet constantly in the functioning of the horse, is yielded in the very first experience from which Hans extracts it. Before being a horse, the horse is something that links, that coordinates, and, as you will see, it is precisely in this mediating function that we will find it throughout the development of the myth. If a basis needed to be established for what will be confirmed in every corner of what I am going to develop for you next in the function of the horse signifier, here we have immediately, from the mouth of Hans himself, that it is in the direction of the grammatical coordination of the signifier that we must head.

Indeed, it is at that very moment, when he is articulating this in connection with the horse, that Hans himself says, I think that was how I got the nonsense, Mir scheint, da hab' ich die Dummheit gekriegt. The verb kriegen is used each time in connection with the nonsense. It means to get or to catch. It is also used in the colloquial expression ein Kind kriegen, to denote a woman falling pregnant, like in French when we say une femme attrape un enfant. Once again, this was not lost on the authors, on the father and on Freud. Freud provides a long footnote on it, which everybody has leapt on, to the point that the phrasing has posed something of a difficulty for the translators, who for once have resolved it elegantly. Hans keeps saying, wegen dem Pferd. He comes out with this refrain, that he got the nonsense 'cos of the horse. Freud makes no mistake in identifying this with an association between the word wegen, because of, and the word Wagen, which means carriage, coach, cart, vehicle, and so on, and which Hans would have heard pronounced Wägen. This is how the unconscious works.

In other words, the horse pulls the cart just as something pulls behind it the word wegen. So, there is nothing excessive in saying that it's precisely at this moment, when Hans is prey to something that is not even a wherefore – because beyond the point where the rules of the game are respected there is nothing else but trouble, a lack of being and a lack of any wherefore – that he gives rise to the dragging along of his 'cos of, which doesn't correspond to anything, by something that is the pure and simple x of the horse.

In yet other words, at the begetting of the phobia, at its very point of emergence, we find ourselves faced with the typical process of metonymy, that is to say, the passage from the weight of meaning, or more exactly from the questioning that the comment brings with it, the passage from one point of the textual line, to the point that follows. This is the very definition of metonymy in its structure. It's because the weight of the wegen is entirely veiled, and because it has been transferred to what comes just afterwards, dem Pferd, that the term assumes its articulatory value and accrues to it every hope of a solution. The balance of Hans's situation hangs on this transfer of grammatical weight.

In the end, we are simply meeting again the concrete associations – and not associations imagined in goodness knows what psychological hyperspace – that fall into two kinds. On the one hand there is metaphorical association, where one word corresponds to another for which it can be substituted. On the other hand there is metonymic association, where one word yields the following word that can come next in a sentence. These are the two kinds of response in psychological experience, and you call them associations because you want absolutely for this to occur somewhere in cerebral neurones. I don't know anything about that. At any rate, as an analyst I don't want to know anything about it. I come across these two types of association, called metaphor and metonymy, where they stand, in the text of this pool of language in which Hans is immersed.

It was here that he lighted upon the originative metonymy that brought with it the horse, the first term around which his whole system would be reconstituted.

So, we've arrived at what is being played out between 5 and 6 April. This spatial-temporal moment is not necessarily to be conflated with chronological distance.

We have followed the explanation that little Hans gave his father, on 5 April, of the fantasies he came out with, in which he expresses how he would like to climb up on to the cart that usually unloads in front of their building.

I remind you that we insisted on the ambiguity of the anxiety to which Hans gives shape and form in the fantasy. It might seem that this anxiety arises from the simple perspective of a fear of separation, but we pointed out how what is dreaded here is not necessarily separation from his mother, because when his father asks him about this he specifies that he is quite sure, and almost over sure, of being able to return.

It is on the afternoon of 9 April that the wegen dem Pferd arises, in the course of Hans's revelation of a moment that seems to him to be significant with respect to how he got the nonsense. You know that it's not for nothing that, in the retrospections of memory, the moment when Hans gets his nonsense is far from univocal. He says each time, with equal conviction, I got the nonsense. Everything is grounded upon this, because what is at issue here is nothing other than a symbolic retrospection linked to the signification that is presentified at each moment of the signifying plurivalence of the horse.

There are at least two moments, which we are already familiar with, when Hans says, I got the nonsense.

There is the moment when this wegen dem Pferd arises, which provided me with the peroration to my last lesson, but at the cost of a jump that didn't leave me time to indicate the context in which this manifest metonymy appears. It is in correlation with the story of Fritzl's fall when they are playing horsey in Gmunden.

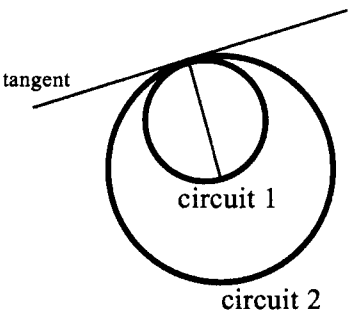
On another occasion he told us that he got the nonsense when he was out with his mother, and the same text notes the paradox of this explication, because if he didn't peel away from his mother once throughout the whole day, it was because she already had his intense anxiety on her hands. So, the anxiety had already begun, and I would further say that the horse phobia had already been declared in the context of this outing in her company.

This is the point we've reached, in Freud's text on the one hand and in our initial decipherment on the other. Last time, I laid this out for you at the level of something that is taking shape, and I indicated its graphical aspect across its three forms.

It concerns things that Hans has thought and concocted. They are never dreams. He always tells his father that he has thought, gedacht, these things. We can recognise here the very material with which we are usually working when we work with children, imaginary material that is always so richly resonant, but what I'm trying to show you is that all these imaginary resonances that can be sounded out here are no match for the succession of structures, the series of which I'm going to try to complete for you today.

These structures are each marked by the same exemplary feature. The fantasy of 5 April, which is complemented by the father's questioning, traces out the idea of Hans's return to his mother.

In the fantasy of 21 April there is another important moment of evolution when Hans imagines, not without reason, that he will set off with his grandmother and then, on the other side of a gap, that his father will join him again in a move that may equally be inscribed into this cycle, with the proviso that we have an enigmatic impossibility here when it comes to the two protagonists joining again after having been separated just an instant before.



Before moving further into a confirmative exploration of this exhaustion of the possibilities of the signifier, which here is the object at the originary level that I'm putting before you, I shall mention again the tangency I indicated. There is the enigmatic circuit of the horse, which is clearly anguishing in the first example and which manifests as impossible in the other, and then its tangency with the larger circuit constituted by the wider system of traffic. Freud himself notes that Hans's imagination was advancing systematically from horses, which draw vehicles, to railways.

Everything takes place between two longings – two nostalgies in the sense of νόστος, a return home – to come and to come back. Freud asserts that the function of return is fundamental to the object, insisting that it ought to have been engendered in the form of something that is re-found, but that, through the subject's development, a necessity is constituted which is strictly correlative to the distance taken from the object. This necessity is correlative to the symbolic dimension, which distances the object, yet so that the subject may re-find it.

This is the truth that is half-eluded, even lost, in the insistence of psychoanalysis today on accentuating the term frustration without understanding that frustration is only ever the first stage of the return to the object which, in order to be reconstituted, must be re-found.

Let's remind ourselves what is at issue in the case history of little Hans.

For Freud, what is at issue is none other than the Oedipus complex, the drama of which brings of its own account a new dimension that is necessary to the constitution of a replete human world and to the constitution of the object. This object is not merely the correlate of what is claimed to be instinctual genital maturation, but rather the fact of having acquired a certain symbolic dimension.

What is this symbolic dimension? To aim directly at what is at stake, given my disquisition thus far with which I am assuming you are already familiar, we can say that it consists in what is involved each time that we are dealing with the appearance of a phobia. Here in the case of little Hans it is manifest. It has to do with what comes to be revealed to the child, from any angle, concerning the fundamental privation by which the image of the mother is marked. It concerns the moment of this intolerable privation, because ultimately the fact that the child himself appears to be threatened by this supreme privation, that of not being able to fulfil her in any way whatsoever, hangs on this moment. Moreover, it is to this privation that the father must bring something. It's as easy as pie – copulation. He gives her what she doesn't have. Good Lord, won't he just give her one![1] This is precisely what is at stake in little Hans's drama, and we can see it gradually being revealed as the dialogue wears on.

People tell us that the environmental image, as they put it these days, of Hans's family circle has not been traced out sufficiently. What more do they want? It's enough to read the case – and not even between the lines – to see the father's constant and diligent presence spreading out, while the mother is mentioned only to the extent that the father asks her whether what she has just said is accurate. Ultimately, the mother is never with little Hans in the observation. Meanwhile, this very sensible, very kind and very Viennese father is right there, sparing no effort in mollycoddling his little Hans and toiling away. And then, every Sunday, he goes to see his mum, with little Hans of course. One cannot help but be struck by the ease with which Freud – knowing as we do what his main ideas were at the time – accepts that little Hans, who slept in his parents' room until he was four years old, could certainly never have beheld any scene that might have unsettled him regarding the fundamental nature of coitus. The father asserts this in what he writes to Freud, and Freud doesn't challenge the affirmation. He probably had his own idea about it, since Hans's mother was Freud's patient.

At one point in the major scene of the dialogue with his father, Hans says du tust eifern. The phrase is almost untranslatable in French, as has been noted by Fliess's son who has focused his attention on this scene. While Fliess's handling is not fully to his credit, his remarks are quite right on this score. He highlights how the expression is almost untranslatable and invokes the resonance of the jealous God in Luther's Ich Dein Gott bin ein eifriger Gott, a God that is identical to the figure of the father in Freudian doctrine. You ought to be a father, you ought to be cross with me, it must be true. By the time Hans manages to say this, much water has flowed under the bridge. He takes a while to reach this moment.

Let's also ask without further ado whether little Hans is in any way gratified in this regard during the course of the crisis. Why would he be gratified, if his father is in this critical position, the apparition of which in the background needs to be conceived of as a fundamental element of the opening from which the phobic fantasy has surged up? It is certainly unthinkable that this very dialogue should have, as it were, psychoanalysed, not little Hans, but his father, making him more virile at the end of the story – which is rather happily settled in four months – than he was at the start. In other words, if it is to the real father that little Hans addresses so urgently his appeal, there is no reason that this should make him rise up in reality.

If, therefore, little Hans reaches a happy solution to the crisis he has entered, it is surely worthwhile asking ourselves whether at the end of this crisis we may deem this to be a completely normal dissolution of the Oedipus complex. Is the genital position, in inverted commas, at which little Hans arrives, something that in and of itself suffices to assure you that his future relation with a woman will be all that one might imagine desirable for it to be?

The question is an open one. And not only is it open but a number of remarks can be made in this regard. If little Hans is destined for heterosexuality, this guarantee might not be enough to make us believe that this heterosexuality would be sufficient in and of itself to ensure a full consistence, so to speak, to the female object.

You see that we are compelled to move forward by a concentric nudge. We have to stretch the canvas, and the picture upon it, over the different poles at which it is attached if we are to be sure of its normal tethering, if we are to be sure that this is the screen upon which we are to pursue this particular phenomenon, namely the development of the phobia, which is correlative with the development of the treatment itself.

A simple example of this kind of panting aspect of Hans's father comes to mind, to get our investigation moving again. After Hans's long explanation of his love for his father – they have spent the morning on this – they have breakfast together and, when the father gets up from the table, Hans tells him, Vatti, renn mir nicht davon!

The [French] translation bears the overwhelming stamp of goodness knows what that the translator has cooked up, but all the same her rendition is not wrong here – Papa reste! Ne t'en va pas au galop! [Stay Daddy! Don't go off at a gallop!] The father notes that he was struck by his saying renn. It's rather, Don't race off like that! One might even add, because in German this is allowed, Don't race off from me like that! We are bringing the question of the analysis of the signifier to the level of the hieroglyphic decipherment of the mythological function, but this doesn't mean that paying attention to the signifier isn't first and foremost a matter of knowing how to read. Obviously this is the precondition for being able to translate correctly. This [French] translation is regrettable given the sound resonance that Freud's oeuvre ought to have for French readers.

So, here we are with the father. Already, we have practically inscribed onto our chart the place that he must occupy. It is through him, through the identification with him, that little Hans ought to be able to find the normal path to the larger circuit onto which it is now time for him to pass. There is so much truth in this that it is confirmed by what is in some sense a doubling of the consultation of 30 March.

The consultation of 30 March is the one to which Hans is brought by his father. In my opinion this is an illustration of the doubling, or indeed the tripling, of the paternal function on which I have been insisting as crucial to any comprehension of the Oedipus complex and of analytic treatment itself, to the extent that the Name-of-the-Father must come into play. Hans's father brings the child before Freud, which allows for a representation of the supra-father, the symbolic father. I must say that when Freud simply prophesises the Oedipal schema, not without a touch of humour which he points out himself, broaching it at the outset, little Hans's harkens to this with a sort of amused interest, with an overtone of How can he know all this? The Professor is surely not God's confidant! The humoristic relation, properly speaking, that sustains little Hans's relation with the remote father that Freud represents is exemplary and marks out also the necessity of this transcendent dimension. Moreover, how wrong one would be to seek always to embody it in the style of terror and respect. It is no less fruitful in this other register where its presence allows little Hans to unfold his problem.

However, as I said, many other things come to pass in parallel with this, which have a great deal more weight for little Hans's progress. Read the observation and you will see that on this day of Monday 30 March, when he is taken to see Freud, the father's account points out two things. The exact function of these two moments is slightly obfuscated due to the fact that he reports them in the preamble, even though the second was a remark that Hans made following the consultation, but he certainly doesn't minimise their importance.

So, the first item. I remind you that it's a Monday, just after the Sunday when they took a slightly more complicated route to the grandmother's house, first going for a stroll in Schönbrunn.[2] Hans recounts to his father a fantasy of a transgression. You can't call it anything else because it's the very image of a transgression. There can be no finer than this utterly unmitigated transgression designated by a rope under which the two of them crawl together. The father explains that this is the rope they had seen in the Schönbrunn gardens, preventing them from crossing a stretch of lawn to see the sheep. Hans had observed that it would be quite easy to slip under the rope, to which his father had replied that respectable people don't crawl under ropes. So, Hans's doesn't fail to respond to this, later, with the fantasy in which they perform the transgression together, zusammen. The fact of doing it together is the important element. And then we told the policeman at the end of the garden, and he grabbed hold of us, uns zusammengepackt.

The importance of this fantasy seems to be amply graspable from its context. Surely what is at stake is to pass over to the register of the father and for them to do something together that will get them taken off, zusammengepackt. This allows for a clarification of the missed embarkation. Of course, the schema has to be taken in reverse to be understood. It is in the very nature of the signifier to present things in a strictly operational fashion. The whole question revolves around embarkation – it's a matter of knowing whether he will set off with his father. Now, setting off with his father is out of the question, precisely because the father cannot make use of this function, at least not the embarkation that is made a reality in their being carted off together. We are going to see what use each of little Hans's successive elaborations have when it comes to getting closer to this goal that is both desired and impossible, but what is already initiated in this first fantasy, just before the consultation with Freud, is already amply indicative.

Here, now, is the second fantasy, which comes as though we simply must make sure we don't overlook the reciprocal function of the two circuits – the small maternal circuit and the large paternal circuit. This fantasy gets even closer to the goal. Returning from Freud's office in the evening, little Hans will give himself over to another transgressive fantasy. He says to his father, I went with you in the train, and we smashed a window. You can't do much better than that when it comes to the signifier of a breakout. Yet again, they are mitgenommen, taken off, by a policeman. And once more this is the full stop, the terminus, of the fantasy.

On 2 April, that is, three days after the consultation, there is the first improvement, which moreover we may suspect to have been overstated because no sooner was Hans seemingly in remission than the father was revising his judgement, writing to Freud that the improvement perhaps was not so complete as I may have represented it. Even so, the lifting spirits that little Hans is starting to show manifest themselves in his being able to stay a little longer in front of the Haustore, the street-door. Let's not forget that in the context of the time, the street-door has the function of representing the family's propriety and decorum. When circumstances force the Gide family to seek a new home, moving a few floors up is of little consequence, but the porte-cochère is another thing altogether. Gide's aunt instructs his recently widowed mother that leaving the building is out of the question – Tu te le dois; tu le dois à ton fils.[3] So, the street-door is no small matter in the topology of what relates to little Hans.

As I told you last time, this street-door and the borderline that it marks is something that is duplicated point-by-point by what stands a little farther off, perhaps not as close by as I said it was last time, but still within view of the main façade of the station on the local Vienna line, the one that regularly takes them to the grandmother's.

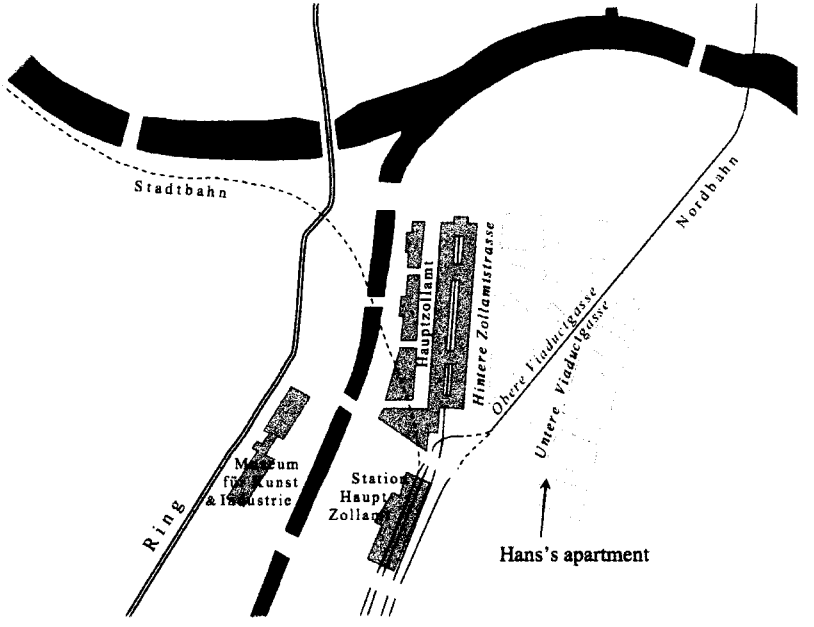
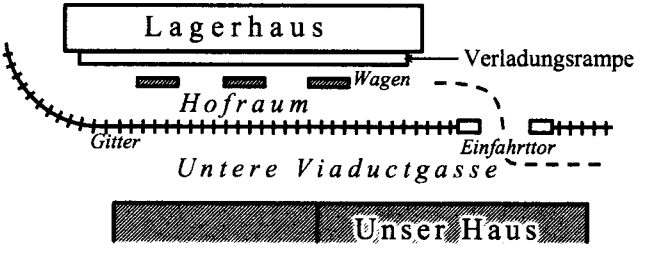
Indeed, trusting in information I had gathered with some care, last week I drew up a schematic map on which the parents' apartment lay behind the Customs House, on Hintere Zollamtstrasse. That was not quite right. I realised this thanks to something that reveals yet again how blind we are to what is right under our noses, and which is called the signifier, the letter.



In the very diagram that we have in the observation that Freud has given us, the name of the street is there, Untere Viaductgasse.



There is a hidden street, which allows us to suppose that on one side of the byway there is a building, which indeed is indicated on the maps of Vienna, that corresponds to what Freud calls a Lagerhaus. It's a special depot for the Office for the Taxation of Food-Stuffs. This accounts for all the different connections that converge here – on one hand the Nordbahn with the little truck that will play a role in Hans's fantasy, and then on the other the possibility of having right opposite their apartment the depot that Freud speaks about, while still keeping the station entrance in full view of their street-door.

So, the stage-set is in place in which the drama is to unfold. Hans's poetic spirit and, if you will, his tragic spirit, will allow us to follow its construction.

How are we to manage to conceive of the fact that the passage to a wider circle was a necessity for little Hans?

I have already said often enough that everything hinges on the stranglehold, the deadlock, that has arisen in Hans's relationship with his mother. We find constant indications of this. The grounding of the child's crisis, insomuch as his mother is the one who until then had ensured the propping up of his insertion into the world, is something that we can grasp at face value in the anxiety that prevents him from roaming beyond a particular radius that corresponds to the sight of his home.

Obsessed as we have been with a certain number of supervalent significations, it so happens that we have often overlooked what has been set out in the clearest way in the text, articulated through a symptom as close to the level of the signifier as the phobia is. His father writes of Hans's venturing outside the house but not going away from it . . . , turning round at the first attack of anxiety. He is turning round to look at their house. Why not try to understand that we merely have to translate this in the same way that Hans presents it to us? What he is afraid of is not simply that one person or another might no longer be at home when he comes back, especially given that his father – and it seems that the mother also has a hand in this – is not always in the circuit. What is in question at the point Hans has reached is, as is expressed in the cart fantasy, that the whole house might just decamp. What is essentially at stake is the house. The house has been the main issue since he first understood that this mother can be missing and at the same time is completely united with him. What he fears is not to be separated from her but to be led goodness knows where with her. We scent this element coming to the surface in the observation from one moment to the next. To the extent that he is joined to his mother, he no longer knows here he is.

I shall simply cite one episode here. It's the occasion I highlighted earlier, on 5 April, when little Hans mentions the outbreak of his nonsense. In a somewhat arbitrary fashion, he says that it arose when he was out with his mother, just after they bought the waistcoat. They saw a bus-horse fall down. These bus-horses are the large horses that used to pull the omnibuses. When the horse falls, Hans thinks, Now it'll always be like this. All horses in buses'll fall down.

To allow the Japanese flower to come back to life in the water of the observation, let's ask ourselves, by simply following the father's line of curiosity, what significance this moment during the day spent with his mother might have. His father asks him, Where did you go with Mummy that day?, and Hans lists the day's programme. They went to the skating rink, then to the Kaffeehaus, then to buy the waistcoat, and from there they went directly to the Zuckerbäcker, the confectioner's shop. Hans says, dann beim Zuckerbäcker mit der Mammi, then to the confectioner's shop with Mummy. This contrasts sharply with what came before. Given the fact that he had been with his mother the whole day, this seems to indicate, not a hole or a censure on the child's part, but certainly that something had happened at that point for him to underscore in this way that he had indeed been with Mummy. He underscores that he had been with his mother, and not with someone else who might have been around. This mit der Mammi carries altogether the same value of accentuation in his discourse as what he said at the start, Nicht mit der Mariedl, ganz allein mit der Mariedl. It surely plays the same role.

The overtone of the father pressing his questioning rather far and then abandoning it fairly suddenly allows us to perceive a trait that is confirmed no less by an earlier occurrence when, talking with little Hans who had just come into his bed, the child said, When you're away, I'm afraid you're not coming home. His father replies, And have I ever threatened you that I shan't come home? Not you, says Hans, but Mummy. Mummy's told me she won't come back. Whereupon, to caulk the gap, his father says, She said that because you were naughty.

Indeed, you can see very well what is going on. Without pushing the character of a police investigation any further, it is right here that we have something that for little Hans calls into question the solidity of his parents' marriage, which in the catamnesis of the observation we learn has come completely undone. It is around this point that revolves the anxiety of being carried off with the maternal love, which has shown its presence since the very first fantasy.

While the horse is there with its property of representing the fall that threatens little Hans, on the other hand there is the danger expressed by the horse's biting.

To the extent that the deepening crisis is commensurate with Hans no longer being able to satisfy his mother, oughtn't we to be struck by the fact that this biting is the retaliation for the fall? One might see some implication here of what is brought into use in a confused way in the idea of a return of a sadistic impulsion – an idea that, as you know, is so important in Kleinian themes – but this isn't really what I have been indicating for you. I said that it was a matter of the child quashing his disappointment in love. Conversely, if he in turn is disappointing, how could he fail to see that he is equally within reach of being consumed? This has become all the more of a threat in view of the privation, and all the more ungraspable because he cannot bite back. The horse is what represents both falling and biting. These are its two properties. I am pointing this out to the extent that, in the first circuit, we can see the element of biting only in an elusive way.

Anyway, let's move on and punctuate now what ensues from a certain moment forth. We will have to pick out how this thing arose, even if it means going back over the sequence of little Hans's fantasies one by one. This sequence includes a number of further fantasies that punctuate in some way what I have called the sequence of mythical permutations.

Here at the individual level the myth certainly cannot, due to all sorts of characteristics, be fully restored to a kind of identity with the developed mythology that lies at the base of any social seat, anywhere in the world, wherever myths are functionally present. And don't imagine that even where they appear to be absent, in our scientific civilisation, they are not there somewhere. Nevertheless, even if this identity cannot be restored, there is one characteristic of mythical development that is maintained at the individual level and this is its function as a solution to a situation that is in deadlock, in impasse. This is little Hans's situation between his father and mother. The individual myth reproduces on a small scale the fundamental character of mythical development such as it presents wherever we can get a sufficient purchase on it. All in all, it's a matter of how to face up to an impossible situation through the successive articulation of all the different forms of the impossibility of a solution.

It is in this respect that mythical creation responds to a question. It roams, as it were, around the full circle of what presents both as a possible opening and an opening that it is impossible to take. Once the circuit has been run through, something has become a reality, signifying that the subject has placed himself at the level of the question. It is in this respect that Hans is a neurotic and not a pervert.

There is nothing artificial about distinguishing in this way the direction of Hans's evolution from another possible direction. This direction is indicated in the observation itself, as I am going to show you next time, but I can already point out that all these goings-on in relation to the mother's drawers indicate in negative the path Hans could have taken on the side of what culminates in fetishism.

The little pair of drawers is there for no other reason than to present to us the resolution that Hans could have taken, of becoming attached to these drawers behind which there is nothing, but upon which he might have depicted what he would have wished. It is precisely because little Hans is not a mere nature lover, but a metaphysician, that he conveys the question to its proper place, that is to say, right where there is something that lacks, and where he asks what the reason is – in the mathematical sense of raison, the common difference – behind this wanting being. And he will conduct himself, just like the collective mind of a primitive tribe, with the rigour we have come to expect of him, doing the rounds of the possible solutions and making certain choices so as to constitute a battery of signifiers. Never forget that the signifier is not there to represent signification. It is there much rather to stand in for the gaps in a signification that signifies nothing. It is because the signification is literally lost, because the trail is lost as in the fairy tale of Hop-o'-My-Thumb, that the white stones of the signifier surge up to fill this hole and this void.

Today I shall content myself with zooming in on the ensuing sequence of fantasies that follow on from the three examples I gave you last time – the fantasy of the cart by the loading dock, the fantasy of the missed stop at Gmunden, and the fantasy of setting off with the Lainz grandmother and returning with the father, in spite of its evident impossibility.

We are now going to see another series of fantasies that, when we know how to read them, cover in a certain sense, and modify, the permutation of elements.

The first fantasy in the series will show you straightaway where the point of passage is to be found. It lies at a moment that is somewhat further on in the progressing dialogue between little Hans and his father, on 11 April. It is the fantasy of the bathtub, which everyone pores over with a kind of addle-brained tenderness, as though some familiar face were to be found here, while they are still utterly incapable of saying which.

The bathtub fantasy runs as follows. Hans is in the bath, and I've told you enough for you to have a sense of how this in the bath is something that lies as close as can be to the in the cart that is at issue here, in other words the fundamental in the house. It has to do with a connection, a link, with this thing that is already poised to slip away, namely the plateau of maternal support. And so, here we have someone different making his entrance, a certain form of the eagerly awaited third party, the Schlosser, the fitter who unscrews the bathtub. Nothing more is said about him. He unscrews the bath, and then, with his Bohrer, his gimlet, he bores a hole in Hans's belly. In a footnote Freud introduces the possibility of an equivoque with geboren, born, without resolving it.

With the usual methods of interpretation that we make use of, people have raced headlong into a forcing of matters, and Lord knows all that is to be found in this fantasy. Hans's father, at any rate, can't help but relate it to the scene that is regularly played out in the mother's bed, when little Hans chases his father away and supersedes him in some way, so that here in the fantasy Hans is the object of his father's aggression. All of this is not necessarily tainted with error, but to stay strictly at the level of the elements themselves, we shall say that if the bathtub corresponds to something that has to be overcome, namely this unison between little Hans and his mother, it is quite certain that the fact that it is unbolted is surely something to be noted.

More to the point, the fact that in his fantasy little Hans is the one who has a hole in his belly is something that we should also take note of as corresponding to what we may conceive of within the system of a permutation in which ultimately he is the one who takes on board, in his person, the mother's hole. This hole is precisely the gulf that is the crucial and ultimate point in question, the thing that cannot be looked at, the thing that floats in the shape of the blackness that is forever ungraspable around the horse's head, and precisely around where the horse can bite. Somewhere in this vicinity is this thing into which he was not to look. When I say that he was not to look there, you will see when you refer to the episode of the mother's drawers that little Hans says as much himself.

Questioned by his father, who flies in the face of good sense, little Hans brings in two elements, and two alone, to counter the father's suggestions. I will tell you about the second element next time, when we shall be coming back to the analysis of this moment, but the first is as follows. Hans dictates that his father should write to the Professor to say that, When I saw the yellow drawers I said 'Ugh! That makes me spit!' and threw myself down and shut my eyes and didn't look. In the bathtub fantasy, little Hans doesn't look either, but he takes on board the hole, the maternal position. Here we are precisely at the level of the inverted Oedipus complex, and from a certain perspective, that of the signifier, we can see just how far it is necessary, how it is literally a phase of the positive Oedipus complex.

What happens next? In one of the following fantasies, on 22 April, we come back to another position, that of the so-called Wagerl, the little truck. Little Hans, who is perfectly recognisable in the guise of the young street-boy who has climbed onto the truck, spends the whole night there ganz nackt, quite naked. This is something altogether ambiguous, both a desire and a dread. It is tightly bound to what immediately precedes it, when Hans says to his father, in the dialogue that I have pointed out as a crucial one, du sollst als Nackter, you've got to be naked.

In the article I mentioned, Robert Fliess underscores how the texture of the child's idiom acquires a cross-threading that is almost biblical in its force, and indeed this does disconcert everyone to the point that they rush to plug up the hole by inserting a parenthesis – er meint: barfüßig, he means 'barefoot'. Fliess argues quite rightly that the style of the term als Nackter is noteworthy, falling strictly in line with Hans's invocation du tust eifern. He's asking his father to do his job, to do this thing that ultimately cannot be seen, namely how the mother is satisfied. So long as she is, and you're the one who must do it. It must be done. In other words, be a true father.

It is just after he has come out with this formula, thereby showing what is being appealed to in reality, that little Hans foments his fantasy of spending the whole night on the truck, on the wider plane and circuit of the railway. He spends a whole night there, when thus far the relationships with his mother have essentially been sustained geschwind, at great speed. Up to that point, this was what he had wished for. He explains to his father, still in the same dialogue of 21 April, You've got to knock your foot up against a stone and bleed, and then I'll be able to be alone with Mummy for a little bit at all events. When you come up into our flat I'll be able to run away quick so that you don't see. We find here again the rhythm of what we might call the primal game of transgression with the mother, which is only sustained clandestinely.

In the fantasy of 22 April, little Hans spends the whole night on the little truck, and the next morning, 50,000 Gulden – which at the time of the observation was a tidy sum – are given to the guard so that the boy can go on riding on it.

Another fantasy, on 2 May, seems to be the last in the line, its summit and terminus. Little Hans ends by saying that this time, not merely the plumber but der Installateur, the fitter, which accentuates the aspect of unscrewing, comes with a pair of pincers. It is quite wrong to translate Zange as Schraubenzieher on the grounds that it is a pointed instrument. A Zange is a pair of pincers, not a screwdriver. What is unscrewed is Hans's behind, so that another can be fitted.

So, here we have another step being taken. The superposition of this fantasy onto the previous one of the bathtub is highlighted well enough by the fact that the relations of size between the behind and the bathtub are articulated in the most precise and complete way by little Hans himself. It so happens that in the small bath that they used to have at home, his little behind filled it. I sat in that one. I couldn't lie down in it, it was too small. In the small bath, he is hefty. This is the whole question – is he or isn't he hefty enough? He fills the little bath, and even has to sit in it, but wherever there are baths that do not offer such guarantees, the fantasies of being engulfed resume. These anxieties mean that whenever he had to have a bath elsewhere, like in Gmunden, he would protest with passionate tears.

Without there being any equivalence of signification, there is a superposition of the schema of the unscrewed behind onto the bathtub that was previously unscrewed. This is also something that we can place at the level of an opening, where what is at issue is a correspondence – and at the same time something that has changed – with the fact that the cart drives off or doesn't drive off, at higher or lower speed, from the dock to which it is momentarily hitched.

To conclude the last fantasy, it is said that the fitter tells little Hans to turn around, and instructs him, Let me see your widdler. This widdler is the insufficient reality that has not succeeded in seducing the mother. With that, everyone completes the interpretation by saying that the fitter unscrews the widdler so that Hans can be given a better one. Only, this is not in the text. Nothing indicates that little Hans has run through the castration complex to the end and in a significant way.

If the castration complex is anything it's that, while somewhere there is no penis, the father is capable of furnishing another one. We shall further say that, insomuch as the passage to the symbolic order is necessary, the penis always needs to have been removed to a certain extent, then to be given back. Naturally, it can never be given back, because all that is symbolic is by definition quite unable to be given back. The drama of the castration complex revolves around the fact that it is only symbolically that the penis is removed and given back.

However, in a case like this one, we can see that it is symbolically removed but is not given back. Therefore, it's a matter of knowing to what extent the fact of having completed this round might suffice for little Hans.

One can say that it's equivalent to the exam perspective, that Hans has done an extra circuit, and the mere fact that this is a cycle and a circuit suffices to turn it into something that ensures the rite of passage, lending it a value that is equal to what it would be if it had been fully completed. At any rate, the question has been posed.

It still remains that we cannot move forward in our comprehension of symptomatic formations if we stray outside of this strictly bounded terrain of the enumeration of the signifier. Before I take leave of you, and because I always try to end with a remark that will amuse you, I want to show you this by pointing something out to you.

What are these pincers? Where do they come from? In the end, they are never referred to anywhere else in the case history. The father has never said, It will be screwed back in for you. Yet again, by staying at the level of the signifier there can be no doubt that what the fitter uses to unscrew the behind is a pair of pincers, or long-nosed pliers.

It so happens that long ago I happened to learn that these large teeth with which a horse could bite the finger of the likes of little Hans used to be called, in nearly every language, pincers. Not only are teeth called pincers, but the front of the hoof with which the horse makes his little Krawall is also called a Zange in German. This word carries the same two meanings as the word pince in French.

I shall also tell you that in Greek, χηλή has exactly the same meaning. I didn't come across that by flipping through the Greek smithery handbook, which doesn't exist. I chanced upon it in the prologue to Euripides' Φοίνισσαι.

Jocasta, before telling the story of Antigone, offers a very curious detail concerning what occurred at the time of the death of King Laius. With as much care as I have devoted to the construction of these little Viennese avenues and rail networks, she explains how the routes of Laius and Oedipus led them to the same spot. They were each making their way to Delphi when the quarrel broke out over who had right of way, the one on the great chariot or the other on foot. There is a to-do, but then Oedipus, being the stronger, walks on in front. It is then that Jocasta takes care to note – and this is a detail that I have found in no other version – that the quarrel revives because πῶλοι δέ νιν χηλαῖς τένοντας ἐξεφοίνισσον ποδῶν, one of the horses' hooves bloodies the tendons of his feet, the ankles of Oedipus.

So, for Oedipus to meet his fate, it was not enough that his feet should be swollen from the iron pins that had been driven through his ankles, it also required this injury to his foot, just like the father of little Hans, made precisely by a horse's hoof, which in Greek, as in German, and as in French, is called pincer, because χηλή designates pincers or tongs.

This remark is intended to show that there is nothing exaggerated in my telling you that in the sequence of little Hans's fantasmatic constructions it is always the same material that is in service and turning around.

O cities of the Sea! In you I see your citizens – both females and males – tightly bound, arms and legs, with strong withes by folks who will not understand your language. And you will only be able to assuage your sorrows and lost liberty by means of tearful complaints and sighing and lamentation among yourselves; for those who will bind you will not understand you, nor will you understand them.[1]

This short passage, which I extracted a few months ago from the Notebooks of Leonardo da Vinci and then completely forgot, strikes me as apt to introduce our lesson today.

This rather magnificent passage is to be heard allusively, of course.

Today we are going to resume our reading of the observation on little Hans by trying to hear the idiom in which he expresses himself.

Last week, I pointed out for you a certain number of stages in the development of the signifier. Its enigmatic centre is the signifier of the horse that is included in the phobia, and the function of this signifier is that of a crystal in a supersaturated solvent. The mythical development that is the constituent factor in the case history of little Hans branches out in a sort of immense arborescence around the signifier of the horse. It is now a matter of immersing, so to speak, this tree-like network in the pool of what little Hans has experienced, and to see what the role of this arboreal development has been. I'm going to indicate right away what the report on little Hans's progress that we are going to establish will tend towards.

Since what is at stake here are object relations considered in terms of a progression, I will say that throughout the period when little Hans lives out his Oedipus complex there is nothing in the observation to suggest that the results should be deemed fully satisfying.

If there is one thing that is accentuated by the observation at the start, then it's something or other that could be termed the precocious maturity of little Hans. It cannot be said that at that moment he is ahead of his Oedipus complex, but surely he is at its point of dissolution. In other words, the way in which little Hans experiences his relation with the young girls already possesses, as is underscored for us in the observation, all the characteristics of an advanced relationship. We won't call it adult, but it has something about it that allows Freud himself to recognise him in a luminous analogy that presents little Hans as a kind of blithe seducer, even a tyrannical Don Juan. This complex term, which I came out with here a couple of months ago, to the outrage of some, is characterised through and through by little Hans's precocious stance, indicative of his entry into a sort of happy adaptation to a real context.

However, what do we see, on the contrary, at the end of the observation? It has to be said that at the end we meet again the same little girls inhabiting little Hans's inner world, but if you read the observation you cannot help but be struck by how they are not only more imaginary, but radically imaginary. They are now fantasies, to whom little Hans talks. Moreover, his relation to these girls is palpably different, because they are much rather his children. I would even say that if this is where we are to ascertain the matrix, left by the resolution of the crisis, of Hans's future relations with women, then we can further say that while from the surface viewpoint the result of heterosexuality has been amply acquired by little Hans, these girls will still bear the stigmata that marked the way they entered his libidinal structure. We will even get to see him treating in detail how the girls came into it.

The narcissistic style of their position in relation to little Hans is irrefutable, and we shall be seeing in greater detail what determines and locates this. Certainly, little Hans will be a lover of women, but they will remain fundamentally bound to a sort of testing out of his power. This is also why everything indicates that he will always dread them. They will be, so to speak, his mistresses. They will be and will remain the girls of his mind. Not only that, but as you will see, they have been robbed from the mother.

These remarks are intended to show you, or at least to suggest, the interest of research such as this. Naturally, in order to be confirmed, it will require that we resume our trail. Since we have taken the phases of the signifying structure of little Hans's myth as our point of reference, we need to chart the different stages of his progress in relation to these phases. Furthermore, since we have been speaking about object relations, we will ask what the objects are that come to the fore in succession and hold little Hans's interest across these different phases in the shaping of the signifying myth. All in all, what progress arises correlatively in the signified over the course of this particularly active and fruitful period when little Hans's relationship with his world is undergoing a sort of renewal or revolution? In parallel to this, are we going to be able to grasp what these successive crystallisations punctuate in the form of fantasies?

These are, without any doubt, the successive crystallisations of a signifying configuration. Last week, I showed you its cluster of figures. At the very least, I allowed you to perceive how the same elements permute with the others in these successive figures so as to refresh each time the signifying configuration while still leaving it fundamentally the same.

On 5 April, we have the theme that I called the theme of return. Of course, this label doesn't explain the essence of the fantasy, but it does denote what it possesses as a base. It's the theme of what we could call a departure, or more exactly an anguishing solidarity, with the cart, with the Wagen that stands at the edge of the loading dock. The fantasy develops this solidarity, because it doesn't present in this form at the outset. It requires the questioning from Hans's father to facilitate the avowal of these fantasies and at the same time to talk them through and to organise them, in order to reveal them to himself just as we are allowed to perceive them.

On 11 April, we see the fantasy of the unscrewed bathtub appear, with little Hans inside it bearing the large hole in his belly, onto which we have been focusing an approximate profile. What has happened between 5 April and 11 April?

On 21 April, we find the fantasy that we may call leaving anew with the father. It's a fantasy that is manifestly represented as fantasmatic and impossible. Hans sets off with his grandmother before his father arrives. When the father joins him, we don't know by what miracle little Hans is there. This is the order in which these things present.

On 22 April, it's the little truck in which Hans goes off by himself. And then, something else will probably mark out the limit of what we can come to today.

What is at issue before 5 April? Between 1 March and 5 April, what was at stake was essentially and solely the phallus. It was in connection with the phallus that his father had suggested the motive behind his phobia, telling little Hans that the phobia arises to the extent that he touches himself, to the extent that he masturbates. The father goes even further, suggesting an equivalence between what little Hans fears and the phallus, to the point that he draws out of him the retort that a phallus – or rather a Wiwimacher, which is the exact term by which the phallus is inscribed into Hans's vocabulary – doesn't bite. This was back on 1 March, at the start of the series of misunderstandings that govern the dialogue between little Hans and his father.

A phallus is very much what is at issue in what bites and injures. This is so true that someone to whom I gave this observation to read, someone who is not a psychoanalyst but a mythologist, and who has penetrated quite far into the topic of myths, told me how it is quite striking to see that what underpins the whole development of the observation is the function, not of the vagina dentata, but of the phallus dentatus. Except that, of course, the observation develops wholly in the register of misunderstanding. I would add that this is quite ordinarily the case in any kind of generative interpretation between two subjects. Indeed, this is how one should expect it to develop. It's scarcely anomalous. And it's precisely in the gulf of this misunderstanding that something else will develop that will have its own fruitfulness.

So it is that, when his father is speaking to Hans about the phallus, he is speaking to him about his real penis, the one that Hans has been touching. He is certainly not wrong, because when the possibility of erection arises for this young subject, along with everything that it brings with it in terms of unfamiliar emotions, the deep balance of all his relationships with what until then had constituted the stable point, the fixed point, the almighty point of his world, namely his mother, is incontestably altered.

On the other hand, what is it that plays the supervalent role in the fact that all of a sudden this fundamental anxiety arises which makes everything waver, to the point that anything is preferable to this, even the forging of an anguishing image that in itself is completely uncommunicative, like that of the horse, and which at the very least traces out a limit, a reference point, within this anxiety? What is it in this image that opens the door to the attack, to the biting? Well, it's another phallus, the imaginary phallus of the mother.

It is by way of the mother's imaginary phallus that the intolerable phobia opens up. What had hitherto been a game of showing or not showing the phallus consisted in playing with a phallus that Hans had long known to be perfectly inexistent, yet which for him was the main stake in his relation with his mother. This was the plane on which the game of seduction was established, not only with his mother but with all the young girls as well. He also knows full well that they don't have any phallus either, but he keeps up the game of their having one. Up to that point, the whole fundamental relationship, not simply of the lure in the most immediate sense, but his playing at this luring, hinged precisely on this.

The introductory part of the observation, prior to the declaration of the phobia, ends with a fantasy. Moreover, this is a fantasy on the limits of what a fantasy is, because it's a dream. It is modelled on a game of forfeits. One person hides the forfeit in his hand, and the one who declares that it is his is condemned to do something. In Hans's version, he has the right to get one of the girls to widdle. It is underlined in the observation that the dream has no visual content whatsoever. It is of the purely auditory type, even though it concerns a game of showing or seeing, and is the grounding of the first scoptophilic relationship with the young girls. Isn't the spoken element, the game that has passed over into the symbol, into speech, already supervalent here?

Throughout this first period, the father's every attempt to introduce something that concerns the reality of the penis, along with an indication as to what should or shouldn't be done with it, namely not to touch it, is met with the themes of the game being pushed back to the fore by little Hans with automatic rigour. For example, when he suddenly comes out with the fantasy that he saw Mummy quite naked in her chemise, and his father asks him whether he means in her chemise or quite naked, little Hans is not in the least ruffled. She was in her chemise, but the chemise was so short that I saw her widdler. That is to say, one could just about see, and also not see. You can recognise here the structure of the rim or the fringe that typifies fetishistic apprehension. It's a matter of being at the point where one could just about see what is to appear, yet one does not see it. What is thereby educed as something hidden in the relationship with the mother is the inexistent phallus, and he is playing at its being there. So, Hans somehow accentuates the character of what is at stake here, namely a defence against the destabilising element that the father contributes in his insistence on speaking about the phallus in real terms.

Little Hans calls upon a witness in this fantasy, a little girl called Grete. She is a loan-element from his surroundings, from the holiday home and the little girls with whom he pursues his imaginary relationships, but at this point they are perfectly real personages. There is a point to this underlining of the fact that she is called Grete and that she steps into this fantasy, because we will meet her again later. In this fantasy, she is called upon as a witness to what he and his mother are doing, because he introduces the fact that he touches himself very quickly, almost stealing a touch.

For Hans there is a necessity of bringing back onto the ground of the phallic relationship with his mother everything that is intervening anew, not only due to the fact of the real existence of his penis but also due to the fact that this is where his father is trying to drag him. The resulting compromise-formation is something that structures the whole of this earlier period, prior to 5 April, such as we can read it in the observation.

Of course, this doesn't mean that there isn't anything else. Indeed, a second such element will appear on 30 March, the date of the consultation with Freud. What appears on this date is not entirely artificial because, as I told you, it is heralded by what is implicit in the father's collaboration in little Hans's fantasies, in which Hans calls on his aid.

So, between 1 March and 15 March, which is when the fantasy of Grete and his mother arises, it's above all a matter of the real penis and the imaginary penis. Between 15 March and the consultation with Freud, the father is trying to make the phallus pass over entirely to the side of reality, telling little Hans that big animals have big widdlers and little animals have little widdlers, which is surely what leads little Hans to say that his widdler is fixed in, and it will get bigger and bigger. The same schema that I showed you earlier is being reproduced here. Faced with the father's attempt to make the phallus a reality, little Hans's reaction is not to approve what he is nevertheless gaining access to, but yet again to forge a fantasy.

This time, on 27 March, it's the fantasy of the two giraffes, in which what is essential becomes manifest, namely a symbolisation of the maternal phallus, which is sharply represented in the little giraffe. While little Hans is caught between his imaginary attachment and the insistence of the real through the intermediary of his father's words, the path he will now take will provide a punctuation, and even a schematisation, of everything that will go on to be developed in the myth of the phobia. That is to say, the imaginary term will become for him the symbolic element.

In other words, far from our being able to ascertain in the object relation a path that would somehow lead directly to the passage to the signification of a new real, to an acquisition of a handling of the real by means of a symbolic instrument, pure and simple, what we see is, on the contrary – at least during the critical phase at issue here, which analytic theory pinpoints as the Oedipus complex – that the real cannot be reorganised into the new symbolic configuration unless one pays the price of a reactivation of all the most imaginary elements. A veritable imaginary regression is produced in relation to the first inroad that the subject makes.

Here, in these first steps of little Hans's neurosis – his childhood neurosis, I mean – we have both its model and its schema. To the father who is the spokesperson for reality and the new order of adaptation to the real, little Hans responds with a sort of imaginary profusion that becomes reinforced in a way that is all the more typical in that it is sustained by a pattern of profound disbelief. Moreover, you will see little Hans pursuing the full sequence of this, which will lead you in turn to perceive how it is laid out at the start of the observation in a way that is almost materialised. This is precisely what makes for the exceptional character, the heaven-sent quality, of the observation. It shows us how little Hans himself realises how this can be taken, namely how not only can one play with this crumpled thing, but one can transform it into balls of paper. This first image of the little giraffe is already the beginning of the solution, the synthesis, of what little Hans is learning to do. He is learning how images can be played with.

He doesn't know what this thing is. He has simply been introduced to it by the fact that he already knows how to speak, by the fact that he is a little man, by the fact that he is in a pool of language. He is very much aware of the precious value that the fact of being able to speak affords him. Indeed, this is what he is constantly underscoring on his own account. Whenever he says this or that, and he is told that it's good or bad, he says, No matter, it's always good because it can be sent to the Professor.

There is more than one remark of this kind, where little Hans shows his sense of the specific fecundity that has been opened up to him by the fact that, all in all, he has found someone to speak to. It would be quite astonishing were we to fail to perceive on this occasion how this, right here, is all that is precious and efficacious about analysis.

The way that Freud brings in his Oedipus myth during the consultation of 30 March, in all its bluntness, fully constructed, without the faintest attempt to adapt it into something that might present as immediate or precise for the child, may be deemed to be one of the most striking points of the observation. Freud deliberately tells him that he is going to recount a big story that he has invented – Long before you were in the world, I knew that a little Hans would come who would be so fond of his mother that he would be bound to feel afraid of his father because of it.

The Oedipus complex is implied here by its author in an operation that lays bare the fundamentally mythical character, the character of an originary myth, that it carries in Freud's doctrine. He makes use of it in the same way that people have always taught children that God created heaven and earth and all kinds of other things, depending on the cultural context in which one happens to be. It is a myth of origins that comes ready made, and because one puts faith in what it determines as an orientation, as a structure, as an avenue for speech in the subject who is its depository, what is at stake here is quite literally its function as a creation of truth. This is exactly how Freud brings it to little Hans, and what we see is little Hans responding with the same ambiguity with which he will assent to everything that will ensue – It's very interesting, he seems to say, it's very exciting. How fine it is. He really must have gone off to speak to the good Lord to find something of that calibre.

What is the result of this? Freud articulates it very clearly for us in his own way – It was not to be expected that he should be freed from his anxiety at a single blow by the information I gave him. At this moment in the observation, articulating it as we have been articulating it here, Freud says that a possibility had now been offered him of bringing forward his unconscious productions, unbewußten Produktionen vorzubringen, and of unfolding his phobia, und seine Phobie abzuwickeln. In short, it's an incitement. It's a matter of implanting another crystal, as it were, in the incomplete signification that little Hans is at this point representing to himself, I mean in his whole Being. On the one hand there is what has been produced all by itself, the phobia, and on the other there is Freud bringing in, all of a piece, what this is fated to culminate in. Of course, Freud doesn't imagine for one second that the religious myth of the Oedipus complex that he is broaching at this moment will bear fruit immediately. He expects just one thing, and he says what this is. It's that it will assist, on the other side, the unfolding of the phobia. This clears the way to what earlier I called the development of the signifier-crystal. You can't put it any more clearly than does Freud in these two sentences from 30 March.

All that one can say about the immediate effect of the consultation with Freud is that, even so, there is a mild reaction on the side of the father. It won't last long. I mean that we don't really find the father in the object relations until the end. As I said earlier, we are seeking today to grasp the object relations across the different stages of the signifying formation. It should come as no surprise that we see the father coming to the fore in these object relations only right at the end of the crisis. As I mentioned the other day, this arises just before the fantasy of the little truck, at the time of Hans's confrontation with his father in the Oedipal dialogue. Why are you so jealous? asks Hans, or more exactly, he uses the term cross, eifern. The father protests, But that's not true, and Hans insists, You must be. This is the moment of encounter with the father which here represents the shortcoming of the paternal position. What we find here, therefore, is just a first apparition, a small confrontation, that is yielded by the fact that, as we can see quite clearly, he is there in a way that is altogether conspicuous, in the way that it is commonly said, he was conspicuous by his absence.

So it is that, the very next day [following the consultation with Freud], little Hans reacts. He comes to see his father and tells him he is frightened. Or more precisely, when his father asks why he has come, he answers, When I'm not frightened I shan't come any more. Hans says, When you're away, I'm afraid you're not coming home. This will go a long way, because his father promptly asks, And have I ever threatened you that I shan't come home? Let's pause here. Faced with this fear of the father's absence, let's find out how to punctuate what is truly involved in this fear.

All in all, it's a small crystallisation of the anxiety. Anxiety is not the fear of an object. Anxiety is the subject's confrontation with the absence of an object, where he is drawn in and where he loses himself. Anything is preferable to this, up to and including the forging of an object that is the strangest and least objectal of all objects, the phobia. The unreal character of the fear that is at issue here is manifested precisely by its shape and form, if we know how to see it. It's the fear of an absence. I mean the absence of the object that has just been designated for him. Little Hans comes to his father to tell him that he is afraid of its absence. You should hear this in the same way that I have told you that in anorexia nervosa, what needs to be heard is not that the child doesn't eat, but that the child eats nothing. Here, little Hans is afraid of the absence of the object that is the father, and which here he is starting to symbolise.

Hans's father, on his side, is racking his brain to work out what about-turn or backlash might have led the child to manifest a fear that would merely be the nether side of desire. This is not entirely wrong, but in a way it grabs the phenomenon only by its edges. In fact, this is the beginning of the subject's realisation that the father is precisely not what he was told he would be in the myth. He says as much to his father, Why did you tell me I'm fond of Mummy . . . when I'm fond of you? What Hans has just said here does not match the myth. If I'm supposed to hate you, that's not right.

What is implicit here, beyond little Hans and what he is caught up in, is that while it's altogether regrettable that things should be like this, even so, it's no small matter to have been put on the path that is really at issue and to be able to spot where there is an absence in relation to this myth. This is something that is registered immediately, something that the observation takes note of, and in which, if you will, we need to hear a symbolisation. If we label the signifier around which the phobia organises its function capital I, let's say that something at this moment is symbolised by what we can label with a lower-case sigma, and which is the absence of the father, p^0. Thus –

This is not to say that this is the whole of what is contained in the horse signifier. Far from it. As we shall see, the horse will not suddenly vanish just because Hans has been told that he should be afraid of his father. However, the horse signifier is certainly unloaded of something, and the observation records this – Nicht alle weißen Pferde beißen, Not all white horses bite. Little Hans is no longer afraid of all white horses. There are some that no longer frighten him. Whereupon his father, despite the fact that he isn't travelling along the path of our theorisation, understands that there are some that are Vatti, Daddy, and when little Hans has a sense that there are some who are Vatti, he is no longer afraid of them.

Why is he no longer afraid of them? Well, because Vatti is kind through and through. This is also what the father understands without quite fully understanding, without even mildly understanding, through to the end. It's that the drama lies in the fact that Vatti is kind through and through. If there had been a Vatti to be truly afraid of, everything would have followed the rules of the game, so to speak. That is to say, a veritable Oedipus complex could have taken form, the kind of Oedipus complex that helps you to untie from your mother's apron strings. However, since there is no Vatti to be afraid of, since Vatti is too kind, this explains how evoking the Vatti's potential aggressiveness in the myth leads the phobic signifier of the ἵππος to be unloaded to such an extent. This is logged that same afternoon.

I'm forcing nothing in what I'm telling you here, because it's in the text, provided one shifts imperceptibly the point of perspective so that the observation ceases to be a labyrinth in which one gets lost and so that, on the contrary, its every detail can take on a meaning. While it might look like I'm going fairly slowly here, and that I keep going back to the start, I have to allow you to grasp how not a single detail of the observation eludes this bringing into perspective. As soon as you can see how the relation to the signifier is articulated – which is reported in its raw state by Freud, along with the signified ready to emerge – we can see it reverberating mathematically in the functions of the signifier that is educed in a natural and spontaneous state in little Hans's situation. In this same moment we can see these effects of subtraction, of unloading, being immediately recorded to the extent that the Father has simply been ushered in. This simple fact has to be inscribed in a way that is almost mathematical, like on a balance sheet.

So, there is a share of white horses that do not make little Hans afraid, and Freud himself spells out how the anxiety is double-edged, which further bolsters what I have just said. Freud distinguishes between anxiety of the father, vor dem Vater, and anxiety for or around the father, um den Vater. We need only take into account the way that Freud presents this to find the exact two elements that I have just described. The anxiety around this empty place, this hollow that the father represents in little Hans's configuration, seeks out its support in the phobia. To the precise extent that an anxiety of the father has been educed, even if only in the state of a requirement for something to be postulated, the anxiety around the father's function is unloaded. The subject can at last have an anxiety of something.

Unfortunately, this cannot go very far, because Hans's father, even though he is there, is on no account capable of sustaining the now established function that corresponds to the necessities of a correct and limpid mythical formation with the full universal scope that the Oedipus myth possesses. This is precisely what forces our little Hans to fall back into his difficulty. As Freud had predicted, after this his difficulty would start to unfold, to be embodied and precipitated in productions that would develop out of his phobia.

We immediately start to see more clearly in this direction when the first fantasy of 5 April appears. I began with this fantasy as though it were a first term, the transformations of which we meet many times over right through to the end. With everything that surrounds it and everything that heralds it, this fantasy highlights the weight of a question that little Hans had started to articulate very well the previous afternoon, regarding what makes him afraid.

We start to see the four modalities in which the horse frightens him. His father bucks up a bit and really performs an analysis here in that, when from time to time he doesn't know where to turn, this still allows him to find things. He lays them out, a, b, c, and d. They are elements that bring a term into play that has a special value for man, that is to say, for an animal who is fated to know himself to exist, unlike the rest of the animals. This term shows its most perturbing impact here when it is developed and articulated by little Hans in the neo-productions of the phobia. This term is movement.

Please understand that it's not a matter of uniform motion, which is a movement that we have always known, or at least for a good while. It's a movement in which one loses one's sense of oneself, from which one tries to escape. It's already there in Aristotle, in the discrimination between linear motion and circular motion. In more modern language, one would say that there is acceleration. This is what little Hans is telling us when he says that the horse that is pulling something behind it makes him afraid when it starts moving, and more so when it drives past quickly than when it trots up slowly. The anxiety arises wherever the one who is not involved in this movement, who has a minimum of detachment from life, can sense the dead weight rocking into motion. It consists in what I have just called knowing oneself to exist, in being a creature who is conscious of oneself, and who is caught in this movement that presents this sort of inert force.

This is where the anxiety is to be analysed. It is as much the anxiety of being dragged into motion as its inverse, namely the fantasy of being left behind, of being left in the lurch. This introduction of something that all of a sudden carries him along in a movement represents for little Hans a hard fall. Profoundly modifying his relationships with the stability of the mother, it brings him into her presence as something that by the same token truly overhauls the very bases of this stability. Hans tells us this in the form of what he says at this stage regarding the horse. It can umfallen und beißen wird, fall down and bite.

We know what the biting is linked to. It is linked to the surging up of what is produced each time the mother's love happens to be missing. When the mother effectively falls away, she is at the same time this thing that has no other outcome than what for little Hans himself becomes the anxiety reaction by necessity, what is known as the catastrophic reaction.[2] The first stage is the biting, the second stage is the falling down and rolling around on the ground.

Now it'll always be like this, little Hans tells us when he is trying to recreate, in a way that is completely fantasmatic, the moment when he got the nonsense. He continues, and his wording bears a structure that we must keep in mind, All horses in buses'll fall down.

This is the formula in which is embodied what is at stake for little Hans, namely the calling into question of the very foundations of everything that thus far constituted the seat of his world.

This brings us to 9 April. It's an elaboration around the theme of the anxiety of movement. What can possibly temper this anxiety?

The father is utterly without effect, because nothing indeed can resolve for a creature like man, whose world is structured in the symbolic, this sense of becoming carried away, this thing that will drag him along in a movement.

This is why, in his signifying structuration, little Hans has to make the conversion that consists in changing the schema of movement into the schema of substitution, stage by stage.

First of all there will be the introduction of the theme of the detachable element. Next, with this, substitution will be produced. These are the two schematic stages that are expressed in the bathtub fantasy-formation.

In the first stage, the bathtub is unscrewed. As I said, its unscrewing comes at a cost, because little Hans has to undergo something from which we know one never gets off scot-free, whenever this passage is performed. This is something that is not gone into sufficiently in the observation, namely that not only does he undergo castration, but it is formally symbolised by the borer, by this large gimlet that makes a hole in his belly.

Then comes the second stage when Hans has something unscrewed. In its place, something else can be screwed in. Through its signifying form, what is at issue in the subject's operation of transformation from movement into substitution, from continuity in the real into discontinuity in the symbolic, is what is demonstrated throughout the whole observation as the very coursing without which its stages and progress are incomprehensible.

What happens in the signified, in the confusion and pathos that little Hans finds himself in? What is there between 5 April, when there appears the schema of the fantasy of the cart that sets off, with everything around the phobia that is attached to it, and the fantasmatic unbolting of the bathtub on 11 April, when this symbolisation of a possible substitution starts to be initiated? Between the two there is a whole surrounding theme, the material of which I am forced to put in a ready state. This is the lengthy passage that will last almost as long as the time it takes for there to be produced for little Hans the only element from the previous situation that could possibly introduce the detachable feature, this element that is fundamental to his restructuring of his world. What is this element?

It is very precisely the element that I told you we must introduce into the dialectic of showing and not seeing, of the educing of what is not, yet which is hidden, that is to say, the veil itself.

There ensue two days of anxious questioning from Hans's father, who understands literally nothing and gives himself over to a heavy-handed groping around, which as Freud underlines had the consequence that the analysis began to be obscure and uncertain. No matter, there remains enough for us to see not only what constitutes the essential point but also what Freud himself takes care to underscore as essential, namely all that happens around the veil, that is to say, the little pair of drawers.

These little drawers are there in all their carefully polished detail, the little yellow drawers and the little black drawers. We are told that the black drawers are Reformhosen, a novel garment for use by women when out cycling. As we know very well, Hans's mother likes to keep up with the cutting edge of progress. I think that a few judicious extracts from the splendid comedies of Apollinaire, in particular Les Mamelles de Tirésias, should help us to paint a closer portrait of her. As it is put in this admirable play –

Elles sont tout ce que nous sommes
Et cependant ne sont pas hommes.[3]

The whole drama lies here. This is what everything has emanated from, right from the first. It's not simply because little Hans's mother is more or less a feminist, but because all in all what is at stake for little Hans is the fundamental truth inscribed into the lines of verse I have just quoted. Freud himself did not dissimulate for one second the essential and decisive value of this truth when he made his variation of Napoleon's saying, Anatomy is destiny. This is precisely what it at issue, but what do we see when little Hans articulates what he has to say?

The father's vehement questions constantly interrupt little Hans, rendering the parsing of his responses a little difficult, but Freud manages to sift out what is essential. What we see more clearly from Freud's note is that there are two stages in which little Hans recognises and differentiates the pairs of drawers, which project over their duality confusedly, as though each could hold more than one of the functions of the other. But what is essential is that the drawers in themselves are linked for Hans to a reaction of disgust. Much more than this, little Hans has dictated what should be written to Freud – When I saw the yellow drawers I said 'Ugh! That makes me spit!' and threw myself down and shut my eyes and didn't look. This reaction shows us that his choice has been made. Hans will never be a fetishist.

If, on the contrary, he had recognised these drawers as his object, namely as the mysterious phallus that no one could ever see, he would have been satisfied and would have become a fetishist. But fate has something else in store for little Hans. He is disgusted by the drawers.

He does specify, however, that when his mother is wearing them, it's another matter. In this instance, they are not at all repugnant. This makes all the difference. When they are on offer as an object, that is, on their own account, he is turned off. They conserve their virtue, so to speak, only when they are functional, when they continue to sustain the lure of the phallus. This is the nerve that enables us to apprehend the experience.

The reality of things has been highlighted by the long questioning in relation to which little Hans tries to explain himself. If he does this poorly, it's to the extent that he is being pressed in divergent and confused directions, but what is crucial is the introduction, through the intermediary of this privileged object, of the detachable element that we are going to meet in the next part, and which thenceforth leads onto the plane of instrumentalisation. We are going to see a formidable material array of instruments that will become dominant from this point forth in the evolution of the signifying myth.

I have mentioned some of these instruments, and have even shown you just how far such singular things already find themselves inscribed into the ambiguities of the signifier, for example the extraordinary homonymy between Zange as a horse's tooth and Zange as a horse's hoof. I could develop this much further still, by telling you that the middle of the hoof is called the pince, and the two sides are called mamelles.

When I spoke to you last week about the Schraubenzieher, which means screwdriver, I told you that this is precisely not what features in the fantasy of the fitter, namely that it's rather a pair of pincers, or pliers, and that Freud pulls out his Schraubenzieher without having noticed very well the value that this instrumentation was offering him. Don't assume that this is a unique case. In the objects that will progressively make themselves felt from here on in, you will see not only the mother–child relations becoming apparent, but also this fundamental detachability that is expressed for man in the question of life and death. You are going to see these being introduced now, and behind them the enigmatic, uncanny and burlesque character of the stork.

Don't forget that the stork has a wholly different style. You are going to see this Mr Stork – der Storch – arriving with his flamboyant profile, his little hat and latch-key, not in his pocket because he doesn't have one, but in his beak, which he also uses as a pair of forceps, not to mention for ringing bells and picking locks.

By this point we are submerged with material, and indeed this is what will characterise the rest of the observation as a whole. However, to avoid leaving you with something imprecise, I shall tell you what the axial moment is, what the turning point is, in what will come to pass in relation to mother and child.

Next time we will be taking this up step by step and we will be seeing precisely which signifying forms stand as intermediaries that transform this mother and child, while leaving them the same – the cart becomes a bathtub, and then a box, and so on and so forth, each nestling into the others.

However, at one point, which clearly was very fine indeed, when sufficient progress had been made with the mother – and you will be seeing what this entails – on 22 April, a very nice fantasy arises. Little Hans takes a little rubber doll called, as though this were quite random, Grete. His father asks him, What were you playing at with your doll? And Hans answers, I said Grete to her. Why? asks his father. Because I said Grete to her, replies Hans. If one has read the observation carefully, one notices what seems to have rather escaped the father's notice, namely that this is the same Grete who was the witness in his game with his mother.

But by this point substantial progress has been made, since the mastery of the mother has already been carried quite far. This term mastery needs to be employed in its most technical sense, and you will see by whose intermediary he has learned to lead her by the rein, and even to give a few whacks.

Little Hans pushes a small penknife through the doll, then manipulates it to make the knife drop out. He is remaking his own hole, but this time with a small penknife, which seems to have been pushed in through the hole where the doll lets out its squeaking voice.

Little Hans has definitively found the last word, bringing down the final curtain on the farce. The mother had kept in reserve, in her head, a little knife with which to cut it off him. And he has hacked the route by which to make it drop out.

Let's resume today a few of our remarks on little Hans, who for a while now has been the object of our attention.

I remind you of the spirit in which this commentary is being pursued. What, essentially, is this little Hans? It is the prattling of a five-year-old child from 1 January until 2 May 1908. This, for the first-time reader, is what presents as little Hans. If the reader is more prepared, and it's not hard to be so, he will know that this prattling is of interest.

Why is this of interest? It's of interest because it has been posited, at least in principle, that there is a certain relation between this prattling and something that is utterly substantial, namely a phobia, with all the inconveniences that it brings to the life of this young subject, all the worry that it causes those around him, and all the interest that it arouses in Professor Freud.

I consider the elucidation of this relation between his prattling and the phobia to be of the utmost importance, and there is no reason to go hunting this relation out beyond the prattling, because no such beyond-zone is presented to us in the observation. Any such zone only presents itself to our minds after the event, with the fully imperious character of prejudice. By way of example, take the point I left you with last time, the story of the doll through which little Hans cuts a hole with a penknife.

Today I have drawn up a chronology. I think that you have now had time to read and reread the observation on little Hans, and that these indications should be vivid enough on their own.

Last week I concluded with little Hans's reactions to his mother's drawers, with everything that is problematic about the exchanges and questioning between the father and the child, and about the sort of deep misunderstanding in which the dialogue unfolds.

I accentuated, as does Freud, what struck him as the most essential residue of this dialogue on the mother's drawers, namely Hans's assertion, which was neither suggested nor induced by his father's questioning, that the two pairs of drawers carry an absolutely different sense depending on whether they are being worn by his mother or are there on their own account. In this latter case, little Hans spits and rolls around on the floor, remonstrates, and makes a show of disgust, the key to which he doesn't yield, but which he desires should be conveyed to the Professor in writing. When the drawers are on his mother, he says that they have an altogether different sense for him.

Having accentuated this, I have since heard some people expressing some mild astonishment at my having eluded the connection between the said Hosen, the mother's drawers, and the lumf.

In little Hans's vocabulary, Lumpf is excrement. It goes by this atypical name, just as it is exceedingly frequent in children that a fortuitous name, if not a random one, should be ascribed to this function on the basis of a first denomination linked to a certain connection with the exercise of this function. We are going to see what this is in the case of this lumf.

So, it has been imputed to me that, due to goodness knows what systems-inclined mindset, I have elided the anal stage that looms up in our minds right on cue, just like when the button is pressed to provoke some such conditioned reflex in Pavlov's dog. No sooner have you heard mention of excrement than you're barking out – Anal stage! Anal stage! Anal stage! Well, let's speak about the anal stage, because it's only right that things should pass out normally!

I would like you to stand back a little from the observation, and to see how either way there is one thing that is never really indicated throughout the process of this cure. Indeed, is there a cure? I certainly didn't say so. I said it was something that has a fundamental function in our experience of analysis, as do each of Freud's major case studies. To put it rapidly, the one thing that is never indicated is any rhythm, or any mechanism, that could be inscribed into the register of frustration.

Throughout the whole period of the cure, not only does little Hans not undergo any frustration, but he is fully sated. Is there regression or aggression? Without doubt there is aggression, but it's certainly linked neither to any frustration nor to any moment of regression. If there is regression, it's not in the instinctual sense, in the sense of a resurgence of something from before.

If there is indeed one phenomenon of regression, it's in a register that belongs to the realm of what I have indicated for you many times as possible. It is effectively what occurs when, through the necessity of the subject's elucidation of his problem, he requires, he pursues, the reduction of such and such an element of his being-in-the-world, of his relationships, from, for example, the symbolic to the imaginary, and even sometimes, as is manifest in this observation, from the real to the imaginary. In other words, there is a change of approach to the signifiers of one of the terms that is present. This is exactly what you are going to see occurring over the course of the observation when little Hans is pursuing his development. Goodness knows how rigorous and even urgent this is. Indeed, this is what characterises the signifying process of the unconscious, insomuch as Freud defined it as unconscious, that is to say, as something that occurs without the subject being able to account for it in any way whatsoever, literally without his knowing what is he is doing. It's enough for him simply to be aided, incited, in this development of the signifying incidence that he himself has introduced as necessary to his psychological sustenance. In managing to develop it, he draws from it a certain solution that moreover is not necessarily a normative solution, nor the best solution, but certainly a solution that, in the case of little Hans, has the most evident effect of resolving the symptom.

Let's come back to the lumf.

Freud refers the signs of disgust that are shown when little Hans sees his mother's drawers to the Lumpf Zusammenhang, the context of the lumf. His father has just posed a few questions that lead in this direction, Hans having surely evinced how the question of excrement was neither insignificant nor uninteresting for him. But of course this lumf context turns around. We can conversely say that the lumf appears to have been brought in with regard to the drawers.

What is meant by this? It's not simply the fact that little Hans is led to speak about these functions of excrement in relation to the reaction of disgust that he shows when he sees his mother's drawers. In what way do excrement and everything to do with anality enter the fray of the observation? We are immediately told that this is not unrelated to the background, that it is not unconnected with his own excremental function which had once afforded him a great deal of pleasure. However, what is surely at stake here is the desire for seeing his mother do lumf, to the extent that he tags on right behind her whenever she is putting on or taking off her drawers.

Little Hans badgers his mother, and she excuses herself to his father – who has resumed his little inquiry and who overlooks very little of what is going on – by saying, he goes on pestering me till I let him in. So, there is this game between little Hans and his mother, of seeing and not seeing, and not only that, but also of seeing what cannot be seen, because it doesn't exist, and little Hans knows this full well. To see what cannot be seen it has to be seen behind a veil, that is, a veil that has been held in front of the inexistence of what is to be seen. It is precisely behind the theme of the veil, of the pair of drawers, of this garment, that the essential fantasy of the relationships between mother and child lies hidden. This is the fantasy of the phallic mother. It is in relation to this theme that the lumf is introduced.

Consequently, if I have been leaving this lumf on its own plane, that is, on a secondary plane, it's not because of some systematic mindset, it's because in the observation it is only brought before us in this connection. In other words, it's not sufficient in an analysis simply to be breathing an unfamiliar air to find oneself by the same stroke delighted at being back on familiar ground, to content oneself with telling us that here we can get back in touch with the same old tune, of the anal complex in this instance. Rather, it's a matter of finding out at such a moment in the analysis what the precise function of this theme is. If this theme is always important for us, it's not merely because of this purely implicit signification, which in itself is vague and linked to geneticist ideas that can constantly be called into question in this particular case, at any moment of the observation, but because of its connection with the complete system of the signifier in so far as it is evolving, as much in the symptom over the course of the illness as in the process of cure.

The lumf carries an extra meaning within this system on account of its strict homology with the function of the drawers, that is to say, the function of the veil. Both the lumf and the drawers are a thing that can fall. The veil falls, and it's precisely in so far as the veil has fallen that there is a problem for little Hans.

He lifts, if I may say so, the flap of this veil, because it is in consequence of the experience of 9 April, of the long explanation about the drawers, that we next see the bathtub fantasy appearing, that is to say, something that bears the closest relation to the fall. The combination of this dropping with the other term that is present, and with which he is confronted in the phobia, namely the biting, yields the theme of detachability, of unscrewing, which will be pursued as an essential element in reducing the situation across the succession of fantasies.

We need therefore to take a close look at this succession of little Hans's fantasies and to conceive of them as a myth in development, as a discourse. Furthermore, nothing else is involved in the observation but a series of reinventions of this myth with the aid of imaginary elements. It's a matter of comprehending the function behind this turning progress, these successive transformations of the myth which, at a deep level, represent the solution to the problem for Hans, the problem of his own position in existence to the extent that it has to be situated in relation to a certain truth, in relation to a certain number of truthful reference points, where he can find his own place.

Were some further proof required of what I'm telling you – and I'm insisting a little given the objection that has been levelled at me and, since I've come up against it, I want to see it through to the end – I would bid you refer to the text to see what this lumf ultimately turns out to be. When little Hans is coming back from his grandmother's on the Sunday evening, on 12 April, Hans shows his disgust at the black upholstery of the seats in the carriage, because they are lumf. In the explanation that follows, what is it that comes to be compared with the black, with the lumf? Well, a black blouse and black stockings. The close relationship between the theme of the lumf and the mother's garments, that is, the veil, is registered in the observation by little Hans himself.

For that matter, what is this lumf? Where does it come from? Why does little Hans call excrement lumf? We are also told in the observation that Lumpf comes by association with stocking, Strumpf, and its dark colour.

Throughout the segment of the observation that we are pursuing in an examination afforded by Freud's analysis, it is quite clear that the lumf, the excrement, enters the fray here as a particular function of the far more crucial signifying articulation – which in truth is the only important thing for us to see – that is its relationship with the theme of the garment, the theme of the veil, behind which is hidden the denied absence of the mother's penis. This is the essential signification.

We alter nothing in the direction of the observation itself, and not by any biased mindset, when we take this axis to understand the progress of these mythical transformations through which the reduction of the phobia is brought about in the analysis.

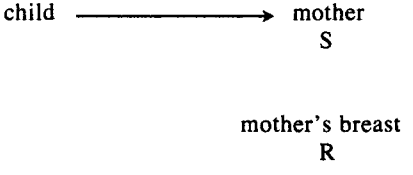
We came as far as 11 April and the bathtub fantasy.

I told you that the bathtub represented something that starts to bring about the mobilisation of the situation, that is, the situation of the stifling reality of the mother, the sole reality to which Hans feels bound, for some unspecified reason, and which produces a maximum level of anxiety. From the time that he feels that he is being delivered up to her, threatened by her and annulled by her, this reality of the mother represents a danger situation. Moreover, this is a danger that in itself is absolutely unnameable, strictly speaking. It's a matter of seeing how the child will manage to get out of this situation.

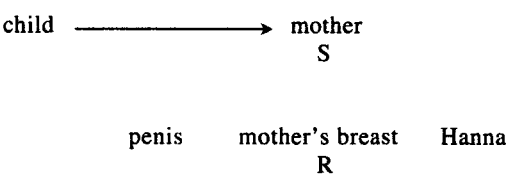
I remind you of the fundamental schema for the child's situation vis-à-vis the mother, when he is at a moment of losing the mother's love.



This mother is the symbolic mother, the first element of reality that is symbolised by the child in that she can essentially be absent or present. When there is a refusing of love on her part, the compensation for this refusal is found in the quashing brought about by a real satisfaction, derived from the real breast. This doesn't mean that an inversion is produced. Indeed, to the extent that the breast becomes a compensation, it becomes the symbolic gift. The mother, meanwhile, becomes a real element, that is to say, an all-powerful element that refuses love.

The progress in the situation with the mother lies in how the child has to discover, beyond the mother, what the mother loves. It is not the child himself, but the i, the imaginary element, that is to say, the mother's desire for the phallus. Ultimately, what the child has to do at this level – which is not to say that he does do it – is to manage to formulate i S (i). This is what we are shown in the playful alternation in the deportment of the child who is still a toddler, which accompanies his playful occultation of the symbolic part.

For little Hans, this schema has been complicated by the introduction of two elements that are real.



On the one hand there is Hanna, a real child who comes to complicate the situation of the relations beyond the mother, and then on the other hand there is something that belongs to him but which he literally doesn't know what to do with, a real penis that is starting to stir and which has received an unfavourable greeting from the person on whom it functions. Little Hans comes to ask his mother what she thinks of his widdler, an aunt having said a little while back, he has got a dear little thingummy. His mother, however, does not extend such a warm welcome, and the question then becomes very complicated.

To fathom this complication, you need only take the two poles of the phobia, the two elements for which the horse is dreaded. As I explained, the horse bites and the horse falls.

The horse bites, that is to say – Since I can no longer satisfy mother at all, she will take satisfaction, just as I did when she did not satisfy me at all, biting me as I bit her, for this is my last line of recourse when I cannot be sure of her love.

The horse falls, that is to say – It falls just as I do, little Hans, at the instant when I am left in the lurch, when there is no more but for Hanna.

However, it is quite clear on the other hand that, in a certain way, needs must that little Hans be eaten and bitten. Needs must, because ultimately this is what corresponds to a revalorisation of the penis that has been taken for nothing at all, that has been rejected by his mother to the full extent that it has to become something, and this is what little Hans aspires to. His being bitten, his being seized by the mother, is something that is as much desired as feared.

The same goes for what is involved in the falling. The horse's fall is also something that can be desired by little Hans. There is more than one element of the situation that little Hans desires to see fall, and the first of these, once we have introduced the category of the dropping into the observation, will present in the form of little Hanna. Hans says, I thought to myself Hanna was on the balcony and fell down off it. The father adds that the railing of the balcony was designed in the most unpractical way, by a metal-worker of the Secessionist movement – we are in the home of folk who stand at the vanguard of progress – and had big gaps in it which I had to have filled with wire netting, hideous as this must have been, so as to avoid little Hans pushing young Hanna a little too vigorously through one of the gaps.

So, the function of the biting, like the function of the falling, are given in the most apparent structures of the phobia. They are its essential elements. As you can tell, these are double-edged signifier-elements. Such is the true meaning of the term ambivalence. The fall, like the bite, is not merely feared by little Hans. They are elements that can also enter the fray in an opposite sense. From one side, the biting is desired, because it will play a crucial role in the solution of the situation, just as the fall is equally a desired element. While the girl herself must not fall, one thing is certain and this is that the mother will trace a falling curve, for the full run of the observation, starting from the moment conditioned by the curious appearance of the instrumental function of the unscrewing. This function appears for the first time, enigmatically, in the bathtub fantasy.

As I said last week, what is in question here is an anxiety that concerns not only the mother in reality, but the whole surrounding, the whole milieu, everything that thus far had constituted little Hans's reality, the fixed bearings of his reality, what last time I called la baraque, the whole shack. With the first fantasy of the plumber coming along to unscrew the bath, this whole shack begins to be dismantled in detail.

These connections are not in the least abstract connections. They are wholly contained within the experience. Don't forget that the observation discloses how baths had already been unscrewed in front of little Hans, because when they went on holiday to Gmunden, a small bath had been packed in a box. On the other hand, we have some notion of an earlier house move, though we can only regret that the observation does not offer a precise date for this. It must lie in the space of time covered by the anamnesis of the observation, namely the two years, prior to the illness, on which we have a number of notes from the parents.

Moving house, like the transporting of the bath to Gmunden, has already afforded little Hans the signifying material for what it means to dismantle the whole shack. He already knows that this can happen, and this was without any doubt an experience that had already been integrated to a greater or lesser extent into his specific handling of the signifier. The fantasy of the unscrewed bathtub is tantamount to a first step into the perception of what presents first of all with a character that is opaque, that is purely a signal of an inhibition, an arrest, a frontier, a limit beyond which one cannot pass, namely the phobia. This can only be mobilised in the phobia itself, where there are elements that can be differently combined.

In other words, along with the horse's bite – which brings to the fore these teeth, this pince, the plural signification of which I explained for you last time and which in French as in German and in many other tongues, notably in Greek, is both what the horse bites with and something that means pincers or pliers – there appears for the first time the character who, with his pincers and pliers, starts to come into play and to introduce an element of evolution. This evolution is, I repeat, a purely signifying evolution. You're not going to tell me how there are already instinctual traces in the child that explain how his behind is unscrewed, how it's both the same thing and in other respects something different. In other words, it is nowhere else but in the signifier itself, in the human world of the symbol, which also embraces the tool and the instrument, that the development will unfold of the mythical evolution in which little Hans is engaged through the obscure and fumbling collaboration between him and the two protagonists who have been looking into his case in order to psychoanalyse it.

I will pause for a moment on the fact that there are not only the bathtub and the unscrewing in the fantasy, there is also at that moment the borer, the gimlet. Here, as always, there is a very keen perception, linked to the freshness of the discovery, which means that the onlookers who are at the explorative forefront of the analysis are in no doubt as to what this borer is. They say that it's the paternal penis. Here again there is something vague about the text. Is the target of this penis little Hans or his mother? I would say that this ambiguity is quite valuable, and all the more so because we shall better understand what is at issue.

Once more, you can see the proof of what I'm telling you, namely that it's not sufficient to have in your minds the more or less complete list of classic situations in analysis, including the inverted Oedipus complex where, perceiving the parents' coitus, the child can identify with the feminine role. That we find little Hans identifying here with his mother, well, it's true, why not? But on one condition, which is that we would not understand why it is true, because when one says this and nothing more, not only does it not hold any interest, but it doesn't match, to any degree, anything that represents the ins and outs that come together in the apparition of the fantasy, where the child imagines, and himself articulates, that something has come along to make a big hole in his belly. This can take on meaning only in the context, in the signifying evolution, of what is at issue.

Let's say that at this point little Hans is explaining to his father – Just bloody give her it for once, right where it belongs. This is indeed all that is in question in little Hans's relation with his father. All along, we have a notion of this shortcoming and the effort that little Hans is making to restore, I wouldn't say a normal situation – no such thing has been in question since the father started playing the role that he has been playing with Hans, namely that of begging him please to believe that Daddy is not unkind – but a structured situation. And in this structured situation, there are firm reasons for little Hans, at the same time as tackling the ousting of the mother, correlatively to provoke, and imperiously so, the father's functioning in relation to the mother.

I repeat that there are a thousand ways, a thousand angles, from which such fantasies of passivity can intervene over the course of the analysis of a young boy, sweeping him up in a fantasmatic relation with the father in which he identifies with the mother.

To go no further than my own analytic experience, not so long ago I saw a man who was no more homosexual than little Hans could in my opinion have become, but who, even so, at one point in his analysis voiced how, without any doubt, in his childhood he had fantasised being in the maternal position, precisely so as to offer himself, if I may say so, as a victim in his mother's place. His whole childhood situation was lived in the shadow of a sort of importunity of the father's sexual insistence, the latter being highly rambunctious and, indeed, demanding in his needs upon the subject's mother, who deflected him with all the force she could muster. The child perceived, rightly or wrongly, that she lived through the situation as a victim.

This had been integrated into the development of the subject's symptomatology, yet the subject was a neurotic. On no account can we come to a standstill merely at the feminised position, or even the homosexual position, represented functionally at a given moment of the analysis by the outcome of this fantasy, because its context lends it an utterly different sense. It even lies in opposition to what occurs in the observation on little Hans.

Little Hans is saying to his father, fuck her a bit more, while the other subject, my patient, is telling his, fuck her a bit less. Clearly it's not the same, even though they each have to make use of the term, fuck her, and even, fuck me instead of her if need be. It is, therefore, the signifying connection of the term that enables us to appreciate what is at stake.

In the way I have presented it, the situation that is thereby created apparently has no way out, because the father doesn't step up. You will tell me that the father nevertheless exists, that he is there. What is the function of the father in the Oedipus complex? It's quite clear that at some point, and regardless of the form in which the deadlock of the child's situation with the mother might present, another element has to be introduced.

These things need to be repeated. If we don't repeat them, we lose track of them. This is why we are going once again to spell out the Oedipus complex.

Of course, this won't be a re-articulation of the Oedipus complex because by definition, if the Oedipus complex is fundamental, it must be explained in a thousand different ways. Nevertheless, there are structural elements that we find every time and which are the same, at least with respect to their arrangement and with respect to their number.

On one plane, the father comes in as a third party in the situation between the child and his mother. If we take it on another plane, he comes in as a fourth element, because there are already three elements due to the inexistent phallus. This is the en-soi, the in-itself of the situation, if you will excuse this expression of which I'm not especially fond but which I'm compelled to use in order to go quickly.[1] I mean that, for the time being, I'm considering the father insomuch as he must be in the situation together with the others, independently of what will come to pass for the pour-soi of the subject, his for-himself. Nor am I especially fond of this expression because you can take this pour-soi as something that is given in the subject's consciousness, when in fact it lies for the greater part in the subject's unconscious, to the extent that this has to do with the effects of the Oedipus complex. I'm using the term, however, to mark out the distinction that I am noting in the fact that the father must be here en-soi. What should his role be?

I cannot rehearse the whole theory of the Oedipus complex. Nevertheless, we can say that the father is the one who possesses the mother, who possesses her as a father, with his true penis which is an ample penis, in contradistinction to the child who is in the grip of the problem of his instrument being both poorly assimilated and insufficient, not to say spurned and disdained.

What does the analytic theory of the Oedipus complex teach us? What is it that makes the Oedipus complex necessary in some way? I'm not speaking about biological necessity, nor internal necessity, but a necessity that is at any rate empirical because it was discovered in the experience. If the existence of the Oedipus complex means anything, then it's that the natural increase of the young boy's sexual potency does not happen by itself, nor in one go, nor even in two goes. If we take it purely and simply on the physiological plane, it could effectively be seen to happen in two phases, but taking it solely at the level of this natural increase does not suffice to any degree when it comes to accounting for what is actually going on.

The fact is that for the situation to develop in normal conditions, I mean in conditions that allow the human subject sufficiently to maintain his presence not only in the real world but in the symbolic world, that is to say, for him to tolerate himself in the real world such as it is organised with its symbolic weft, he needs to have not only this sort of perception of what last time I called movement, with its acceleration that carries the subject along and transports him, but also a point of arrest, a fixing down of two terms. The true penis, the real penis, the valid penis, the father's penis, has to be functioning on the one hand, while on the other the child's penis has to be situated in a Vergleichung with the father's penis, in a comparison with the father's penis that will somehow meet up with its function, its reality, its dignity and its integration as a penis, to the extent that there will be a passage through the cancelling out that is known as the castration complex.

In other words, it's to the extent that his own penis is momentarily annulled, in a dialectical moment, that the child is destined to accede to a full paternal function later on, that is to say, to be someone who feels himself to be in legitimate possession of his virility. And it appears that this legitimate is essential to the felicitous functioning of the sexual function in the human subject. Without this register, everything that we have to say about the determinism of premature ejaculation and the various disturbances of sexual function has no meaning.

This has merely been an overall situating of the problem of the Oedipus complex. It is important to bear in mind that the experience has dictated this. Moreover, it was not to be predicted. Already, in what I have just set out, the schema of the situation was not necessarily predictable in itself. The proof of this is that the analytic experience, which uncovered the Oedipus complex as an integration into the virile function, allows us to push things further and to say that the symbolic father, the Name-of-the-Father, is essential to the structuration of the symbolic world.

The symbolic father is pivotal in this sort of severance that is more essential than primordial weaning, and through which the child exits the pure and simple coupling with maternal almightiness. If the symbolic father is the mediating element that is essential to the symbolic world, if the Name-of-the-Father is so essential to any articulation of human language, then this is strictly speaking the reason behind Ecclesiastes telling us that, The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God.[2] It is strictly speaking foolish to say in one's heart that there is no God, quite simply because it is foolish to utter a thing that is in contradiction with the very voicing of language. You know very well that I'm not professing any deism here. There is the symbolic father.

The experience teaches us that when it comes to the specific incidence of the father's entrance in the assumption of the virile sexual function, the real father is one that plays a role of essential presence. To the extent that the real father is truly playing the game of his function as a castrating father, his father function in a form that is concrete, empirical and, I was almost going to say, to a certain degree degenerate – the personage of the primordial father in his tyrannical and more or less horrifying form such as he is presented to us in the Freudian myth – to the extent, in other words, that the father, such as he exists, fulfils his imaginary function in what is empirically intolerable about it, which even leads to revolt when he makes his impact felt as a castrator, the castration complex can be lived through, and solely from this angle.

What we have here is marvellously illustrated in the case of little Hans. There is a symbolic father, and little Hans, who is no fool, believes right away in this symbolic father. Freud is the good Lord. You can well imagine that this is one of the most crucial elements for balance to be established for little Hans. Naturally, he believes in God right away, and he believes in him like we all believe in God, namely, without believing in Him. He believes in Him because this reference to a sort of supreme witness is an element that is essential to any kind of articulation of truth. There is someone who knows everything, and he's found him. It's Professor Freud. What luck! The good Lord is here on earth. Not all of us are so lucky.

In any case, this will be of service to him, but on no account will it make up for the shortcoming of the imaginary father, of the castrating father. The whole problem lies here. Little Hans has to find a suppletion for this father who persists in not wanting to castrate him.[3] This is the key to the observation.

It's a matter of seeing how little Hans will be able to bear his real penis, precisely in so far as it is not under threat. This is the fundament of the anxiety. What is intolerable in his situation is the shortcoming on the side of the castrator. In fact, throughout the whole observation, you will never see anything appearing that could represent the structuration, the real-isation, even the fantasmatic experience, of something that could be called a castration.

Yet some kind of injury is imperiously called upon by little Hans, and anything can be turned to this purpose. Contrary to what Freud says here, there is nothing in the experience of Fritzl hurting his foot on a stone that is called of its own accord to make the connection [with the horse falling down]. The wish that the father should be exposed to this same injury, this kind of mythical circumcision, will appear thereafter in the long dialogue of 21 April, when he will say to his father, you've got to be naked, du sollst als Nackter. Everyone is so stupefied by this that they wonder what the child might mean. They tell themselves that the child is starting to speak biblically. Even in the observation, there is a parenthesis to say that he surely means barefoot. Yet little Hans is the one who is truthful here. It's a matter of knowing whether the father will indeed prove himself, that is to say, will confront the fearsome mother like a man, and whether he, the father, has been through, or not, the essential trial by injury, knocking up against the stone. This tells you just how far this theme, in its most fundamental and mythical form, is something to which little Hans aspires with his whole Being.

Unfortunately, nothing of the sort occurs. It's not enough for little Hans to have uttered what he uttered in the dialogue with his father. He has only shown that he was burning with an imperious desire for the wrath of a jealous God – eifern is the German term used in the Bibel – namely a father who is against him, who wants to castrate him. But he doesn't encounter this, and so the situation takes a very different turn. I shall be telling you presently how we can conceive of this.

Note that while there is no castrator, because we are on the side of the father, we do have on the other hand a number of characters who have come in the stead of the castrator. We have the plumber who began by unscrewing the bath, then to bore a hole in him. Then in a short while we shall see someone else, the coachman, who is not strictly speaking implicated in the desired function of the father. In any case, there is what little Hans himself calls the Schlosser, the fitter, in the last fantasy, on 2 May, which brings the situation to a close. God does not carry out all of His functions very well, and so in comes the deus ex machina, the fitter, to whom little Hans assigns a share of the functions that he is there to fulfil.

Note how everything boils down to the following. One just has to know how to read the text to see that it could not be more striking than how it is in the final fantasy, which literally closes both the cure and the observation, namely that what the fitter comes to change is little Hans's behind, his rear. They started to dismantle the whole shack, but it wasn't enough. Something had to be changed in little Hans. Without any doubt, this is where we find the fundamental schema of the symbolisation of the castration complex.

Yet it can be seen in the observation just how far even Freud allows himself to be carried along by the schema. There is no trace in little Hans's fantasy of a replacement for what he has on the front side. The father is the one who says, he gave you a bigger widdler, and Freud falls into step with this fantasising. Unfortunately, there is nothing of the sort in little Hans's fantasy. His behind is unscrewed and he is given another. Then he is told to turn around, and that's where it ends. The text has to be taken as it is. The specificity of the observation on little Hans lies in this, along with the very thing that ought to enable us to understand the full whole.

If, indeed, after coming so close, things didn't go any further, it's because things couldn't go any further, because if things had been able to go further, there wouldn't have been a phobia but a normal castration complex and Oedipus complex instead, and there would have been no need for all this complication. It would have taken neither the phobia, nor the symptom, nor the analysis, to arrive at this point, which is not necessarily the stipulated point, the typical point.

All of this is intended by and large to locate the function of the father in this instance, or more precisely to locate how he is both incontestably there, active and helpful in the analysis, but at the same time, due to the fact that he is there in the analysis – and this is predetermined by the situation as a whole – his functions are clearly incompatible with playing the role of the castrating father effectively.

You will observe that, all in all, while there is castration to the extent that the Oedipus complex is castration, it's no accident that what has been perceived but dimly, yet perceived nevertheless, is that castration bears just as much relation to the mother as to the father. We can see in the description of the primordial situation how maternal castration implies for the child the possibility of devoration and biting. In relation to this anteriority of maternal castration, paternal castration is a substitute that is perhaps no less terrible, but which is certainly more favourable.

It is more favourable because it is open to development, whereas in the case of maternal castration, with its engulfment and devoration by the mother, it does not lead on to any development. With the term of the father, there is the possibility of dialectical development, namely a rivalry with the father, a possible murder of the father, and a possible eviration of the father. On the side of the father, the castration complex is productive in the Oedipus complex, whereas it is not so on the side of the mother for the simple reason that it is quite impossible to perform this eviration on the mother, because she has nothing that could undergo such eviration.

Let's take things up at the point where we left our little Hans, who is now standing at this crossroads.

We can already see an adumbration of the mode of suppletion by which the primordial situation will be left behind, dominated as it was by the pure threat of total devoration by the mother. Something of this is already sketched out in what I'm calling the bath and borer fantasy. Like each of little Hans's fantasies, it's the beginning of an articulation of the situation. There is, as it were, a return to sender, that is to say, a returning of the threat to the mother. The mother is the one who is ousted, and the father is the one who is called upon to play his role of borer.

Once again, I note that I'm doing no more than taking literally what Freud brings us. He is so riveted by the role of the borer that he makes a remark without resolving it himself. He doesn't resolve it for a good reason, which is that it has to be considered in the light of philology, ethnography, myths, and so on. The remark bears on the relation there might be between Bohrer and geboren, being born. In fact, there is no etymological link between their respective roots. This is the whole distance that lies between the Latin feriō, to smite, and fero, to bear. They don't share the same root, and when one traces the derivations across the different tongues they remain absolutely distinct. Then there is forāre, to bore, which clearly is not the same thing as fero. It is again to the term of bearing that geboren is traced. The essential distinction between the two roots can be found as far back as it has been possible to trace, but what is important here is that Freud comes to a halt on this. He comes to a halt on something that is literally an encounter of the signifier with the purely signifying problematic that it posits, because ultimately Bohrer evokes Prometheus – Pramantha, etymologically the borer.[4] Meanwhile, geboren is to bear, that is to say, the fundamental bearing of child, bringing him forth into the world. And so there are two distinct and even opposite elements. This is a parenthetical remark to show you the importance that Freud himself attaches to the signifying term.

Along what line will the ensuing part of the solution, of the suppletion, brought about by little Hans develop? The solution is mere suppletion in that he is somehow powerless to bring about a maturing – allow me if you will to use this expression, though it's not about instinctual maturation – that would press the dialectic development of the situation in a direction that would not be a dead-end. It has to be reckoned that he arrives at something, because there is a development. At the very least, it's a matter of comprehending it, and of comprehending it in its entirety. Today I can do no more than indicate this.

By what means does the whole development unfold, starting from the point we've reached, around mid-April? Hanna is introduced as an element whose fall is possible and desired. The same goes for the maternal bite, which is taken on as an instrumental element, as a substitute for the castrating intervention. Moreover, it is diverted in its direction, because it doesn't bear on the penis but on something else, something that in the final fantasy culminates in a change. It has to be believed that this change already has a certain degree of sufficiency in itself, or at any rate a degree of sufficiency when it comes to reducing the phobia. At the end, Hans has changed. This is what is obtained. Next time, we will be seeing all the consequences of this, which are absolutely crucial for Hans's development, and quite intriguing to boot.

So, Hanna comes into play. She is the other inassimilable term in the situation. The whole process of Hans's fantasies consists in restoring this intolerable element of the real to the imaginary register where it can be reintegrated, through stages that we are venturing to describe one at a time.

Read, or reread, the observation with this key in hand. See how Hanna is reintroduced in a completely fantasmatic form, as when little Hans tells us that Hanna had already gone with them to Gmunden two years ago, when in fact at that time she was still in her mother's belly. Yet little Hans tells us that they had taken her in a little box on the back of the coach, where she had a jolly time, and even that they had taken her all the previous years as well, because little Hanna has always been there. What is intolerable in the situation is that little Hans cannot envisage that there should not be a Hanna during the holidays in Gmunden, and he makes up for this in his reminiscing.

I'm employing this term very precisely, with its Platonic accent, in opposition to the function of repetition and of the re-found object. Hans turns the Hanna-object into an object that has always been there. Just as Plato needed something to explain how we gain access to the higher world, since we could purportedly enter it even though we're not part of it, so too does little Hans reduce Hanna to something that is remembered as a permanent fixture. This reminiscence is the first stage in the imaginification of this real, and it carries a very different meaning from all those stories of instinctual regression.

After this, there is a second stage, when she becomes an Idea, again in the Platonic sense of the term, even an Ideal. What does little Hans have her do at this stage? This is also in his fantasy – he has her ride on the horse. It's humorous and brilliant, mythical and epic, all at once. At the same time, it displays all the characteristics of those epic texts for which we've been going to great lengths to describe the two states of condensation, the two states of the epic poem, and to suppose all sorts of pundits, hecklers and charlatans who will expound on what, in epic and myth alike, has to be explained as hinging at once on what happens in the imaginary world and on what happens in the real world.

Little Hans cannot exclude the coachman here, while on the other hand little Hanna has to be on the horse, and also holding the reins. So, in the same sentence, he says, The coachman had the reins – Hanna had the reins too. There you have the vivid state of this kind of internal contradiction which so often in myths leads us to suppose that two registers are blending confusedly, that there is an incoherent overlap of two stories, when in reality it's because the author, whether he is Homer or little Hans, is in the grip of a contradiction between two registers that themselves are essentially different.

You can see this coming alive here in the case of little Hans through the intermediary of the sister, who becomes his superior ego once she has become an image. With this key you can read the signification of each of his appraisals which from a certain point forth are voiced on the subject of little Hanna, including the admiring appraisals. They are not merely ironic. They are essential to the little other who is there across from him. He has her perform what will enable him to start to dominate the situation. Once little Hanna has been astride the fearsome horse long enough, little Hans will be able to start to fantasise that he too is taming the horse. It is right after this that there is the whipped horse. Little Hans is starting to experience the truth of the forewarning issued by Nietzsche – Du gehst zu Frauen? Vergiß die Peitsche nicht!

We are coming to a stop, but please don't read it as the essential part of the lesson that I wanted to bring you today. It's merely a cut-off point that was necessitated by the late hour to which this disquisition has led us.

AN ESSAY IN RUBBER-SHEET LOGIC

Father in the Frigidaire
Sheaf and sickle
The paternal metaphor
The duplicated mother
An imaginary paternity

The academic year is wearing on, and we may hope that little Hans is nearing his end.

I should remind you here at the outset that this year we have set ourselves the goal of revising the notion of the object relation. I think it will not be misplaced briefly to take a step back so as to show you, not the ground that has been covered – one always covers some – but rather, I trust, a certain effect of demystification to which you know I am greatly attached in matters of analysis.

It seems to me that a minimum requirement in analytic formation is to realise that while man has to deal with his instincts – instincts that I credit, whatever some might say, including the death instinct – what analysis has brought us is, even so, the awareness that not everything can be summed up and encapsulated in a formula as simplistic and sanctimonious as the one to which we can commonly see psychoanalysts rallying, namely that, on the whole, everything is resolved when the subject's relations with his fellow man are, as they say, person-to-person relations and not relations with an object.

It is certainly not because I have been trying to show you here the real complexity of object relations that I would be led to loathe the expression object relations. Why shouldn't our fellow man be quite validly an object? I would even say, thank heavens that he is an object, because, in truth, in what analysis shows us, at the start he is commonly even less than an object. He is this thing that comes to fill the place of the signifier in our questioning, if indeed neurosis is what I've been saying and repeating that it is, namely a question.

An object is not such a straightforward matter. It's something that is assuredly to be conquered, and indeed, as Freud reminds us, it can never be conquered without first being lost. An object is always a re-conquest. Only by taking up once more a place that he initially dis-inhabits can man arrive at something that is improperly called his wholeness.

As far as the person is concerned, you surely realise that it is desirable that something should be established between our self and some subjects who do indeed represent the plenitude of the person. Yet this is precisely the terrain upon which it is hardest to advance. It is also the terrain upon which every kind of sideslip and confusion sets in. People commonly imagine that a person is something for which we recognise the right to say I, as we do for ourselves. However, we are clearly very much in a bind whenever it's a matter of saying I in the full sense, as has been powerfully highlighted by the analytic experience which has just what it takes to show us what we slide into whenever it's a matter of thinking about the other party as someone who says I. At such moments, we make him utter our own I, that is to say, we induce him into our own mirages.

In short, as I underscored for you last year at the end of my seminar on the psychoses, the hardest issue to come to grips with when it's a matter of encountering the person is not the I, but the thou. Everything indicates that this thou is the limit-signifier. It's the very thing in relation to which, when we're halfway to it, ultimately we always have to halt. Nevertheless, it is from this thou that we receive each investiture. It was not without reason that I brought last year's seminar to a close on Thou art the one who wilt follow me . . . or who wilt not follow me . . . or who wilt do this . . . or not do this.

If analysis is an experience that has shown us one thing, it's precisely that all inter-human relations are founded on this investiture that comes in effect from the Other. This Other is already within us in the form of the unconscious, but nothing can be accomplished in our development if not through this constellation that implies the absolute Other as the seat of speech. If the Oedipus complex has a meaning then it's precisely that it yields, as the fundament of our installation between the real and the symbolic, and of our progress, the existence of He who possesses the Word, of He who can speak, of the Father. To spell it right out, the Father concretises the Oedipus complex in a function that, I repeat, is itself essentially problematic. The question What is the Father? is ultimately a question that is posed at the heart of our analytic experience as an eternally unresolved questioning, at least for us analysts.

This is the point from which I should like today to take up Little Hans's problematic in order to show you where and in what way he places himself in relation to what the Father is and is not. The question needs to taken up, however, from further back in the case history.

I shall start over by noting that the only locus from which a response may be uttered in a full and valid way to the question of the Father is the locus of a certain tradition. It's not the next room along, as I often say about the phenomenologies, but rather the next door along.

If the Father is to find somewhere its synthesis, its full meaning, then it's in a tradition that is known as a religious tradition. It's not without reason that over the course of history we have seen the Judeo-Christian tradition taking shape as the sole attempt to establish accord between the sexes upon the principle of an opposition between potentiality and actuality, which finds its mediation in a form of love. Outside of this tradition – let's put this carefully – any relationship with the object implies the third-party dimension that we can see articulated in Aristotle. It's a dimension that was thereafter eliminated by what I might call the apocryphal Aristotle, the Aristotle of a theology[1] that was attributed to him much later. Everyone knows that the Theologia Aristotelis exists and that it is apocryphal. The crucial Aristotelian term with respect to the whole constitution of the object, which stands in opposition to it, is the third term of privation, στέρησις.

The whole object relation such as it has been established in the analytic literature and in Freudian doctrine revolves around the notion of privation. Indeed, you have seen this because it was my point of departure at the start of the year. The notion of privation is absolutely central to this doctrine, and when we leave it out of account we cannot understand how the progressive integration into one's sex, as much for man as for woman, requires that one acknowledge something that essentially amounts to a privation that is to be taken on board for the one sex as for the other. This privation is to be taken on board equally in order fully to assume one's sex. In short, Penisneid on one side, the castration complex on the other.

Naturally, all of this joins up with the most immediate experience. It is fairly peculiar to see people taking up in a more or less camouflaged form, and which to a certain degree may be qualified as dishonest, the idea that all genital maturation entails an oblativity, a full recognition of the other party, by means of which the supposedly pre-set harmony between man and woman should be established. Yet we can see very well that the day-to-day experience of this is its constant failure.

Go and tell a wife of this day and age that she is potentiality – as is said by the unknown theologian who went under the fictitious name of Aristotle throughout the whole medieval and scholastic tradition – and that you, the man, are actuality, you will receive a swift response. Not on your life! she will tell you, do you take me for a pushover? And this is surely quite clear. Woman has fallen into the midst of the same problems as us. There's no need to tackle the feminist or social aspect of the question. It's enough to cite the fine quatrain that Apollinaire fashioned for the profession of faith that comes out of the mouth of Theresa-Tiresias, or more precisely her husband, who says furtively to the policeman –

Je suis une honnête femme–monsieur
Ma femme est un homme–madame
Elle a emporté le piano le violon l'assiette au beurre
Elle est soldat ministre merdecin[2]

Certainly we need to be standing on our own two feet on the ground of our experience and to perceive that if analytic experience has made some headway into the problem that is most fully presentified by our whole experience of the development of life, even of neurosis, then it's precisely to the extent that it has been able to locate the relations between the sexes on their different echelons of object relation. But what does this mean? It means, as has been noted – and after all, not to see this amounts truly to nothing more than drawing over it a sort of veil of the lowest form of modesty, a false modesty – that if analysis has led to progress in one thing, then it's very precisely on the plane of what needs to be called by its name, eroticism.

It is on this plane that the relations between the sexes do indeed come effectively to be elucidated, in so far as they are to be found on the path of something that is a fusion, a realisation, a response to the question posed by the subject regarding his sex, and in so far as he is both something that has entered the world and that, as for the rest, he is never satisfied by it, namely the infamous and perfect oblativity in which the ideal harmony between man and woman is purported ultimately to be found. We only ever find this on a distant horizon that doesn't even allow us to name it as one of the goals to be accomplished in analysis.

To afford a wholesome prospect on what is involved in the progress of our investigation we need to see that in the relation between man and woman, once it has been established, a gap still lies wide open. Something of this must ultimately remain admissible in the eyes of the philosopher, that is to say, the one who always plays his cards right. It's that, after all, woman, namely the wife, essentially holds the function that she held for Socrates, to wit – the test of his forbearance, his forbearance of the real.

To enter more vividly into what is set further to punctuate what I'm asserting, and which will bring us back to little Hans, I'm going to share with you a titbit that one of my most excellent friends spotted and brought to my attention. It's a small news item that reached us a fortnight ago from the depths of America concerning a woman bound to her husband by a pact of eternal love, and you're about to see how.

Since her husband's death, this woman has borne, every ten months, one of his children. This may strike you as rather surprising, but it's no parthenogenetic phenomenon. On the contrary, it's a matter of artificial insemination. Vowed as she was to eternal fidelity, by the time a fatal illness had led her husband to his last breath, she had accumulated a sufficient stock of seminal fluid to allow her to perpetuate the race of the deceased at her own discretion, and, as you can see, in the shortest possible timeframe, at regularly repeated intervals.

We were made to wait for this little piece of news, which doesn't sound like such a big deal, though we might have anticipated it. In truth, it's the most riveting illustration we could possibly find of what I've been calling the x of paternity, because I think that you are quite able to form a grasp of the problems that such a possibility introduces. Here you have an illustration of what I've been saying when I've been telling you that the symbolic father is the dead father. However, the novelty that is here introduced, and which has just what it takes to highlight the importance of my remark, is that in this case the real father is the dead father as well.

From this moment forth, it really would be very interesting to ask oneself what becomes of the Oedipus complex in such a case. On the plane that lies closest to our experience it would be easy to come out with a few quips on what lies behind the term frigid woman. As the latter-day saying goes, femme froide, mari refroidi. Frigid wife, husband on ice. I might also mention in this connection a slogan one of my friends came up with for a TV advertisement. It's true that he had considerable difficulty getting the slogan accepted by British minds, but this is precisely where its worth lies. Picture a coolly attractive housewife, and then the voiceover, Tracey has a frigid air, before the shot cuts to her Frigidaire. This is very much how matters stand in the previous case.

The question that is wonderfully illustrated here is that the real notion of the father is not to be confounded in any case with the notion of his fecundity. We can clearly see here that the issue lies elsewhere, and surely we cannot help but see it when we ask ourselves the question of what becomes of the notion of the Oedipus complex. I will leave it to you to extrapolate. Once one has committed to this path, in a hundred years' time we will be making women the mothers of children who are the direct sons of the men of genius alive today, who will have been carefully preserved in little jars. The question arises, therefore, if something of the father has been cut out in this instance, and in the most radical way, by cutting out his speech, then how and by what path, in what fashion, will the speech of the ancestor be inscribed into the child's psyche? Ultimately, the mother will be the sole representative and conveyer of this speech, so how will she give voice to the bottled ancestor?

As you can see, this is not science fiction. It simply has the advantage of laying bare for us one of the dimensions of the problem. This is being said as a parenthesis, because just now I was speaking on the theme of an ideal solution to the problem of marriage, at the next door along. It would be interesting to see how, now that this problem of posthumous insemination by a consecrated husband has been made present, the Church will find a means of taking a position on this. In truth, were the Church to refer to what it pushes to the fore in similar cases, namely the fundamental character of natural practices, it could be remarked that such a practice has been made possible precisely to the extent that we have managed to set Nature apart from all that is not Nature. From this point forth, perhaps the term natural ought to be given greater precision, and of course one would then come round to accentuating the great artifice of what thus far has been known as Nature. In a word, we might not be unhelpful at this moment as a term of reference. By the same token, perhaps our good friend Françoise Dolto, or one of her students, will even become a Church Father.

The distinction between the imaginary, the symbolic and the real might not suffice to posit the terms of this problem, which, now that it has been engaged in reality, doesn't appear to me to be all that close to resolution. However, this story will make it easier for us to formulate – which is what I desire to do today – the term under which may be inscribed, not in itself, but for the subject, the sanctioning of the function of the father.

Once we have let in this gust of air that strips the décor from the columns, it becomes apparent to us that any kind of introduction to the paternal function belongs to the realm of metaphorical experience. I am going to illustrate this for you, not by overburdening you with new items, but by recalling for you the heading under which last year I introduced what here I've been calling metaphor.

Metaphor is the function, the use of the signifying chain, which unfolds not in its connective dimension – in which any metonymic usage of the signifying chain is installed – but in its dimension of substitution. I didn't go any further when hunting out my example than something that is within everyone's reach, the Quillet dictionary, from which I took the first example listed, namely the line of verse by Hugo, Sa gerbe n'était point avare ni haineuse.[3]

You will tell me that fortune is favouring me, after what has come our way in my demonstration, like a ring slipped onto a finger. I would reply that any metaphor could serve as an analogous demonstration, but I'm going to repeat this one because it's specifically what leads us back to our subject of phobia.

What is meant by metaphor?

It is not, as the Surrealists say, the passing of the poetic spark between two terms that are as imaginarily remote as can be. Admittedly, this definition sounds right, because it's quite clear that it's not a question of this poor sheaf being avare or haineuse. Indeed, it's about the very human strangeness of explaining oneself in this way, by relating subject to attribute though the intermediary of a negation, a negation that stands, of course, against the backdrop of a possible affirmation. To spell it right out, it's not a question of the sheaf being neither avare nor haineuse, because meanness and hatefulness are attributes that belong to Boaz no less than to the sheaf. Boaz turns one and the other to use, suitably employing these properties as he does his merits, without asking their opinion or their feelings.

The two things between which metaphorical creation is produced are what is being explained under the term sa gerbe and the term for which sa gerbe is substituted, namely the gentleman who has been spoken of just a moment before in balanced terms, and whose name is Boaz. The gerbe, the sheaf, has taken his place, a somewhat cumulative place where he is already endued with these qualities of being neither avare nor haineux, having cleared out a certain number of negative virtues. This is where the sheaf comes in his stead and literally cancels him out for a moment. Here we meet again the schema of the symbol qua death of the thing. It's even better here, because the name of the protagonist is abolished and his sheaf comes as a substitute for him.

If there is metaphor here, if this has a meaning, if this is a phase of pastoral poetry, then it's very precisely because his sheaf, that is to say, something that is essentially natural, can be substituted for him. And then Boaz reappears, after having been eclipsed, occulted, abolished, by the fecund splendour of the sheaf. Indeed, it knows neither meanness nor hatefulness, and is purely and simply a natural fecundity.

This bears its meaning in the following part of the poem. What is at issue is to herald and to announce to Boaz, in the ensuing dream, how despite his advanced age – as he says himself, he is over eighty years old – he is soon to be a father. He dreams that he vit un chêne

Qui, sorti de son ventre, allait jusqu'au ciel bleu ;
Une race y montait comme une longue chaine ;
Un roi chantait en bas, en haut mourait un dieu.[4]

Any creation of a new meaning in human culture is essentially metaphoric. It's a matter of a substitution which at the same time maintains what it is substituting. In the tension between what is abolished or suppressed and what is substituted for it, this novel thing comes about that introduces so visibly what is being developed by the poetic improvisation. The new dimension that in this instance is manifestly incarnated by this Boazian myth is the function of paternity.

Admittedly, the aging Hugo is, as usual, far from walking always the meticulous path. He dodders somewhat left, right and centre, but what is quite clear is that

Pendant qu'il sommeillait, Ruth, une moabite,
S'était couchée aux pieds de Booz, le sein nu,
Espérant on ne sait quel rayon inconnu,
Quand viendrait du réveil la lumière subite.[5]

The style of this extract lies in an ambiguous zone where the realism blends with some sort of gleam that is a little too intense, even turbid, redolent of the chiaroscuro in Caravaggio's paintings which, with all their popular starkness, are perhaps still in our times what can afford us most frankly a sense of the sacred dimension.

So, a little further on, the same thing is still at stake –

Immobile, ouvrant l'œil à moitié sous ses voiles,
Quel dieu, quel moissonneur de l'éternel été
Avait, en s'en allant, négligemment jeté
Cette faucille d'or dans le champ des étoiles.[6]

Neither in my teaching of last year, nor in what I have recently written on the sheaf in the poem about Boaz and Ruth, did I push the investigation up to the final point to which the poet develops the metaphor. I left the sickle out of account because, outside of the context of what we are doing here, readers might have found it a little forced. I think, however, that you cannot fail to be struck by how the whole poem points towards one image, the intuitive and comparative character of which has been a cause of wonder for nigh on a century.

It has to do with the first waxing crescent of the moon, but you cannot help but notice that if this thing carries weight, if it is something more than a lovely stroke of paint, a touch of golden yellow on the deep blue sky, then it's very precisely in so far as this sky-bound sickle is the eternal sickle of maternity, the one that has already played its role between Cronus and Uranus, between Zeus and Cronus. It's the potentiality I was speaking about earlier, which is fully represented in woman's mystical expectancy.

With the sickle that is lying around in her arm's reach, this gleaner will effectively cut the sheaf in question, the one from which the lineage of the Messiah will spring forth.

Our little Hans, in the creation, development and resolution of his phobia, can inscribe himself properly into the equation only on the basis of these terms.

Note if you will that here in the Oedipus complex we have something in the place of x, where the child stands, with all his problems in relation to the mother, M. In so far as something will be produced that is set to constitute the paternal metaphor, this signifier-element can be placed which is so essential in all individual development and which is called the castration complex. As I have said, this holds as much for woman as for man.

Therefore, we have to posit the following equation –

P is the paternal metaphor.

The x is more or less elided, depending on the case, that is, depending on the moment of development and the problems to which the preoedipal period has led the child in relation to the mother, M.

It is in the link of the Oedipal metaphor that, with the phase that is crucial to any concept of the object, we can thus inscribe a crescent C or a sickle – its constitutive castration complex – plus something that is precisely the signification, s, that is to say, that in which Being finds itself again, and where x finds its solution.

The formula situates the essential moment of the crossing of the Oedipus complex. This is exactly what we are dealing with in the case of little Hans. As I explained, having reached a particular degree of development, there arises the insoluble problem constituted by the fact that the mother is something as complex as the following formula, with all the complications it brings with it –

$$(M + \varphi + \alpha)$$

This, which is to be read Mother plus phallus plus a for Hanna, designates the impasse that Hans has reached. He cannot get out of it because there is no Father. There is nothing to metaphorise his relations with his mother. To spell it right out, there is no way out on the side of the sickle, on the side of the capital C of the castration complex. There is no possibility of a mediation, that is to say, of losing his penis then to find it again.

On the other side of the equation, he finds only the possible biting of his mother, which is the same mordaciousness with which he rushes up to her voraciously whenever he misses her. There is no other real relationship with the mother besides the one that is being highlighted by the whole of the contemporary theory of analysis, namely the relationship of devoration. In so far as he has arrived at this deadlock, he knows no other relationship with the real besides the one that is called, rightly or wrongly, oral-sadistic. This is what I am writing with a lower-case m. Indeed, it is m plus everything that is real for him at this moment, in particular the real that comes to light and which cannot help but complicate the situation, namely Π, his own penis. This is set out in the following formula –

$$(M + \varphi + \alpha)\, M \sim m + \Pi$$

Once the problem is presenting itself to him in this way, it is necessary for this element of metaphorical mediation to be introduced – for there is no other – in the form of the horse, noted Ί [for Ἵππος] with its spiritus asper. The inauguration of the phobia is thus inscribed into the same formula I have just laid out –

This will be the equivalent of something that will not for all that be any the more resolved, namely the mordaciousness insomuch as for little Hans it is the chief danger in his whole reality, and most especially the reality that has just come to the surface, namely his genital reality.

This might seem superficial to you. Don't believe it. Start by making use of these formulae and you will see afterwards whether they can indeed be helpful. I can show you umpteen facets across which they are immediately applicable, and in particular the following.

The horse is said to be at once what bites, what threatens the penis, and also what falls. According to what little Hans himself tells us, this is why the horse has been brought into play. It was brought in first of all as the horse that, standing in front of the cart that was to take Lizzi's luggage to the station, turns its head and is capable of biting. It was then, on 1 March, that Hans told us he got the nonsense. At another point, on 5 April, Hans also tells us that he got the nonsense when, out with his mother, he saw a bus-horse fall down. More exactly, that which is hitched already has a signification for Hans, yet has also been retained by him as something that goes far beyond any signification, as something that he sanctions through a kind of aphorism or definitional assertion, Now it'll always be like this. All horses in buses'll fall down.

The function of the fall is precisely the term that is common to everything that is at issue in the lower portion of the equation. We have underscored the element of the mother's fall, the mother's phallus, φ, which is what is no longer tenable. It's no longer in play, and yet Hans does all he can to keep up the existence of this game. In the end, little Hanna is very essentially the thing whose fall is most wished for, even if it means giving her a little push.

So, the horse fulfils in an efficient way, as an image that is somehow active, each of these functions of the fall united in one. It is in this respect that it starts to be introduced as an essential term, as the term of the phobia in which we can see an asserting and a positing of what truly are objects for the human psyche.

They may indeed warrant the name object, but one cannot overemphasise the special character of this qualification as an object which it is necessary to introduce once the objects we are dealing with are phobias or fetishes. We do know how far they exist as objects, because they will constitute veritable milestones in the subject's psyche. They are milestones of desire in the case of the fetish, milestones of the subject's displacements in the case of phobia. The object is therefore very much in the real and at the same time manifestly distinct from it. On the other hand, it is in no way accessible to conceptualisation unless through the intermediary of this signifying formalisation.

Let's state it clearly. Thus far, no more satisfactory conceptualisation has been given. While I might seem to be presenting the formula for the object in a slightly more complicated shape than has ever been done before, I point out to you that Freud speaks of it no differently at the end of his life's work. Looking afresh at phobia in Hemmung,

Symptom und Angst, he plainly states that the horse – because he takes little Hans again as an example – is an object that has been substituted for all the images and all the addled significations that have been rather poorly isolated and into which the subject doesn't manage to decant his anxiety. Freud makes it an almost arbitrary object, and this is why he calls it a signal. Thanks to this, in this field of confusions, limits will be defined that, however arbitrary they may be, introduce no less the element of delimitation that will ensure, at least potentially, the beginning of an order, the first crystal of an organised crystallisation between the symbolic and the real.

This is in effect what will be produced over the course of Hans's progressing analysis, if indeed we can call what occurs in Hans's case an analysis in the full sense of the term. The psychoanalysts don't yet seem to have understood – at least not when you read Dr Jones – that Freud had a few reservations about the case, saying that it was quite exceptional in that the child's father was the one who brought it about and saw it through, although steered by Freud. As a consequence, Freud was to ground very little on the possible extension of this method. The analysts seem to be surprised by Freud's diffidence here. They would do better to take a closer look and ask themselves whether, given the fact that the analysis was conducted by the father, it might not present specific features that exclude, at least partially, the specifically transferential dimension. In other words, isn't the usual yarn proffered by Miss Anna Freud, to the effect that no transference is possible in child analyses, applicable precisely in this case, because the father is involved?

It is only too evident that in any child analysis practised by an analyst there is well and truly a transference just as there is in adults, and perhaps a better one than elsewhere. Something rather particular is at issue here, the consequences of which we shall be led to show in the next part.

Be that as it may, the formula allows us to scan in the most rigorous way the full progress of the father's intervention.

I think I will be able to show you next time how this formula really allows us to grasp why some of the father's interventions do not bear fruit while, on the contrary, others rock the mythical transformation into motion.

Across its development, the case of little Hans displays the transformations of this equation, while its possibilities of progress and its implicit metaphorical richness are made manifest right away. For today, I shall content myself with indicating its furthest and final extent, such as it is written into the same formalisation. I've already told you enough for you to be able to conceive of its scope.

What we see at the end is certainly a solution that establishes little Hans in a register of object relations that is liveable. Is it fully successful from the standpoint of Oedipal integration? Before coming back to this more closely next time, we can already see in what way it is and in what way it isn't.

If we read the text where little Hans formulates his position at the end, he tells us, now I'm the Daddy, jetzt bin ich der Vatti. We don't need to ask ourselves how it can be that he should have had this idea, given the father whom he is forced to stimulate throughout the observation, begging him to do his job as a father. The final and very fine fantasy that is produced with the father shows him somehow catching up with Hans on the train platform when in reality Hans had raced on ahead some time hence, having set off with whom? As if by chance, it was the grandmother.

The first thing that his father asks him is, What would you like to do if you were Daddy? The reply comes straight out, I'd like to take you to Lainz every Sunday, to see the Lainz grandmother. Nothing has changed in the relationship between father and son. We may presume, therefore, that this is not an altogether typical realisation of the Oedipus complex.

Indeed, if we know how to read the text we can see this very quickly. All the bonds with the father are a long way from being broken. They are even being strongly tied through all of this analytic experience. However, as little Hans puts it very well, his father is now to be the grandfather. He says this, but when does he say it? Read the text carefully. He said it when he had begun by saying that he, Hans, was the father.

The term grandfather stands utterly apart here. First the mother is mentioned, and we are going to see what sort of mother she will be. Then another woman is mentioned – the grandmother. But there is no link whatsoever between this grandfather and this grandmother from little Hans's perspective in itself.

Freud is surely not wrong to underscore, with a satisfaction that is far from offering us full relief, that the question of the Oedipus complex has been resolved by the little chap, now making himself the mother's husband and sending his father back to the grandmother. It's an elegant and even humorous way of sidestepping the question, but thus far nothing in all that Freud has written indicates that this solution, however cogent it might appear, could be regarded as a typical solution to the Oedipus complex.

What we can see is that little Hans maintains a certain continuity in the order of lineages. Had this point at least not been reached, little Hans would have resolved nothing at all and the function of the phobia would have been null. In so far as he conceives of himself as the father, little Hans is a function of something that is inscribed approximately as follows –

$$p\,(M)\,(M')$$

It's the mother and the grandmother. At the end of the process, the mother is duplicated. This is a very important point. Little Hans has recognised something that allows him to find a three-legged equipoise, which is the minimum upon which the relation with the object can be established. The thirdness that he has not found in his father is now found in the grandmother, whose absolutely decisive and indeed overwhelming value in the object relations he has spotted only too well.

It's precisely insomuch as, behind the mother, a second is added, that little Hans establishes himself in a paternity. What sort of paternity? Well, an imaginary paternity.

What does Hans tell us next? Who will have children? Well, he will. He says it very clearly. But when his father, putting his foot in it, asks him, Will you have children with Mummy? Hans replies, Not at all. What's this all about? You told me that the father cannot have children on his own, and now you want me to have some.

There is a moment of wavering in the dialogue between the child and his father, which is quite striking and which shows the repressed aspect, for little Hans, of everything that belongs to the realm of paternal creation as such, when what he voices on the contrary from this moment forth is precisely that he will have children, but imaginary children.

He says in the most precise and articulate manner that he wishes to have children, but on another side he doesn't want his mother to have any. Hence the assurances he wants to secure for the future. For the mother not to have any more children, anything is thinkable, up to and including the bribing – despite everything we are in the presence of a sprog of capitalists – of the great genitor par excellence, the stork, who cuts such a strange figure. Next time we shall be seeing what place and what function ought to be ascribed to the stork and what his true face is. Hans would go so far as to bribe the stork so that there would be no more real children.

The paternal function that the child takes on board is an imaginary one. The mother has been replaced and he will have children as she does. He will look after his imaginary children in the way that he has managed completely to resolve the notion of the child, including the notion of young Hanna.

In what does all of his fantasy consist, with the box, the stork, and little Hanna who already existed long before her birth? It's a matter of imaginarising his sister, of fantasmatising her. So, he will have fantasmatic children. He will become a character who is essentially a poet, a creator in the imaginary order.

He will give the last of his imaginary creations the name Lodi. The father takes great interest in this. How did you hit upon the name Lodi? he asks. Perhaps you mean a Schokolodi? No, replies Hans, a Saffalodi. Indeed, Saffalodi relates back to Saffaladi, a kind of saveloy sausage. The phalloform character of the image indicates very well the imaginary transmutation that has been brought about by the phallus that is both unreturned and eternally imagined by the mother. We see it reproduced at the end in the shape of little Lodi.

For Hans, woman will never be anything other than the fantasy of these little sister-girls around whom his entire childhood crisis is set to revolve. This is not altogether a fetish, because equally this will be the true fetish, if I may say so. He won't stop at what is inscribed on the veil. Rather, he will find again the typical heterosexual form of his object, but this will not prevent his relationship with women being thenceforth and doubtless forever marked by the narcissistic genesis in the course of which he has found a way to place himself in an orthoposition in relation to the female partner. To say it all, the female partner will not have been generated on the basis of the mother, but on the basis of the imaginary children that he can make with the mother and who themselves are heirs to the phallus around which revolved the whole primordial game of the love relation, of the captivation of love in the mother's regard.

So, in reference to our equation, we ultimately have on the one hand the assertion of Hans's relationship as a new father, as the Vatti, with a maternal lineage, and on the other hand little Hanna riding the horse and taking a dominant position in relation to the whole convoy, in relation to the whole train, to everything that the mother trails behind her.

Indeed, it is through the intermediary of little Hanna that little Hans has come to do what we said he was doing last time, that is to say, to dominate the mother, not simply to whip her, but, as the next part of the case history shows us, to see what she has in her belly. Once the little castrating penknife has been extracted, she is far more innocuous.

This is the formula that, in contrast to the previous one, marks the point of arrival of little Hans's transformation.

He will surely have every appearance of a normal heterosexual. Nevertheless, the path he will have taken through the Oedipus complex in order to arrive at this is an atypical path, linked to the father's shortcoming. You might be stunned at how great this shortcoming is, but the main thrust of the observation constantly shows us the father's faults and flaws which are underscored from one moment to the next by the appeals of little Hans himself. So, there is certainly no need to be stunned at how this shortcoming leaves the mark of a terminal atypia on the progress and resolution of the phobia.

I ask you simply to keep these two furthermost terms in mind, so as to see that it is possible and conceivable to try to articulate the transformation of one into the other through a series of stages.

Doubtless we ought not to be overly systematic here. This brand of logic is a new one. If it is to be pursued, perhaps it should merely be to introduce a certain number of questions regarding its formalism. Does it share the same laws with what has already been formalised in other domains of logic?

Freud, in the Traumdeutung, had already initiated something that tells us about the logic of the unconscious, in other words signifiers in the unconscious. This is certainly not the same as the logic that we are accustomed to handling. A generous quarter of the Traumdeutung is devoted essentially to showing a number of crucial logical articulations. Either/or, contradiction and causality, can be transported into the order of the unconscious. This logic may be distinct from our usual logic. Since topology is a rubber-sheet geometry, here it's a matter of rubber-sheet logic.

Rubber-sheet does not mean that everything is possible therein. Until further notice, nothing allows us to unlink two interconnected rings, even rubber ones. This remark is intended to show you that rubber-sheet logic is not doomed to complete and utter freedom. It requires us to define a certain number of terms and these definitions will have to be provided.

In short, what we can see appearing at the end of the resolution of little Hans's phobia is a particular configuration that is organised as follows. Despite the presence and even the insistence of the paternal action, little Hans inscribes himself into a matriarchal lineage of sorts, or to be more straightforward, and stricter too, a maternal duplication, as though it were necessary that there should be a third person, and that for want of it being the father, it should be the notorious grandmother.

On the other hand, what is it that brings him into relation with the object that henceforth will be the object of his desires? I have already underlined how we have testimony in the anamnesis of something that attaches him essentially to Gmunden, to his little sister, to the little girls, that is to say, to children insomuch as they are his mother's daughters, but also his own imaginary daughters. The originally narcissistic structure of his relationships with woman is indicated on the way out, with the opening out onto the solution of his phobia. What trace will remain of the passage through the phobia? Well, something very curious – the role of the little lamb, with which at the end he engages in some rather peculiar games, for example being butted by the animal.

This is the little lamb onto which one day someone tried to put his sister. That is to say, she was in the same position as the horseback position that she holds in the fantasy of the big box, the last stage before the resolution of the phobia. The sister had to dominate it first, so that he, little Hans, might then treat the horse as it warrants being treated, that is, by whacking it. At this point, the equivalence between the horse and the mother is secured – to beat the horse is also to beat his mother. The little sister sitting astride the little lamb is a configuration that will remain through to the end.

I cannot forego the pleasure, nor decline you the enigma, of showing you the work around which our master Freud made his analysis of Leonardo da Vinci revolve, namely, not the Virgin of the Rocks, but The Virgin and Child with St Anne that is in the Louvre and which was preceded by a cartoon that is in Burlington House, this one here.

Freud's whole analysis of Leonardo da Vinci turns around this Saint Anne, who has such a strangely androgynous figure – moreover, she looks like Leonardo's St John the Baptist – around the Virgin, and around the Christ child. Furthermore, as is stressed in the study, unlike the London Cartoon, His cousin, namely John the Baptist, is precisely a little lamb.

This highly singular configuration did not fail to attract Freud's attention and it is truly the core of his demonstration in the very peculiar study Leonardo da Vinci and a Memory of his Childhood. I do hope that you will take the trouble to read it before the end of the year, because I might manage to bring my seminar to a close with this.

You cannot help but notice the incredibly enigmatic character of the whole situation in which the term narcissism is introduced for the first time and the almost insensate audacity of writing such a thing at the time it was written. Since then we have managed to scotomise, to misrecognise, the existence of such things in Freud's oeuvre.

Read it, and you will realise just how difficult it is to work out what ultimately it is he wants to manage to say. But also read it to see the extent to which it holds water, in spite of all its errors – because errors there are, but that's of no moment.

We will have to come back to this singular configuration, which is there to present us with a humanissima Trinità, a very human trinity that is almost too human, in contrast to the divinissima that it substitutes.

What I wanted to present to you as a toothing stone is the peculiar necessity of a fourth term, which here we meet as a residue in the shape of the lamb, this animal term in which we meet again the very term of the phobia.

'ME DONNERA SANS FEMME UNE PROGÉNITURE'

From intersubjectivity to discourse
The object as a function of the signifier
Phobic metaphor
From biting to unscrewing
Hanna, mistress of the horse

Freud tells us that the truth about Hans was not fully obtained. What is to be done now is to formalise the observation slightly differently, the sole interest of which lies in how it allows for a more rigorous clasping and enveloping of what is going on.

There are, of course, all these French windows in the observation, and since it also has to do with a horse phobia one could for example babble on endlessly about the horse, because it's a highly singular animal, the same that crops up regularly in all mythology and which can be validly compared with little Hans's horse.

Robert Fliess, the son of Freud's correspondent who occupies an honourable place in psychoanalysis, has produced in the jubilee issue of the IJP commemorating the centenary of Freud's birth a worthy study under the title Phylogenetic Vs. Ontogenetic Experience. Certainly, it is inordinately striking on account of its character of manifest incompatibility. Since there are unresolved riddles in the Hans case, he ventures to resolve them by contributing to the file a vast extrapolation, the only completely unjustified drawback of which is that it assumes something to have been resolved that precisely has not been resolved.

One of the most riveting things is to see how he focuses everything, quite validly, on the infamous dialogue between little Hans and his father, the one that I have called the major dialogue and which culminates on 21 April. It's the one during which little Hans appeals to his father to play his role as a father by saying, You must be jealous. One cannot help but think that his father has played a role in the emergence of this sentence, which you can sense brewing up in everything that precedes it. Whatever happens, and whatever unnerved negations his father may utter, das muß wahr sein, it must be true.

These are the words that bring a dialogue to a close in which little Hans develops the fantasy of his father who, before arriving in the mother's bedroom, hurts his foot on a stone as did previously little Fritzl. The father has to knock up against a stone and bleed. Our author, Fliess, insists with great finesse on the use of words that lend what little Hans is saying a style soutenu – in French in the text – more soutenu here than anywhere else. In this regard he brings out clearly the inadequacies of the English translation. These remarks, which surely have their value, show the sensitivity that people from the first analytic generation have shown to the properly verbal texture, to the accentuation of certain signifiers and their crucial role, but the most interesting thing in his text is its rather astute speculation on the father's role on this occasion.

Indeed, the father is the one who introduces for the first time the word Schimpfen, which has been translated [into English] as scold. Weshalb schimpf ich denn eigentlich? is rendered as What do I really scold you for? Fliess rightly notes that this is injected into the conversation precipitately and from nowhere, and speculates on what participation might be occurring on the part of the father in what at that moment is assumed to be a constituent part of Hans's ego. All of this does not add up to an overly brazen extrapolation, conveying instead the need that the author feels to tell us that Hans's superego is being constituted at that moment. Indeed, it must be like this because it is already implied in a sort of preformed register that has to be applied to the case. Either way, there is something here that allows us to grasp, there and then, his hesitations in his way of expressing himself. Fliess speaks of a superego in statu nascendi. Certainly Hans's superego has not yet been formed.

The forming of the superego is something strange indeed. The author refers to the work of Mr Isakower, who insisted a great deal on the predominance of the auditory sphere in the formation of the superego and who foresaw the whole problem that we have been posing and constantly posing again with respect to the function of speech in the genesis of a certain normative crisis that we call the Oedipus complex. He made equally interesting and pertinent remarks about how we can grasp the mounting of this kind of apparatus, this network of forms that constitutes the superego, perceiving it in elements in which the subject hears purely syntactic modulations, in words that are strictly speaking empty because their movement alone is at issue. He tells us that in these movements of some intensity we can grasp, there and then, something that must refer back to an altogether archaic element. The child integrates the adult's speech, but will perceive only its structure and not yet its meaning. All in all, it's a matter of interiorisation. This is purported to be the first form of what will allow us to envisage what the superego is, properly speaking.

It's another interesting remark and in a seminar context it could be grouped together with the dialogue between Hans and his father, but not in order to find therein something that would match up neatly. On the one hand it's a matter of the integration of speech in its overall movement, in its fundamental structure as the grounding of an internal agency of the superego. On the other, there is the precise moment of the dialogue with his father, which is wholly externalised. The former can certainly not be matched fully to the latter, even though one might believe that its paradoxes would thereby be sealed over.

While we should always be seeking comprehensive references for what we are describing, I will stress now the necessity of doing something that brings out a point of progression in the handling of concepts of the analytic experience, and of doing so by grasping as closely as possible the movement of the observation on little Hans.

Everything that we have done thus far hinges on a number of postulates from our earlier commentaries, which are not absolutely postulates. These included a great deal of work of commentary and reflection on what the analytic experience puts before us. One of the postulates is that neurosis is a question posed by the subject at the level of his very existence. What does it mean to be of the sex that I am? Or What does it mean to be of one sex? What does it mean that I can even ask myself this question? Indeed, the introduction of the symbolic dimension means that man is not simply male or female but that he has to situate himself in relation to something symbolised that is called male or female.

While neurosis refers back to this, it does so in a way that is more woeful still in obsessional neurosis where it is not only a matter of the subject's relation to his sex but also of his relation to the very fact of existing. What does it mean to exist? How can I relate to the one that I am without being him, since I can somehow do without him?

While neurosis is thus a sort of closed question for the subject himself, even though it is one that is organised and structured as a question, it is quite certain that we can also form a finer understanding of how symptoms are the living elements of this question that is articulated without the subject knowing what he articulates. The question is a living one, so to speak, and the subject doesn't know that he is in the question. He is often an element of the question, and can be situated at various levels – at an altogether elementary and almost alphabetic level, but also at a higher syntactical level. It is within this register that we may speak of the hypnopompic and hypnagogic function.[1] On this basis, starting from the idea that the linguists have given us – at least certain among them – we can discern the two major aspects of the articulation of language. What makes it hard for us to be wholly in keeping with the linguists in our commentary on the observation is that we always have to refrain from pitching in a way that is overly absolute for one or the other of the two sides of what is put before us.

For there to be an observation we have to begin by analysing. Since what is specific to the neurotic's question is that it is totally closed, there is no reason for it to offer up anything more to he who would merely make a sort of rubbing of this hieroglyphic text that will remain undecipherable and enigmatic. This is why, before Freud came along, observations of neuroses had been made for decades without people even suspecting the existence of this language. For neurosis is a language.

Therefore, it is always in so far as something intervenes that is the beginning of a decipherment that we manage precisely to grasp its transformations and to see the manipulations that would be necessary when it comes to confirming that what is really involved is a text, but a text in which we find ourselves by means of a certain number of structures that become apparent only insomuch as we grapple with it.

We can do this at the simple level of decoupage, as is done for riddles. In some respects, this is how we proceed in particularly impenetrable and enigmatic cases, not altogether unlike what we find set out in The Psychopathology of Everyday Life, which reminds us of common practices for deciphering telegrams, even when they have been sent in a style that is coded or scrambled. One can even tally the signs that recur with the greatest frequency, which allows us to make interesting suppositions, namely that such and such a sign corresponds to such and such a letter in whichever tongue is supposed as the object language.

With the neuroses we are fortunately involved in operations of a higher order, where we meet certain syntactical groupings with which we are familiar. Yet the danger is always that one could go wrong by entifying these syntactical groupings, pressing them too heavily towards what might be called properties of the soul, even pushing them a little too far in the direction of a sort of natural instinctualisation. This would be to fail to perceive that what suddenly comes to dominate is the organising nexus that lends some of these groupings the value of a unit of signification, which is commonly called a word. It was in this sense that I recently alluded to the infamous identification of the boy with his mother, and I tell you now that the general fact of an identification such as this can only ever be made in relation to the overall movement of analytic progress. As Freud points out emphatically in the observation on little Hans – it's on page 319 of the German text – kann der Weg der Analyse niemals den Entwicklungsgang der Neurose wiederholen, the course of the analysis can never follow that of the development of the neurosis.

Now we have arrived at the heart of the matter. In our effort of decipherment we must follow what has effectively been woven into the text, and this text is itself subject to the use of an element from the subject's past in a current situation, as a signifier-element for example. Here we have one of the clearest forms of the x of a condensation. It is quite certain that when we broach the signifier-element we cannot at that moment cut ourselves off from the fact that it breaks down into two terms, two points that lie very far apart in the subject's history, yet we have to resolve these things in the mode of organisation in which they currently stand. This is what allows us and indeed compels us to seek out laws that are specific to the solution of each of these organised discourses, in keeping with whichever pattern by which the neuroses might present themselves to us.

However, while there is organised discourse there is also something else that comes to complicate matters and this is the way in which a dialogue gets under way so as to offer a solution to the discourse. This cannot be done without us offering the place we hold as the locus in which a share of the terms of this discourse must be realised. In principle, simply by virtue of being a discourse, it entails somewhere, initially in a virtual form, the Other that is in sum the place, the witness, the guarantor and the ideal locus of its good faith.

It is precisely here that we place ourselves and it is on this basis that we will see these elements of the subject's unconscious coming to light, that is to say, terms that will take up the place we hold. This is how we will be called into the revelatory dialogue. The meaning of the discourse will be formulated through a dialogue that progressively decrypts it by showing us what function is held by the personage whose place we occupy. This is what is called transference.

The said personage cannot help but change over the course of the analysis, and this is how we try to uncover the meaning of the discourse. So, indeed, we are the ones, inasmuch as we are integrated as a person, as a signifier-element, who are positioned, and lastingly so, in such a way as to resolve the meaning of the discourse of neurosis.

It is crucial always to keep these two planes of intersubjectivity in sight as the fundamental structure through which the history of the decrypting will develop. This must always be situated at its proper place in an observation.

In the case of little Hans, we had to highlight the complexity of the relationship with his father. Let's not forget that his father was the one who carried out the analysis. Therefore, this is the real, actual father dialoguing with his child. So, this is already a father who possesses speech, but beyond him there is the father to whom this speech is revealed as witness to its truth. This superior father is the almighty father who is represented by Freud, and this is something that cannot help but lend the observation an altogether essential characteristic that bears note. The structure involved here is to be mapped out in any kind of relationship between the one being analysed and the analyst. Likewise, this sort of higher agency is so inherent to the paternal personage or the paternal function that it tends always to be reproduced in one way or another.

This is precisely what makes for the specificity of the time when the patient was dealing with father Freud himself. On that occasion, the duplication didn't exist because the higher authority didn't exist behind him, and the patient had a strong sense that across from him was someone who had made a new universe of signification loom up. This new relationship between man and his own meaning and condition is precisely what he was faced with. And it was there to be used by him. This explains what appears paradoxical to us in the sometimes very stunning results that Freud obtained, and also in the very stunning patterns of intervention he employed in his technique.

This report enables us better to situate the direction in which our focus is shifting. Over the previous years you have seen me developing the fundamental subjective schema of the symbolic relation between the subject and this Other that is the unconscious personage who steers him and guides him, while the imaginary other, the little other, plays an intermediary role, that of a screen. Our focus has changed, little by little, and we have been led to reflect on the very structure of the discourse in question, which presents problems that are no less original and which are distinct from the previous ones.

Over the course of this year we have gradually shifted focus. There are, of course, laws of intersubjectivity, which are laws that govern the subject's relation to the little other and to the big Other, but this is not the be-all and end-all of what we are dealing with. The original function of discourse, where essentially it is language that is at issue, warrants broaching step by step. Discourse too has laws, and the relation between signifier and signified is something else, something distinct from intersubjectivity, even though it can overlap, as do the relations of the imaginary and the symbolic.

This is how in our movement this year with regard to object relations we have seen coming into the open the originary place of elements that are truly and verily objects, which lie at a stage that is altogether originative and foundational and which even founds objects, but these objects are nevertheless utterly different from objects in the complete sense. At any rate, they are quite different from real objects because it's a matter of using objects that, while they may have been extracted from a subjective discontent, are made to function as signifiers.

The first object that I isolated in its function as a signifier was the fetish, and I won't be going any further from now until the end of the year than a consideration of phobia.

Even so, if you have properly understood what we have been trying to bring into play each time that we have spoken of little Hans's phobia then this will have afforded you a mental model on the basis of which any further progress can be conceived of as a deepening or an extension into other neuroses, most notably hysteria and obsessional neurosis.

This is particularly straightforward and exemplary in phobia. Whenever you are dealing with a phobia in a young subject you will notice that what is at stake is always a signifier that is relatively straightforward in appearance. Of course, it won't be straightforward to handle once you've entered his game, but elementarily speaking, it's a signifier.

This was the meaning of the formula I set out for you –

The terms under the bar represent what has progressively complicated the elementary relationship with the mother, which was our point of departure when I spoke to you about the symbol of frustration, S(M), in so far as the mother is an alternating presence and absence. The child's relationships with his mother become established here over the course of development from one age to the next.

The case of little Hans led us first to this extremely taxing stage when the mother is complicated on account of all sorts of additional elements. First there is the phallus, φ. I told you that this was certainly the critical gap-element in any relation between the two, a relation which in contemporary analytic dialectics is being represented as something exceedingly closed. We need on the contrary to see the extent to which the child is himself in a relationship with an imaginary function on the mother's side. Then, there is the other child, α, who momentarily expels the subject, driving him away from his mother's affection.

Here we have a critical moment that is typical for any kind of subject that our discourse supposes. It is always in this way that you will see a phobia appearing in a child. Something lacks, which at a certain point comes to play the fundamental role in the way out of the crisis in the child–mother relationship, which appears to have no way out. There's no need to make hypotheses. The whole analytic construction is built on the consistency of the Oedipus complex, which can be schematised as follows –

$$(P)\ M \sim$$

If the Oedipus complex means something, then it's that from a certain point on, the mother is regarded and experienced as functioning through the Father. Father warrants a capital P here, because we suppose that this is Paternity in the absolute sense of the term. It's the Father at the level of the symbolic father. It's the Name-of-the-Father, which establishes the existence of the Father in the complexity in which he presents to us. Each experience of psychopathology breaks this complexity down for us as the Oedipus complex. In the end, it is none other than this, and the introduction of this symbolic element brings with it a new dimension that is completely radical with respect to the child's relationship with his mother.

To fill out the second part of the equation we need to start from the empirical data. These indicate the existence of something that, in a nutshell and perhaps subject to commentary, can roughly be established thus –

What I'm notating as Π under x would be the real penis. The (−p) is what stands in opposition to the child as a sort of imaginary antagonism. This is the imaginary function of the father insomuch as he plays the aggressive and suppressive role that is entailed by the castration complex.

If we are to formalise the Freudian experience then we need to take it literally and to accept it, at least provisionally, in that it asserts the constancy of the castration complex. Regardless of the discussions to which it might have thereafter given rise, we still maintain it as a reference.

On the one hand, something happens in the relationships with the mother that introduces the father as a symbolic factor. He is the one who possesses the mother and who enjoys her legitimately. This is a function that is both fundamental and problematic, and which occasionally can crumble or weaken.

On the other hand, something holds the function of bringing an essential articulation into the subject's instinctual play and into his assumption of his functions. This essential articulation is a signification that is truly specific to the human genus insomuch as it develops with the supplementary dimension of the symbolic order. The sexual functions are struck by something that is well and truly something of the signifier, something almost instrumental, which the human subject has to take into account by bringing it into play so that it will be present and experienced, and which is called castration.

Analysis represents castration in the most instrumental way, as a pair of scissors, or a sickle, or a hatchet, or a cutter. It's something that participates, as it were, in the instinctual furnishing of the sexual relation in humankind. Clearly we could then try to single out some such furnishing in one or another of the animal species. It is probable that the robin's coloured gorget could be regarded as a signal-element both for mating dances and for intersexual clashes. Either way, it's quite clear that an equivalent can be found in animals for the constant character of this paradoxical element that in man is bound to a signifier that is called the castration complex.

Here, then, is how we can write the formula of the Oedipus complex with its correlative, the castration complex. The Oedipus complex is itself something that is organised on the symbolic plane, something that presupposes for the subject the existence of the symbolic order behind it, as constitutive. However, there is something else that we are going to see in the observation on little Hans.

At a certain point in the dialogue with his father, when the latter is trying to nudge Hans towards a consideration of all sorts of physiological explanation – though, timid as this father is, never pushing things right through to the end – it becomes apparent that poor little Hans doesn't have a good understanding of the function of the female organ. And this swings around. When Hans comes out with this, his father ends up giving him the explanation in desperation, when in fact the fantasies that had already been developed with respect to the neurosis show quite clearly that the child knows full well that everything gestates in the mother's belly, regardless of whether she is symbolised or not by a horse or a coach. But what the father doesn't see is that Hans comes to this conclusion after a long talk in which he was interested only in a kind of genealogical construction. That is what interests Hans the most.

This kind of interest is a normal moment in a subject's progress, though it may be reinforced, as here, by the specific difficulties of the neurosis. It's plain to see that this is normal and that little Hans has only produced this long discussion, which arises when we are a long way in to the observation, in order to construct the genealogical possibilities that exist, that is to say, the different ways in which a child can be related to a father and to a mother, and what this signifies.

He goes so far as to construct one of the most original sexual theories, as Freud underscores because he has not come across many of the like. Indeed, as in any observation, there are peculiar features. At one point the child constructs a theory of reproduction, saying boys have girls and girls have boys. Don't imagine that this is a theory that it would be impossible to find in the structure, in the genealogical organisation. It's something that is consistent with the elementary structures of kinship and so there is ultimately some truth in this. It's because women make men that men then return – in the symbolic order – this essential service of allowing them to continue their function of procreation, provided of course that we do consider it in the symbolic order, that is to say, in a certain order that ascribes a regular succession of generations to all of this. As I have set out for you on several occasions, in the natural order there is no obstacle to all of this turning exclusively around the female line, without any discrimination in what can come as a product, without any discrimination or any impossibility of it being, in a nutshell, the mother, commensurate with the possible duration of her fertility, who produces the succeeding generations. Now, what interests little Hans is the symbolic order, this being the gravitational centre of his whole construction which is so extraordinarily lush and fantastical.

In other words, the questioning of the symbolic order emerges in the child in connection with the capital P of Paternity – What is a father? The Father is indeed the pivot, the fictive and concrete hub that maintains the genealogical order, which allows the child to energise the world in a satisfying way. However this world is to be judged – culturally, naturally or supernaturally – this is the world into which he is born. He makes his appearance in a human world organised by this symbolic order, and this is what he has to face up to.

The discovery of analysis is not, of course, to show us what the minimum necessary requirement is from the real father for him to give the child a sense of this notion of his place in the symbolic order by communicating and transmitting it to him. It is likewise taken as read that everything that occurs in the neuroses is designed in one respect or another precisely to make up for a difficulty, even an inadequacy, in how the child deals with this essential problem of the Oedipus complex.

Something else comes to complicate the elements that are being produced with further elements that are called regressions. These intermediate elements stem from the primordial relationship with the mother and already include a certain double-edged symbolism. Between this primordial stage and the moment when the Oedipus complex properly speaking is constituted, all sorts of accidents can arise that hinge on nothing but the fact that the child's other elements of exchange come to play their role in this relationship, in the construction and comprehension of the symbolic order. To spell it right out, all that is pregenital can be integrated at the Oedipal level and can come to complicate the question of the neurosis.

In the case of phobia, we have something straightforward. No one challenges that in the case of phobia the child has reached, at least momentarily, what is called the genital stage, when the subject's problems of integrating his or her sex are posed in their fullness. It is at this level, therefore, that we have to entertain the function of the phobic element.

This was plainly spelt out by Freud, who included the phobic element as something homogenous with the so-called primitive function of the totem that had been isolated by the ethnography of his time. This is something that probably is no longer tenable in light of the current progress, in which structural anthropology is playing a prevalent and axial role.[2] Others will replace these things, but for we analysts in our practical experience – and to the extent that ultimately it was hardly on the plane of phobia alone that Freud demonstrated how the totem took on its signification in the analytic experience – we nevertheless have to transpose it into a formalisation that would be less subject to caution than the totemic relationship is. This formalisation is what last time I called the metaphorical function of the phobic object.

The phobic object comes to play the role that on account of some shortcoming – on account of a real shortcoming in the case of little Hans – has not been played. So, we can see the object of the phobia appearing, which plays the same metaphorical role that last time

I tried to illustrate for you with the image – Sa gerbe n'était point avare ni haineuse.

I showed you how the poet used the metaphor to make the paternal dimension appear in its original dimension in connection with this old man in his decline, in order to reinvigorate the old man with all the natural spurt of the sheaf.

The horse has no other function but this in the living poetry that the phobia is. The horse introduces something around which revolve significations of various stripes which ultimately yield an element that makes up for what was missing in the subject's development, that is, in developments with which he has been furnished by the dialectic of the entourage in which he is immersed. However, this element is there only in a possible way, in some sense imaginarily.

What is at stake here is a signifier that is bare yet which carries some tendency that has already been conveyed by the whole convoy of culture that the subject drags behind him. In the end, the subject didn't have to go any further than right where any kind of heraldry can be found, in a picture book. This means that they are not mere images but images drawn by the hand of man, entailing a whole history that is taken as given, in the sense that history is an historiole[3] of myths and fragments of folklore. It was in his book, right alongside the picture of the red box which is the red chimney on which the stork is perched, that Hans came across the picture of a horse being shod. Here we can put our finger on what is involved. It's a horse represented.

Certainly, it is no wonder that such typical forms should always appear in certain contexts, in certain connections and in certain associations, which can elude those who are their vehicles, yet which the subject chooses in order to carry out a function. This function is the momentary allowing of certain states, and in the present case, the state of anxiety. It has to transform this anxiety into a localised fear, into something that presents a point of arrest, a terminal point, or else a pivot, a stilt in the shallows that fastens what is bobbing around and which runs the risk of being swept off by the whole inner current of the crisis in the maternal relationship. It is at this point that the horse plays a role in the case of little Hans.

The horse does admittedly seem to hamper the child's development a great deal, and for those around him it is a parasitic and pathological element. Yet it is also clear that once the analytic process is in place we are shown that, further to this, the horse holds a fastening role as a major point of arrest for the subject. It is a point around which he can make something revolve that otherwise would settle into an anxiety that would be impossible to bear.

In this case the whole progress of the analysis consists in extracting, in bringing to light, the potentialities that are offered by the child's way of using this signifier that is so vital in compensating for his crisis. It's a matter of allowing the signifier to play the role that has been set aside for it by the child's fundamental relationship with the symbolic in the construction of his neurosis. He has taken it as an aid, as an absolutely crucial point of reference in the symbolic order.

This is what the phobia develops. It will allow the child to handle the signifier in a particular way by drawing out possibilities of development that are richer than those it contains as a signifier. In itself, the signifier does not contain in advance all the significations that we will make it voice. It contains them rather through the place that it holds. To the extent that this is the place where the symbolic father ought to be, and to the extent that the signifier is there as something that corresponds metaphorically to the father, it allows all the necessary transfers to occur on the level of everything that is complicated and problematic on the lower line, namely the mother, M, her phallic function, φ, and the other child, α. This is a relationship that on each occasion necessitates a distinct triangle in relation to the real mother. For this, a term is required that cannot be mastered by the child, that makes him fearful, and which is even mordacious.

This is why on the other line we have written the other term, m.

$$\frac{\text{I}}{(\text{M} + \varphi + \alpha)\ \text{M} \sim \text{m} + \Pi}$$

This term, Π, is what is most under threat, namely the child's penis.

What does the observation on little Hans show us? It shows precisely that, in a like structure, it is futile to tackle its plausibility or implausibility.

It's not by saying to the child that this is a nonsense, Dummheit, nor by making very pertinent remarks to him about the link that surely exists between his touching his widdler and his deeper fears over his nonsense, that one will seriously get things in motion. Quite the contrary.

If you read the observation in light of the schema I have just set out for you, you will see that these types of intervention, which do have a certain effect, never have the direct suasive reach of the primordial experience. This initial experience has the efficacy one might wish for, and the whole interest of the observation is that it allows us to see how on such occasions the child reacts by reinforcing the essential elements of his own symbolic formulation of the problem. He persists in replaying the drama of the phallic hide-and-seek with his mother – Does she have it? Doesn't she have it? – clearly showing that what is at issue here is a symbol, which he clings to as such and which should not be thrown into disorder for him. Hence the crucial importance of a schema such as the one we have set out here.

What has to be done for the child is perhaps indeed to let this schema evolve, allowing him to develop the significations that pervade the system and which should enable him in turn not to stick merely with the provisional solution of being a little phobic child afraid of horses. Yet this equation can be resolved only in accordance with its own laws, which are the laws of a determined discourse, of one precise dialectic and not another. One won't get anywhere if one doesn't take into account what this equation is designed to support as a symbolic order.

This is how we are now going to be able to set out the comprehensive schema for the progress that is involved here.

It was surely not fruitless for the father, the great symbolic Father who is Freud, to have intervened, along with the little father, the beloved father. The latter does only one wrong here, though it is a sizeable one, that of not truly fulfilling his function as a father, not even, at least for a while, his function of a father who is jealous, the eifern of young Hans's invective, as in the wrath of a jealous God.

While his father speaks to him with great affection and devotion, he is unable to be more than he has been up to the present because he is not a father who is fulfilling his function in the real, leaving the child literally to follow his own whims with his mother. This doesn't mean that the child doesn't love his father, but rather that his father isn't holding for him the function that would allow for a direct and straightforward way out of the situation, far from it. We find ourselves faced with a complication of the situation. The father starts by intervening directly on the term Π, in keeping with Freud's instructions, which proves that Freud hasn't yet got things straight in this regard.

At this juncture, we may delve in detail into the sorts of articulation that would allow us to formulate this in a completely rigorous way, through a series of algebraic formulations, transforming one into the next. I am somewhat reluctant to do so, for fear that your minds might not yet be quite used to this, not yet disposed to something that I believe, even so, to belong to the future in the realm of the clinical and therapeutic analysis of the evolution of cases. I mean that in any case, at least in its crucial stages, it ought to allow of being encapsulated in a series of transformations.

Last week I gave you an example of this, first writing up the initial formula –

$$(M + \varphi + \alpha)\, M \sim m + \Pi$$

then the terminal formulation –

$$\left(\frac{I}{M + \varphi + \alpha}\right) M \sim m + \Pi$$

$$p\,(M)\,(M') \sim \left(\frac{\alpha}{\varphi}\right) \Pi$$

All of this is taken up in a logicification, Λ.

Once it starts to be spoken of, once this Λ is caught between the capital P and the lower-case p, we can provide a certain development. We can ask ourselves on what occasion, at what major moment, we might regard the transformation to have occurred. That is to say, when does p step in here, in M ~ (m) Π, and when does P step in at the level of I? I have not as yet gone into its successive transformations, but even so, if we follow what happens in the observation and how things evolve, we see that soon after the day of Freud's intervention, there appears, on 5 April, a fantasy that plays a major role and which thereafter will give rise to everything that is placed under the sign of Verkehr, that is, transport, with all the ambiguity that this word carries.[4] Something arises which allows us to say that in a certain way the first term in our equation is being incarnated here.

Indeed, the fantasy that Hans develops is that of seeing the cart onto which he wanted to climb suddenly driving off with the horse. The fantasy vouches for a transformation of his fears and constitutes a first attempt at dialecticising the phobia. One cannot help but be struck by the extent to which all it would take is to be subject to something like this for what is written out here to become apparent.

I mean that the horse is clearly a dragging element, while little Hans comes to place himself upon the same cart onto which sacks have been loaded, which as the next part of the observation shows represent all the possible and virtual children the mother can have. He holds nothing in greater fear than to see his mother loaded up once again, beladen, that is to say, big with child, carrying along, carting around, the children in her belly like all these loaded carts that give rise to so much fear in him. The rest of the observation will show that the cart, and on occasion the bath, hold the function of representing the mother. Therefore, the fantasy signifies – A heap of little children will be loaded on, I'll pile them on myself, and they will be driven off.

We can say that what is at issue here is a first exercise pictured in an image that is truly as remote as can be from any kind of natural assent in psychological reality, while being exceedingly expressive from the standpoint of the structure of the signifying organisation. We can see little Hans reaping a first benefit from the dialecticising of the function of the horse which is the essential element of his phobia.

We have already seen little Hans holding firmly to maintaining the symbolic function, for example in one of his fantasies, the giraffe fantasy. In everything that follows Freud's intervention we can see little Hans testing out this grouping in every possible way. First he is on the cart, among all the heteroclite elements which he fears so strongly will be dragged off goodness knows where by a mother who henceforth is nothing more for him than an uncontrollable power that cannot be predicted. With this mother, there is no more playing, or, to use a very expressive argotic term, y'a plus d'amour, that is to say, love is no more, the name of the game has changed, because others are entering the fray, and because little Hans is starting to complicate the game by bringing in, not the symbolic phallus with which he plays hide-and-seek with his mother and the little girls, but a real little penis, which earns him a rap on the knuckles.

This complicates the task and shows us that while the child didn't believe a word of what he was told by a certain gentleman who spoke like the good Lord, he did find that the gentleman spoke well, and the upshot of this was that little Hans started to speak, that is, he started to tell stories.

The first thing he will do is to maintain a distinction between the path of the real and the path of the symbolic. He will say to his father, Why did you tell me I'm fond of Mummy . . . when I'm fond of you? He has taken things into full consideration, and after this he will render unto the horse all its potentialities, all its possibilities.

The horse is something which can bite and which can fall. We shall see what this is able to yield. This is where little Hans gets the whole movement of his phobia under way. He starts to render unto the horse everything he can, and this is why we have all these paradoxes.

At the same time as the horse is the signifier that is teeming with all the dangers that it is supposed to cover, this is the same signifier with which little Hans, between 3 and 10 March, allowed himself to play horsey, with great carefreeness, in the company of a new nursemaid, which then provided the opportunity for him to give himself over, with great unseemliness and impertinence, to threats that he would undress her and so on. All of this is part and parcel of the role of maids for Freud. You can see that at this point, Hans was not in the least bit daunted by the horse.

Hans is so undaunted by the horse that he can take its place. We find him at once faced with maintaining the function of the horse and, as it were, making use of every available opportunity to elucidate and apprehend the problem, playing with the signifiers that have been grouped in this way, but on the condition that the movement be maintained, because otherwise none of this would make any sense and there would be no reason for us to spend more time scrutinising what the child is going on about. As I said, the absolutely radical transformation is the one in which the child uncovers one of the most essential properties of a situation such as this, once the set has been logified, once it has been played out sufficiently, once he has given himself over to a certain number of exchanges and permutations.

The initial transformation, which will prove decisive, is no less than the transformation of the biting into the unscrewing of the bathtub, which is something utterly different, in particular for the relationship between the protagonists. Voraciously to bite the mother, as an act or an apprehension of her altogether natural signification, indeed to dread in return the notorious biting that is incarnated by the horse, is something quite different from unscrewing, from ousting, the mother, and mobilising her in this business, bringing her into the system as a whole, for this first time as a mobile element[5] and, by like token, an element that is equivalent to all the rest. The whole system then presents as a large set of bowls from which the child will try to reconstitute a tenable situation. Indeed, he will even introduce new elements that will enable him to recrystallise the situation.

This is precisely what happens at the moment of the bathtub fantasy, which may for example be written out roughly as follows, with a permutation that will give –

The symbol Π represents the sexual function and the lower-case m represents the way of bringing the mother herself into the dialectic of the detachable elements, which will turn her, if I can put it like this, into an object like any other, and which will thereby allow him to handle her. It may be said therefore that all of this progress, which is what the analysis of the phobia amounts to, represents in some way the mother's waning in relation to the child and his gradual mastery of her.

The following stage – which I shall have to conclude next time – is focused entirely on something that will happen on the imaginary plane, in relation to what thus far has been in a certain sense regressive, but in a different way.

We will see little Hans bringing in his sister, this element that is so hard to handle in the real, deploying in her regard this sort of magnificent fantasia where she features in a stunning construction that consists first and foremost in supposing that she has always been there, in the big box, almost since the beginning of time, we might say.

You are going to see how this is possible and how it already supposes an exceedingly advanced signifying organisation. Before his sister came into the world, he reckons that she was already there, but in what capacity? It is only too evident that this is an imaginary capacity. We have Freud's own explanation, which is that something presents in an imaginary form that is repeated indefinitely, that is constant and permanent, in the form of an utterly essential reminiscence. Little Hanna has always been there, and he underscores that she is all the more there in that in reality he knows full well that she wasn't. He insists that she was there in the world precisely in the first year when she was not yet in the world, and that she indulged in everything that he had indulged in himself, logically and dialectically, in his discourse and in his games, over the course of the first part of the treatment.

Imaginarily in his fantasy, not only does he articulate that his sister has been there forever in the big box that travels either on the coach or separately, depending on the circumstances, he also tells us at another moment that she sits beside the coachman – The coachman had the reins, Hanna had the reins too. There is some kind of difficulty here when it comes to distinguishing reality from imagination, an ambiguity that Freud notes between Wirklichkeit and Phantasie, but little Hans continues his fantasy through the intermediary of this imaginary child who has always been there, and who moreover will always be there. He also indicates that through the intermediary of this imaginary child a certain relation will take shape that is equally imaginary, in which, as I underscored for you, little Hans's relationship with the maternal object will stabilise, that is to say, with the object of eternal recurrence with respect to the woman to which this little man must accede.

In this imaginary game where he makes use of his little sister literally as a sort of Ego Ideal, she becomes the mistress of the signifier, the mistress of the horse, which she dominates. And it is through her intermediary that little Hans himself can come to whip the horse, to beat it and dominate it, to become its master. So it is that henceforth he will find himself in a relationship of mastery in relation to what thereafter will be inscribed in the register of creations of his mind, which will be developed in the ensuing part. The mastery of this other will henceforth be for him any kind of fantasy of the feminine, namely what I might call the girls of his dream, the daughters of his mind. This is what he will always be dealing with from this point forward as a sort of narcissistic fantasy in which the dominating image is incarnated. While it does resolve the question of the possession of the phallus, this image leaves the fundamental relation in an essentially narcissistic relation, in an essentially imaginary relation. To spell it right out, this relation is his domination of the critical situation.

This is what will leave its mark of deep ambiguity on everything that will ensue as an outcome or as a normalisation of the situation. These stages are pointed out well enough in the observation. It is after the playful development of his fantasies, after the reduction of elements to the imaginary following their fixing down as signifiers, that the fundamental relationship will be constituted that will allow him to assume his sex. He will assume it in a way that, however normal it may remain, can still be reckoned to bear the mark of a deficiency.

I will only be able to show you all the traces of this next time, but already I can say something that will give a good indication of where the fault lies that the child has reached in order somehow to fill or hold its place.

I think that nothing is more telling in this regard than what is expressed in the final fantasy, the fantasy of the unscrewing, in which the child's rear is changed and he is given a bigger one. Why? Ultimately it is to fill this place which he has made far more manageable, far more mobilisable, namely the bath, on the basis of which the dialectic of the falling can come into play and, eventually, be evacuated. This evacuation is only possible once the bath has been unscrewed. I would say that here too the atypical, anomalous and almost inverted character of the situation can be seen.

In a normal formula, to speak only of boys, the child possesses his penis only to the extent that he finds it again as something that is given back to him, after losing it, after passing through the castration complex. In the case of little Hans, the castration complex is called upon constantly by the child, and indeed he himself suggests its formula. He clings onto its images. When he practically commands his father to make him undergo this test, he foments and organises the same test in a reflected way on the image of his father, wounding him, wishing this injury to be inflicted. Isn't it striking to see that after all these futile efforts for the subject's fundamental metamorphosis to be achieved and overcome, what finally comes to pass does not concern his sexual organ but his rear?

Ultimately it is his relation with his mother that allows him to occupy this place, but at the cost of something that doesn't become apparent to us from this perspective. What is actually involved here is the dialectic of the subject's relation to his own organ. For want of the organ itself being changed, at the end of the observation the subject assumes unto himself a sort of mythical father, such as he has managed to conceive of him. Goodness knows that this father is a father like no other, because this is a father who in Hans's fantasies is capable of engendering. As the husband says to the policeman in Les Mamelles de Tirésias –

Revenez dès ce soir voir comment la nature
Me donnera sans femme une progéniture.[6]

It is in this respect that it cannot be said that everything has been taken on board with regard to the relative position of the sexes, of the gap that remains from the integration of these relations.

I want to insist on this. It's precisely in the paradoxical inversion of certain terms, expressed through a notation with a plus or a minus, that we can truly judge the result of a certain furtherance. If therefore in the present case little Hans has not passed through the castration complex, then he has passed though something that had the capacity to transform him into another little Hans, as is indicated by the myth of the fitter who changes his behind.

When Freud meets Hans again in his young adulthood, he sees someone who tells him that he remembers nothing of all this. Here we have the sign and the token of a kind of moment of essential alienation.

You know the story that is told of a subject who went off to an island to forget something. Some people find him, go up to him and ask him what it was he wanted to forget, and he is unable to reply. As the end of the story has it – he has forgotten.

In the case of little Hans, I would say that there is something that allows us to shift the emphasis, and almost the formula, of this story. If to a certain degree Hans may indeed bear one of the scars of the incompleteness of his analysis, and of the Oedipal solution that was predicated by his phobia, it's for the following reason. After all of these salutary turns, which from a certain point forth rendered his recourse to the horse signifier needless and expendable, if the phobia was made gradually to disappear, then it was on the basis of something that allows us to say, not that Hans forgot, but that Hans has forgotten himself.

FROM HANS-THE-FETISH TO LEONARDO-IN-THE-MIRROR

A way out via the maternal ideal
Little Hans, descendant of two mothers
The vulture was a kite
The Other become little other
Leonardo's imaginary inversion

Today is our last session of the year. I didn't care to sum up by repeating myself, which, regardless of the effects it may have, is not a poor method.

There are a number of things that I didn't get round to last week, which meant that I was unable to push my analysis through to the end.

I have produced a formalisation with some letters and have tried to indicate the direction in which an effort can be made so as to accustom oneself to writing out relations in such a way as to yield fixed reference points – reference points that there is no need to go back on in discussion. Once they have been set down they cannot be passed over by taking advantage of everything that usually is a little too flexible in the interplay between the imaginary and the symbolic, but which is so important for our comprehension of the experience.

What I have initiated for you, then, is a beginning to this formalisation. I'm well aware that I haven't explained every last term. A certain indeterminacy might therefore seem to have persisted in how these terms link up with one another. You can't explain everything in one go. In the article that is set to appear in the third issue of the journal La Psychanalyse under the title L'instance de la lettre, you will see what is perhaps a tighter justification for the ordering of some of these formulae, notably those for metaphor and metonymy.

At the point we've reached, I believe that what is important is to have suggested to you the possibility of using formulae of this order so as to situate the relations between the subject and the different modes of the other, which, in sum, cannot be articulated otherwise, given how language in the usual sense does not furnish us with the necessary fundaments with which to do this.

So, I left some things trailing behind. And, after all, why shouldn't I? Why, even in what is specific to the case of little Hans, would I want to provide an absolutely complete formula for what little Hans poses as a question?

You know that I mean to pursue my commentary within the register of questions posed by Freud. Yet this doesn't imply that I should want to turn each of his works, nor even his work as a whole, into a closed system. What is important is for you to have picked up sufficiently, and better so each day, on how Freud shifts the very bases of psychological account by introducing a dimension that is foreign to it. The foreignness of this dimension in relation to any psychological fixing down of the object constitutes the originality of our science and the basic principle on the basis of which we must therein assess our progress.

Either way, to seal up once again Freud's examination, to reduce it to the field of psychology, leads to what I shall call, with no further formality, a delusional psychogenesis, the same psychogenesis that you can see being developed from day to day, implicitly, in how psychoanalysts have been contemplating the facts and the objects they deal with. This psychogenesis is so paradoxical, so foreign to all the neighbouring conceptualisations, so shocking, yet at the same time so well tolerated, that the mere fact that it is surviving needs to be added to the main thrust of the problem, and ought to be resolved at the same time in the solution that we will bring to the problem of the Freudian dimension, that is to say, of the unconscious.

So, I left to one side everything that you are now about to follow.

You know the elements well enough to perceive on rereading the text the whole mythical game that plays out in what I shall call the reduction to the imaginary of the sequence of maternal desire. I wrote this sequence out in the formula M.φ.α, which is the notation for the mother's relationship with this imaginary other that is her own phallus, then everything that may arise in terms of new elements, that is to say, other children. In this instance it is Hans's little sister, Hanna.

The child's mythification in this imaginary game as triggered by the, let's say, psychotherapeutic intervention, is something that in itself makes manifest a phenomenon the originality of which ought to be seized upon as a vital element of the Verarbeitung of the whole analytic progression. It's a dynamic and crystallising element in the symbolic progress that constitutes the analytic cure as such.

While indeed I didn't push this any further, I should like, even so, to reveal the elements that I didn't touch upon. Actually, I did signpost them in passing, but without explaining the exact function they hold in relation to these mythical doings in which the child indulges under the prompting of the analytic intervention.

There is one element that is correlative with the major mythical invention relating to birth, especially the birth of young Hanna and her constant presence for all eternity, so nicely fomented by Hans in his mythifying speculation. This element is the mysterious personage of the stork, who is truly worthy of the finest tradition of black humour. The hatted stork comes when everyone is asleep, knocks on the door and unlocks it with his key. He presents with all these exceedingly quirky aspects. We need to know how to hear what little Hans says. He puts Hanna in your bed, he tells his father. In other words, the stork has come in his father's place. Then, Hans corrects himself, No, the stork put her in her bed. Next, the stork goes away again leaving no one any the wiser, until he comes back and makes a bit of a din, just to wake up the household. In short, this character who comes and goes, who is seemingly so imperturbable, even uncanny, is surely one of the most enigmatic of little Hans's creations. It would be worthwhile dwelling at greater length on this, and indeed his place needs to be indicated in the overall economy of the case at this point in little Hans's progress.

Little Hans cannot manage, under the suggestion of his psychotherapist father, himself groomed by Freud, to foment his imaginary manipulation of the different terms that are present unless by isolating something that is well and truly heralded just before the major mythical creation – Hanna's birth and, at the same time, the stork – when we meet the theme of death, voiced by Hans and reported word for word by his father. Once he knocked on the pavement with his stick – we don't know why he has one, since this cane has never been mentioned before – and said: 'I say, is there a man underneath? Someone buried?'

The presence of the theme of death is strictly correlative with the theme of birth. It is crucial to pick out this dimension for the comprehension and furtherance of the case, but, in truth, this theme, this potential of generation raised to its ultimate degree of mystery, between life and death, between existence and nothingness, is something that poses particular problems that are distinct from that of the introduction of the horse signifier. It is not its counterpart. It is something else, which perhaps we shall look at next year. I'm leaving it in reserve. The heading that I will most likely choose for what I shall develop next year is Les formations de l'inconscient.

I will also underscore once again that it is significant that little Hans, at the end of the crisis that resolves and dissolves the phobia, moves into something so imperative as the refusal of any further births. A kind of treaty will be established with the stork and with his mother. You will see the meaning of the passage that has to do with his mother's relations with God with respect to the possible arrival of more children, so elegantly transformed in the observation by Freud's little footnote – Ce que femme veut, Dieu le veut. Indeed, this is just what Hans's mother had said when she declared that if she didn't want it, God didn't want it either.

On the other hand, little Hans says that he wishes to have children, in this same move whereby he doesn't want there to be any more. His desire is to have imaginary children, insomuch as the whole situation has been resolved for him by an identification with maternal desire. There will be his dream children, the children of his mind. To spell it right out, he will have children structured on the model of the maternal phallus, which ultimately he will turn into the object of his own desire.

Yet it is fully understood, of course, that there will be none, and this identification with the mother's desire as an imaginary desire only constitutes in appearance a return to the little Hans that he once was, the little Hans who played the primordial game of hide-and-seek with the little girls, the object of which was his sexual organ. On no account does Hans still think of playing hide-and-seek, or more exactly, he no longer thinks of showing them anything but, as it were, his fine stature as little Hans, that is to say, a personage who in some respect has become – and this is what I'm driving at – something like a fetish object.

Little Hans places himself in a certain pacified position, and regardless of the heterosexual lawfulness of his object, we cannot regard this as exhausting the legitimacy of his position. In this respect, he blends in with a type that will strike you as no stranger to our era, that of the generation of a certain late nineteen-forties style that we are familiar with, these lovely fellows who wait for the initiative to come from the other side. To say it right out, they wait for their trousers to be pulled down. This is how I see the future of the charming little Hans, as fully heterosexual as he seems to be.

Hear me well. Nothing in the observation allows us at any moment to think that it is resolved otherwise than through this domination of the maternal phallus, in so far as Hans takes its place, identifies with it, and certainly masters it. Everything that might correspond to the phase of castration, or to the castration complex, is no more than what we can see taking shape in the observation in the form of the stone on which one can injure oneself. The image of this that comes to the surface, so to speak, is much less that of a vagina dentata than that of a phallus dentatus. This kind of frozen object is an imaginary object that makes a victim of any male assault by causing injury.

It is in this sense that we can also say that little Hans's Oedipal crisis does not culminate strictly speaking in the shaping of a typical superego, I mean a superego such as it is produced in keeping with the mechanism that is already indicated in what we have taught here at the level of Verwerfung, namely what has been rejected from the symbolic and reappears in the real. This formula is the true key, at a much closer level, to what happens after a Verwerfung of the Oedipus complex.

Indeed, it is in so far as the castration complex has been come through, but without it being able to be fully taken on board by a subject, that he produces an identification with a sort of image of the father in the raw, an image that carries reflections of his real particularities in what is heavy and even overwhelming about them. Here we can see once again a fresh instance of the mechanism of reappearance in the real, but this time it's a real on the borderline of the psyche, within the bounds of the ego. However, this is a real that forces itself upon a subject in an almost hallucinatory way, to the extent that at a certain point the subject has peeled off from the symbolic integration of the process of castration.

Nothing of the like is manifested in the present case. Little Hans is surely not to lose his penis because at no moment does he acquire it. While little Hans has identified with the maternal phallus, this does not mean that he can thereby retrieve his own penis and take on board its function. There is no phase of penis symbolisation. The penis somehow remains on the margins, disengaged, as something that has only ever been reviled and reproved by his mother. Yet this thing that is produced allows him to integrate his masculinity. This occurs through no other mechanism but that of the shaping of an identification with the maternal phallus, which also belongs to a very different realm from that of the superego with its disturbing yet also balancing function. Rather, it's a function that belongs to the order of the Ego Ideal.

It is in so far as little Hans has a certain idea of his ideal, insomuch as he is his mother's ideal, namely a substitute for the phallus, that he takes his place in existence. Let's say that if, instead of having a Jewish mother in the progressive movement, she'd been a devout Catholic, you can see by what mechanism little Hans might have been gently nudged towards the priesthood, and even towards sainthood.

In a case like this, where the subject has been introduced into an atypical Oedipal relationship, the maternal ideal is very precisely what offers a certain type of way out and positioning in the relation between the sexes. The outcome is produced through identification with the maternal ideal.

This gives us a rough sketch of the terms in which I'm locating what the case of little Hans opens onto. We have confirmative hints of this throughout the observation, and those towards the end are sometimes very moving.

When little Hans has become downright disheartened by the paternal shortcoming – since he wanted his father to step forward – he will somehow perform, himself, fantasmatically, his own initiation ceremony by placing himself quite naked on the little truck where he is due to keep watch all night, like a young knight, after which, thanks to a few coins given to the guard – the same money that will serve to abate the terrific potency of the Storch – little Hans will be riding on the larger circuit. The matter has been settled. Little Hans might not be anything other than a knight, a knight who is more or less covered by social security, but a knight all the same. And he will have no father. Moreover, I don't believe that anything new in the experience of existence will ever afford him one.

Right after this, there is a somewhat belated intervention from his father. The opening of the father's comprenoire as the observation wears on is not an uninteresting item in itself. After playing with an open hand, firmly persuaded of all the truths he has learned from his good mentor Freud, the further he advances in the wielding of this truth the more he comes to realise that it is far more relative than he was given to believe. When little Hans starts to produce his big mythical delusion, he comes out with a sentence that is barely noted in the text but which carries all its importance.

It has to do with the time when little Hans is playing up, contradicting himself from one instant to the next, saying, It's true – It's not a bit true – It's just for fun – But it's actually quite serious. His father, who is no fool and who learns from this experience, tells him, Everything one says is a bit true. In spite of everything, this father who has not succeeded in holding his position – he is the one who ought to have been put through analysis – tries one more time, even though it's too late. He says to little Hans, Perhaps you're not fond of Daddy.

This delayed intervention leads little Hans to the very nice gesture that is given a special highlight in the observation. Just as the father says this to him, Hans knocks over his little horse. The conversation is out of date. The dialogue has expired. Little Hans has settled in to his new position in the world.

Little Hans is now a little man with the power to have children, capable in his imagination of engendering indefinitely and of deriving full satisfaction from his creations. This is how the mother lives on in his imagination.

As I told you, to be little Hans is not to be the descendant of one mother, but the descendant of two mothers.[1] This is a remarkable and enigmatic point, on which last week I paused the observation. Certainly, the other mother is the one whose potency he has had ample occasion and reason to encounter – his father's mother. None the less, that the subject should take on board the conditions of the final equilibrium in this duplication or doubling of the maternal figure still remains one of the structural problems posed by the observation.

It was on this point that I concluded the lesson before last, drawing a comparison with the painting by Leonardo da Vinci and by the same stroke with the case of Leonardo. It is no accident that Freud devoted such attention to it.

We will be dedicating the time that remains to this text. We cannot claim to exhaust Leonardo da Vinci and a Memory of his Childhood in just a single lesson. This will be a short lesson for the end of term, as is my wont in my teaching as a way of winding down, for a crowd as attentive as you are, and I thank you for being so.

Let's leave little Hans to his fate. But before taking leave of him, I will yet point out to you that when I alluded in his regard to something deeply contemporary in a certain evolution in relations between the sexes, to the 1945 generation, this was surely not to slip inordinately into current affairs. I leave it to others to depict and define what the current generation might be, to lend them a direct and symbolic expression. There is Françoise Sagan for one, whom I'm not name-dropping here for the sake of it, nor for the mere pleasure of being topical, but rather as an opportunity to advise you to read over the holiday period an article on two books from this best-selling author, Bonjour tristesse and Un certain sourire. The article is by Alexandre Kojève in the August/September 1956 issue of Critique under the title Le dernier monde nouveau. You will be able to see what a serious philosopher who is used to operating exclusively at the level of Hegel and the highest political issues can draw from works that at first blush seem so frivolous.

It will certainly enlighten you and, as they say, it won't do you any harm. There's no risk involved. Psychoanalysts are not recruited from the ranks of those who devote themselves wholeheartedly to the world's fluctuations in psychosexual matters. You are, if I may say so, too well oriented for that, even a trifle swotty in such matters. Indeed, this is to lead you to a kind of immersion into current affairs, activating this perspective when it comes to what you do and what you should be ready to hear sometimes from your patients themselves. This will also show you something that we must take into account, namely the deep changes in relations between men and women that have come about during such a brief length of time as the one that stands between us and Freud's era, when, as they say, everything that was to become our history was in the process of fomentation.

All of this is intended to tell you also that the last word on don-juanisme, on Don-Juan-esque womanising, might not have been spoken, whatever the analysts might have to say about it. While they have made interesting contributions on this score, and while something correct has been glimpsed in the notion of Don Juan's homosexuality, this is certainly not to be taken in the way it is usually taken.

I firmly believe that Don Juan is a character too far removed from us in the cultural realm for analysts to have been able to perceive him accurately. Mozart's Don Juan, if we take him as the apogee of the character and as something that effectively signifies the culminating point of a question, properly speaking, in the sense I intend here, is surely quite distinct from the character that Rank sought to construct for us as a reflection. It is certainly not from the angle of the double alone that he should be understood. I think that, again to adopt a counter-stance, Don Juan does not blend seamlessly – indeed far from it – into the seducer who's got little tricks that work every time. I believe that Don Juan loves women. I would even say that he loves them enough to know on occasion not to tell them so, and he loves them enough so that when he does tell them, they believe it.

This is no small matter, and it reveals many things. It shows that there is never any way out of the situation for him. I think that it's in the direction of the notion of the phallic woman that we need to look.

In Don Juan's relations with his object, there is of course something related to a problem of bisexuality, but it lies precisely in the direction of this thing that Don Juan seeks out in woman, and this is the phallic woman. Since he truly seeks her out and goes after her, and is never content with attaining her or contemplating her, he doesn't find her, or ends up finding her only in the form of the ominous guest who does indeed lie beyond woman, whom he doesn't expect, and who is, not without reason, the Father. Let's not forget, however, that when he does rear his head, what is yet more curious is that it's in the form of a guest made of stone. To spell it right out, this is stone in its aspect of being absolutely dead and closed off, beyond all the life of Nature. This, in sum, is where Don Juan comes to a standstill and seals his fate.

The problem that Leonardo da Vinci will pose us is quite different.

That Freud should have turned his interest to Leonardo da Vinci is not something that we need to question. In general, why one thing came to pass instead of not coming to pass should be the least of our worries. Freud is Freud precisely because he took an interest in Leonardo.

What is to be done now is to find out how he became interested in him and what Leonardo might have been for him. To find an answer, there is no better than to read the Kindheitserinnerung. I gave sufficient forewarning for some of you to have done so, and to have noticed how deeply enigmatic this book is.

In 1910, Freud had arrived at what we might call the height of fortune in existence. This at least is how things look from the outside and, actually, he says as much himself. He had gained international renown, and had not yet been through the sadness and drama of the separations from his most highly esteemed pupils. This was just before the major crisis points, but at this point he was able to tell himself that he had made up for the setbacks of the previous ten years of his life.

So, here is Freud taking Leonardo da Vinci as his subject. Of course, Freud's background, his culture, his love of Italy and the Renaissance, give us to understand that he must have been intrigued by the character. What does he tell us in this regard? In what he writes he evinces a considerable appreciation of Leonardo's profundity, which he handles with great sensitivity.

It may be said that on the whole Freud's text on Leonardo is an interesting read and is read with even greater interest with the passing of time. By this I mean that, even though it is one of Freud's most criticised works – and it's paradoxical to see that it's also one of those of which he was most proud – the people who are always most reticent in such cases, and goodness knows they might well be, I mean the specialists in painting and art history, with the passing of time, and even as the major faults in the text came to light, ultimately came to realise how important it is. By and large, Freud's text came to be almost universally rejected, scorned and even disdained by art historians, and yet, in spite of all the lasting reservations that have become only more intense with the appearance of new documents proving that Freud had made mistakes, no less a figure than Kenneth Clark, former director of the National Gallery, in a book that is not all that old, acknowledges the great interest of Freud's analysis of the painting that I showed you the other day, the St Anne in the Louvre, paired with the famous Cartoon in London. These are the two works on which Freud based the in-depth study he made, or believed he made, of the case of Leonardo da Vinci.

Well, I suppose I don't need to summarise for you the fate of this little book.

First there is a brief presentation of the case of Leonardo, of his strange side. This strange side, which we will be coming back to with our own means, is doubtless accurately perceived, and everything that Freud says most certainly finds a sure axis in the enigma of the character. He then examines the painter's singular constitution, even predisposition, along with his paradoxical activity. I'm calling him a painter, though he was so much else besides. Let's say for the time being a great painter. Anyway, Freud turns to the fragment that he pushes very much to the fore across all his developments, the only childhood memory that we have from Leonardo, and which has been translated as follows – It seems that I was always destined to be so deeply concerned with vultures; for while I was in my cradle a vulture came down to me, and opened my mouth with its tail, and struck me many times with its tail against my lips.

Freud tells us that this memory is of the strangest sort, then segues into something that will take us where he wants to lead us. We follow him because we are used to this kind of sleight of hand that consists in superposing in dialectics and reasoning what is very often conflated in experience and in clinical practice, when in fact these are very different registers. I'm not saying that Freud handles them improperly. On the contrary, I believe that he handles them brilliantly, that is to say, that he goes to the heart of the phenomenon. Yet we would be wrong to follow him with an idle mind, accepting in advance everything he tells us, namely that this is a sort of superposition, or superimposition, between the relation to the maternal breast and fellatio, at least an imaginary act of fellatio. This is what he posits at the outset and which is purported also to carry the signification of a veritable sexual intrusion.

Freud lays this out at the start, and it's upon this base that he will tease out an articulation of his construction, gradually leading us to what is deeply enigmatic in the relation to the mother in the case of Leonardo. Onto this he builds all the particularities of this strange personage, namely his probable inversion first of all, then his altogether unique and peculiar relation to his oeuvre, wrought by a kind of activity that always lies on the limits between the realisable and the impossible, as he himself writes in one instance – repeatedly breaking off the different ventures in his life – this singularity that sets him apart from his contemporaries and makes him a legendary figure in his own lifetime, thought to possess every quality and ability, a universal genius. From all this that surrounds Leonardo da Vinci, Freud will deduce for us his relation with his mother.

As I mentioned, Freud takes as his point of departure the childhood memory. The vulture with the quivering tail that comes to strike the child is, we are told, constructed as the screen-memory of something that is the reflection of a fantasy of fellatio. Freud doesn't hesitate for one second to set it out in just this way, yet all the same it has to be acknowledged that for an unprimed mind this is something that raises a problem. The whole interest of Freud's investigation is to reveal that, until an age that may be tied down to his third or fourth year, Leonardo very probably had no other presence around him but that of his mother, and doubtless no other elements of sexual seduction but what Freud calls innumerable passionate kisses pressed onto the child's mouth by his mother, nor any other object to represent the object of his desire besides the maternal breast. Ultimately it is on the plane of fantasy that the revelation is posed by Freud himself, in so far as it can have this informative role.

All of this hinges on one point, which is none other than the identification of the vulture with the mother herself, in so far as she would be the figure at the source of the imaginary intrusion.

Now, let's say it straightaway. It so happened that there was what may be called a mishap or an error in this affair – but it's a fortunate error. Freud only read this childhood memory in the version that features in Herzfeld's translation, from which he lifts the passage. That is to say, he read it in German, and what she translated as Geier, a vulture, was not a vulture at all. The fact has been pointed out by several scholars, most recently by Professor Meyer Schapiro in an article published last year in the Journal of the History of Ideas, Vol. 17, No. 2.[2]

Besides, Freud could have suspected as much because, as usual, he carried out his work with the utmost care and the reference from the manuscript folio from which the translation was made is given in a footnote. As it happens, it comes from the Codex Atlanticus, which is a bound folder of Leonardo's drawings and writings housed in Milan. It's been translated into practically every language. In French there is a complete though inadequate translation under the title Carnets de Léonard de Vinci. You can read what Leonardo left by way of manuscript notes, often in the margins of his drawings. Freud could have taken a look at where this reference is to be found in Leonardo's notes, notes which in general are five, six or seven lines long, a half page at most, scattered amongst the sketches. This fragment is on a folio, just alongside a study of birds in flight. Such studies crop up in different places in Leonardo's oeuvre. Leonardo says, It seems that I was always destined to be so deeply concerned with . . . not vultures, but precisely what he has drawn alongside, kites.

That the kite should be particularly interesting for the study of bird flight is something that had already been remarked upon by Pliny the Elder. According to him, the kite's tail is of especial interest to maritime pilots because its movement is particularly exemplary for the steering of the rudder. Leonardo deals with the same thing. It's very nice to follow the fortune of this kite's tail down through the ages. The fundamental character of its tail has been known since Pliny in Antiquity and has been taken up by several authors, some of whom I shall be mentioning in passing in a short while. I've been told that, in our own time, Mr Anton Fokker has studied first-hand the movement of the kite's tail. Between the wars he concocted some lovely little preparations for the handling of planes in nosedive, a truly distasteful parody – I hope you share my opinion on this – of natural flight. But then, we couldn't expect any better from human perversity.

So, this is the kite, which, moreover, has just what it takes to provoke such perversity. It's an animal that has nothing especially attractive about it. Pierre Belon, who put together a very fine book on birds, and who had been to Egypt and various other parts of the world on behalf of King Henri II, saw some in Egypt and described the bird as sordide & non gentil, both vile and unpleasant.

I must say that for a minute I hoped that everything might fall into place and that Freud's vulture, even if it was really a kite, might actually turn out after all to have something to do with Egypt, and that in the end it might be an Egyptian vulture. You can see how I always desire to sort things out. Unfortunately this is not the case.

In fact, the situation is complicated. There are kites in Egypt and I can even tell you that one day when I was having breakfast in Luxor, I had the surprise of catching in my peripheral vision something that was flouncing around and which then darted sideways, making off with an orange from my table. For a second I thought it was a falcon, but then I quickly realised it wasn't. It flew up to perch on the corner of a roof and set down the orange, to show that it was just teasing. You could see it was a reddish creature of a peculiar style. Soon enough, I could be sure that it was a kite. So, you can see what a familiar and readily observable creature it is.

But there is something else. There is an Egyptian vulture that looks very much like it, and this is what might have made things fall into place. This is the one that Belon speaks about, which he calls the Sacre Egyptien and which since Herodotus has been known under the name of the Ἱέραξ. There are many in Egypt and, naturally, it is sacred. Herodotus informs us that in Ancient Egypt it could not be killed without getting its slayer into great trouble. It is of interest here because it looks somewhat like a kite and somewhat like a falcon. This is the one that in the Egyptian ideograms corresponds roughly to the letter alef which I speak about in my disquisitions on hieroglyphics and their exemplary function for us. Here is the vulture, that is to say, more or less the Egyptian saker falcon.

Egyptian vulture hieroglyph

Everything would be just fine if it were this one that was used for the Goddess Mut, whom you know Freud speaks about in relation to the vulture, but that won't work. Freud really did get it wrong, because despite all this effort towards a solution, the vulture that was used for the Goddess Mut is this one.

Griffon vulture (Gyps fulvus) hieroglyph

Unlike the other one, this one doesn't have a phonetic value. It serves as a determinative element, in the sense that it is added on. Either it designates on its own the goddess Mut, and in this case a little flail is added, or it is integrated into a whole sign that will write Mut plus the little determinative, or else one is content to make it equal to M, yet adding a little t to phoneticise the term. It can be found in more than one association, where it always has to do with the mother goddess.[3]

This very different vulture, a true Gyps, which doesn't resemble in the slightest the previous one, the one that lies on the boundary between kites and falcons and other related animals, is the one to which refers everything that Freud reports of this tradition of the bestiary type, for example what was recorded by Horapollo at the time of the Egyptian decline. Horapollo's writings, which moreover are fragmentary and have come down to us through umpteen transpositions, transcriptions and distortions, formed the basis for a few Renaissance collections, to which the engravers of the time added little emblems that were supposed to provide us with the signifying value of a number of major Egyptian hieroglyphs.

This edition here dates from 1519, and so was brought out, by Aldus Manutius, in Leonardo's lifetime. It ought to be familiar to you all because it's the one from which I took the drawing that graces the cover of the journal La Psychanalyse. Horapollo gives the description that I can see written here – The image of an ear signifies work to come.

We will not, however, allow ourselves to fall into the bad habits of an era from which not everything is to be imitated.

It was from Horapollo that Freud took the reference stating that the vulture carried the signification of mother, but he also found a far more interesting entry which leads him to take a step forward in the dialectic, namely that this is an animal that exists only in the female sex. This is an old zoological yarn which, like so many others, goes way back. It is attested in Antiquity, though not in the finer authors, but was no less widely accepted in medieval culture. One would be quite wrong to believe it, and all it takes is to open up one of Leonardo's notebooks, which are there to prove it, that his mind brought about a revolution within a certain perspective, and did not partake of these medieval fables. Freud accepts that, because Leonardo was widely read, he must know this story. This is likely and has nothing extraordinary about it, because it's very widespread, but it hasn't been proved. And it has all the less interest in being proved in that a vulture is not what is at issue.

I'm passing over the fact that Saint Ambrose took the story of the female vulture as Nature deliberately affording us an example to foster the entry into our comprenoire of the virgin birth of Jesus. Freud seems to accept uncritically that almost all the Fathers of the Church told this story. I have to tell you that I haven't been able to check because I only found out this morning that it's in Saint Ambrose. Actually, I knew it already, because a certain Pierio Valeriano, who in 1556 brought out a collection of these captioned images of the time, seemed to me to be a particularly important source to consult in order to see what the kite might have been at that time, along with a certain number of other symbolic elements. He points out that Saint Ambrose mentions it, and singles out Saint Basil the Great as well, but there is no mention of all the Fathers of the Church, as the author to whom Freud refers seems to suggest.

Vultures were only female just as snails were only male. It was a tradition, and it's interesting to compare one with the other given that the snail is a creature that slithers over land while the vulture is impregnated in the sky, offering her tail to the wind, as we can see in one very fine image.

Where does all this lead us? It shows that the vulture story surely does have a certain interest, like many others of this nature. In truth, Leonardo's writings are teeming with such stories. He showed a lively interest in different sorts of fables constructed upon such stories. Many other things could be drawn from the kite. One could for example note that it's an animal strongly given to envy, and which mistreats its offspring. Imagine what the result would have been if Freud had chanced upon that, and the different interpretation that we could give of the relation with the mother.

Am I to show you that nothing holds water in all of this, that there is nothing worth keeping in this part of Freud's elaboration? Well, no. That's not why I'm telling you this. I won't give myself the easy advantage of criticising a great invention long after the event. It often happens that, with all sorts of defects, the eye of the genius has been guided by many other things besides these little investigations, and has gone far beyond the supports that some happenstance has afforded.

The question is what it means and what all this allows us to see.

Six years after the Three Essays on Sexuality and ten or twelve after the first perceptions that Freud formed of bisexuality – in what he had thus far extracted from the function of the castration complex on the one hand, and of the importance of the phallus and the imaginary phallus on the other, in so far as the latter is the object of woman's Penisneid – what is there that is new in Freud's essay on Leonardo da Vinci?

He introduces very precisely, in May 1910, the importance of the function of the phallic mother, the phallic woman. She is phallic not for the subject herself, but for the child who is dependent upon this subject. Here we have the point of arrest, the original element in what Freud is bringing us here.

That the child is bound to a mother who in turn is bound on the imaginary plane to the phallus qua lack is the relation that Freud is introducing as crucial and which is utterly distinct from everything he had said before then regarding woman's relation to the phallus. This original structure is the one around which this year I have been making the fundamental criticism of the object relation revolve, in as much as the object relation is designed to instate a certain stable relationship between the sexes that would ostensibly be grounded in accordance with a certain symbolic relation. I believe I have made this abundantly clear – at the very least I think you have taken it as such – in the analysis of little Hans. Here, we find testimony in Freud's thought of this being something that in itself alone enables us to gain access to the mystery of Leonardo's position.

In other words, the fact that the child, isolated through the dual encounter with woman, finds himself by the same token confronted with the problem of the phallus qua lack for his female partner, that is, in this instance, for the maternal partner, is the element around which everything that Freud constructs with regard to Leonardo turns. This is what makes for the depth and the originality of this observation, which moreover is Freud's first work, and not by chance, in which the term narcissism is mentioned. So, this is the start of the structuring as such of the register of the imaginary in Freud's oeuvre.

We need to pause now for a moment on what I shall call the contrast, the paradox, of the personage of Leonardo and pose the question of the other term, which is not new but which appears here with a particular insistence, that of sublimation.

Every now and then Freud refers to a certain number of what could be called Leonardo's neurotic traits. I mean that from one point to the next Freud is seeking out traces of a critical point of passage, of a relation preserved in some kind of repetition of terms, in sorts of obsessional lapses. Freud will also turn whatever this paradoxical aspect is in Leonardo's thirst for knowledge, in his cupido sciendi – this being the traditional designation for the curiosity that animated him – into an obsessional trait, because he calls it a Grübelzwang, a compulsive brooding. It cannot be denied that there is a certain such indication here. Nevertheless, Leonardo's personality cannot be explained in its totality by neurosis. And, as one of the crucial outlets of what remains of the exhilarated and indeed fixed infantile tendency at issue in the case of Leonardo, Freud brings in the notion of sublimation that he had already introduced in the Three Essays.

As you know, further to sublimation being a tendency that bears upon objects that are not primordial objects but the most elevated objects of what is offered to human and interhuman consideration, it was only later on that Freud was to add a few complements showing the role sublimation might play in establishing the interests of the ego.

Since then, the term sublimation has been taken up by a number of authors from the psychoanalytic community who link it to a notion of the neutralisation and dis-instinctualisation of instinct. I must say that this is something that it is very hard to credit. A de-libidinalisation of libido. A dis-aggressivation of aggressiveness. These are the loveliest terms that we can most commonly find flowering up from the pen of Hartmann or Loewenstein. They hardly clarify anything when it comes to the mechanism of sublimation.

The interest of a study like Freud's Kindheitserinnerung is that we can take a few ideas from it and at the very least initiate something that will allow us to posit the term sublimation in such a way as to secure a more structured basis than the notion of an instinct that dis-instinctualises, indeed of an object that, as they say, becomes more sublime. For it would seem that, going by these ego psychologists, this is what the Saft of sublimation ought to be.

Leonardo da Vinci was himself the object of an idealisation, if not a sublimation, which began in his own lifetime and which tends to turn him into a kind of universal genius and, equally, a stunning precursor to modern thought. This is what is maintained by some, including highly erudite scholars, who have started to get down to the crux of the problem, as indeed did Freud. Others have done the same on other planes besides that of art. Pierre Duhem, for example, says that Leonardo glimpsed the Law of Falling Bodies and even the Principle of Inertia. A slightly more rigorous and methodical examination from the standpoint of the History of Science shows that this is hardly the case. Nevertheless, it is clear that Leonardo made stunning discoveries and that the drawings he left us in the realms of the kinematic, the dynamic, the mechanical and the ballistic, often evince an extraordinarily keen perception far in advance of what was being done in his time. On no account does this allow us to believe that there were not on each of these planes works that were highly advanced in mathematisation, and especially those in kinematics, for example.

Yet a remainder of Aristotelian tradition, that is to say, a tradition founded on a certain evidential experience, meant that the fairly advanced mathematical formalisation that had been made in abstract kinematics had not yet been fully conjoined with the experiential domain, the domain of real and existing bodies that seem to be subject to the Law of Gravity, which so occupied the human mind with its experiential prominence that they spent all the time of which you are aware on striving to produce a correct formulation for it. Think on the fact that we also find in Leonardo's drawings and their attendant commentaries interpolations such as, a body falls more quickly the heavier it is. We find this explicitly and more often still implicitly. I think that you have retained enough of your secondary education to know that this theorem is deeply wrong, even though experience, as they say – experience at the broad level of common experience – does seem to impose it.

Nevertheless, what is it that constitutes the originality of these drawings? I'm alluding to just one portion of what he left us, as the work of an engineer, properly speaking, which so astonished, interested and even fascinated both his contemporaries and later generations. These are things that are often extraordinarily advanced for their time but which cannot get beyond certain bounds that had not yet been crossed in terms of the use, the vivid entry, as it were, of mathematics in the realm of the analysis of phenomena of the real.

In other words, what Leonardo brings us is often absolutely admirable in inventiveness, construction and creativity, and it is already quite enough to see for example the elegance with which he determines the theorems that can serve as the basis for evaluating the gradual change in the intensity of a force attached to a circumvolubile body, this being the term he uses for a body mobile about an axis. This force is linked to a spiritual arm, and the arm turns. What will the variation in the efficacy of this force be as the lever arm turns? These are problems that Leonardo will excel in translating by what I shall call a kind of overview of the field of force, determined not so much by his calculating as by his drawing. In short, the intuitive factor, the factor of creative imagination, is tied in Leonardo to a certain predominance accorded to the principle of experience, which is the source of all sorts of dazzling and original intuitions but which, despite everything, are partial at the level of the working drawing of an engineer.

This is no small matter. As a scholar of the History of Sciences, Alexandre Koyré, tells us, here you have all the distance that lies between a drawing and an engineer's blueprint. While a blueprint can display on its own account all sorts of intuitive elements in the relationship between certain quantities or values that are somehow materialised in an image simply through the layout of whichever apparatus, it is not capable of resolving certain higher-level primary-symbolic problems. Ultimately, we will see in Leonardo an inadequate and even false theory of the inclined plane, which will only be resolved with Galileo. With this revolution – to use another of Koyré's terms – the mathematisation of the real gets under way when from a certain point forward it was resolved radically to purge the method, that is to say, to put experience to the test of terms, to the test of positionings of the problem, that roundly take the impossible as the point of departure.

Understand that only when one has set apart the formulation of those formulae that are to be submitted to hypothesis from any kind of claimed intuiting of the real can one renounce something that seems to be self-evident, like heavier bodies falling faster. Only then can one start to elaborate on the basis of another starting point, like the correct one of gravity, that is to say, a formula that in some sense cannot be actualised anywhere because one will always be in a condition that has too many impurities to make it a reality.

It is because one is starting with a pure symbolic formalisation that the experiment can be realised in a correct fashion and a mathematical physics can start to be established. It may be said that after whole centuries of trying, they never managed to do so until they resolved to make this separation between the symbolic and the real at the point of departure. This was something that had never been allowed in the string of experiments and fumblings that researchers had been making from one generation to the next, and which moreover are fascinating to read about. This is the interest of a History of Science. Until then, they remained in a betwixt and between, in something incomplete, partial and imaginative, something fulgurous that led Leonardo da Vinci himself – and this is what I'm coming to – to formulate that his position was essentially one of a relation of obedience to Nature.

The term Nature plays an utterly important, utterly essential, role in Leonardo's oeuvre. Nature is for him a presence that must be constantly turned to account. Nature is the absolutely primary element. Nature is an other against whom he pits himself, and whose signs have to be deciphered as lines of verse. He makes himself Nature's double and, as it were, co-creator. All these terms are in Leonardo's notes.

This is the perspective from which he examines Nature in order to arrive at a sort of fusing of the imaginary with an other that is not the radical Other, that is not the one we deal with and which I have taught you to situate as the place, the locus, of the unconscious. What, then, is this other?

It's very important to see in this respect how insistent Leonardo is in saying that there is no voice in Nature, and he gives such curious and amusing demonstrations that it would be worthwhile taking the trouble to see to what extent it might have become an obsessional preoccupation for him, strictly speaking, to demonstrate that there cannot be anyone who could respond to him, and who would be what everyone then believed in, a spirit who speaks from somewhere up in the air. He insists on this. He often comes back to it. And indeed, there were people for whom to proclaim such a thing was an almost scandalous truth.

Nevertheless, Leonardo examines Nature as an other who is not a subject but whose causes there is at the same time every reason to read. I'm saying this because it's in Leonardo – Nature is full of infinite causes that have never occurred in experience.[4]

The paradox of this formula, if we take Leonardo, as is often done, as a sort of precursor of modern experimentalism, is there to show the distance that lies between him and us, and the difficulty that lies in grasping only after the event, once a certain evolution in thought has been achieved, what the thought of the one who is being labelled a precursor was actually engaged with.

Leonardo's position with respect to Nature is one of a relation to an other who is not a subject, yet whose history, sign, articulation and speech are nevertheless to be detected. It's a matter of grasping the creative power of this other. In short, this other transforms the radicalness of the alterity of the absolute Other into something that is accessible through a certain imaginary identification.

It is this other that I would like to see you taking into consideration in the Cartoon to which Freud refers, remarking on the fusing of bodies that makes it hard to tell that of St Anne apart from that of the Virgin, as though this were a riddle.

This is so true that if you reverse the drawing and you compare it with the painting in the Louvre, you will notice that the legs of St Anne are on the side where initially the legs of the Virgin were, in the most natural pose and in almost the same position, while the Virgin's legs are now where St Anne's legs were.

That this is a kind of twofold being, with the aspects of the one peeling away behind the other, is not in doubt. That the Infant in the London Cartoon extends His mother's arm, not altogether unlike a glove puppet, is something that is no less striking. Aside from this, however, note that the other woman, without our really knowing which is which, raises alongside the Infant the pointing finger that we find throughout Leonardo's oeuvre, and which is one of its enigmas. It's in the St John the Baptist, in the Bacchus, and in the Virgin of the Rocks. This is also something that offers a very fine image of the ambiguity between the real mother and the imaginary mother, between the real child and the hidden phallus. I'm not reading the finger as the symbol of the hidden phallus because it roughly reproduces its outline, but because this finger, which is to be found right across Leonardo's output, is the index to want-of-being, the term of which is also inscribed everywhere in Leonardo's oeuvre.

What is involved here is a position that the subject takes in relation to the problematic of the Other, which is either this absolute Other, the closed unconscious, this impenetrable woman, or else, behind her, the figure of death which is the ultimate absolute Other. The way in which a certain experience composes with this ultimate term of the human relationship, the way in which it reintroduces all the life of imaginary exchanges into this relationship, the way in which it displaces the radical relation to a certain essential alterity so as to cause it to be inhabited by a relationship of mirage – this is what is known as sublimation and this is what is exemplified constantly by Leonardo's oeuvre on the plane of genius and creation.

It is also, I believe, what is expressed in the Cartoon in a sort of singular cryptogram. This drawing is not unique, but merely the double of another drawing for a painting he never made, for the chapel in the Servite Monastery. Reproduced there is the theme of St Anne, the Virgin, the Infant and the fourth term we spoke about, namely St John, who elsewhere is the lamb.

In the fourth term of this fourfold composition we ought clearly to find – as on each occasion I have spoken to you about this, whenever the fourfold relation is incarnated – the theme of death. Where is it? Naturally it is everywhere. It passes from one to the other.

Death is also what will leave Leonardo's sexuality in a dead state, because this is his essential problem, around which Freud predicated his examination. Nowhere in Leonardo's life do we find any attestation of something that would represent a true bond, a true captivation that would be more than ambiguous and transient.

But ultimately this is not the impression that his story has left. Rather, it is that of a dreamlike paternity. He was patron and protector to some young fellows whom he took in for their refined background painting, a number of whom passed through his life, yet without any major attachment really leaving its mark on his lifestyle. If there had to be one who ought to be classified as homosexual, it would rather be Michelangelo.

Is death there in this sort of double, the one who is there across from the Infant and who is so readily replaced by the lamb?

On 3 April 1501, Pietro da Novellara wrote to Isabella d'Este[5] that over two days all Florence had flocked to see the preparatory cartoon for the high altar in the Santissima Annunziata, a work which Leonardo was never to paint. Everyone lingered over the meaning of this fourfold scene in which the Infant is almost jumping out of his mother's arms to seize hold of a lamb. They all understand the sign of the drama. It looks as though St Anne, rising slightly from her seat, wants to restrain her daughter from parting the child and the little lamb; perhaps she symbolises the Church, not wishing to prevent the Passion of Christ. It is here, in this aspect of His destiny and His sacrifice, that the term of Leonardo's relation to his mother can be situated, though it is his separation from her that Freud takes as the point of departure for the whole dramatisation that followed in Leonardo's life.

The last character, the most enigmatic of all, is the St Anne, restored and established in this purely female, purely maternal relation. This Other, with a capital letter, is necessary to lend balance to the scene.

Of course, contrary to what Mr Ernst Kris tells us, this is far from being almost the first such setting of these characters. Even Freud didn't believe for a second that the theme of Anne, the Virgin, the Infant and the fourth character that is introduced here, was an invention exclusive to Leonardo.

The fourth character does indubitably pose a problem in the history of religious motifs that is rather specific to Leonardo, but when it comes to the representation of the set of St Anne, the Virgin and the Infant, it is enough to have garnered the faintest historical notion of what was going on at the time, by reading any one of the historical accounts, to know that it was precisely in those years, between 1485 and 1510, that the cult of St Anne was being elevated in Christianity, in connection with the dogmatic criticism of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin. It was the outgrowth of a spiritual theme, but of many other things besides spirituality, because this was the time of the issuing of plenary indulgences, when across Germany there was a wave of these little tickets with woodcuts of Anne and the Virgin and Infant, the purchase of which could buy you ten or twenty thousand years of indulgence in the afterlife. So, this is a theme that was not invented by Leonardo, nor is it true that Freud imputed the invention to Leonardo. There is only Mr Kris to tell us that Leonardo was alone in representing a trio of the like, when in fact you have just to open Freud's study to see the painting's theme represented with the title Anna Selbdritt, that is to say, the Trinitarian Anne. It's the same in Italian – Anna Metterza.

This function of the trinity of Anne lies in the fact that at what was doubtless a critical moment, which we needn't revisit since we can't allow ourselves to be swept too far into this historical scholarship on Christian devotion, we meet again the constancy of a supra-Trinity, so to speak, that assumes its full worth when it finds its psychological incarnation in Leonardo da Vinci.

I mean that while Leonardo was surely a man positioned in a profoundly atypical stance with respect to his sexual maturation, and this dissymmetry was tantamount to an encounter with a sublimation that reached exceptional degrees of activity and realisation, nothing in the elaboration of his work – which he was constantly starting over in a truly obsessional way – could be structured without there being something to reproduce this relation between the ego and the other.

This is inscribed, along with the necessity of the big Other, here on the diagram to which I have been urging you to refer as a means of charting these problems.

Leonardo's inversion

But what are we to make of the atypia brought about through the especially dramatic engagement of this being along the pathways of the imaginary? That he can draw on the prowess of his essential creations only within this trinitarian scene – the same that we met at the end of the observation on little Hans – is one thing. But quite another thing is how this enlightens us on the matter of a perturbation correlative with his own subjective position.

Leonardo's inversion, if indeed we can speak in terms of inversion, is far from reducible to a paradox or an anomaly in his affective relationships. At any rate, this is a register that apparently bears the mark of a peculiar inhibition in this man endowed with every gift.

Besides, the case that there are no erotic themes in Leonardo has perhaps been overstated. It might be going a bit too far, because what is true is that in Freud's time they hadn't yet uncovered the theme of Leda, that is, a very beautiful woman and a swan that all but conjoins with her in an undulating movement no less delicate than her forms. It is rather striking that once again it is a bird that represents the male theme, and certainly an imaginary fantasy. But let's press on because there's something else I must tell you.

If we stay at the level of the experience that we are able to have of Leonardo, there is one element that we cannot eliminate, and this is his manuscripts.

I don't know if you have ever had occasion to leaf through one of the reproductions, but all the same it produces a certain effect when you see all these handwritten notes in mirror writing. Then, when you read them, you can see him constantly speaking to himself, calling himself thou. For example, Sell what you cannot take with you. Get from Jean de Paris the method of painting in tempera. Or, You will go and get two sprigs of lavender or rosemary from the corner shop. They are things of this order, where everything is mixed in together. It ends up becoming quite overawing and gripping.

To spell it right out, the relationship of identification between the ego and the other, the establishment of which appears to be crucial for an understanding of how identifications are constituted, and on the basis of which the subject's ego can move forward, the idea seems to arise that, correlative to each sublimation, that is to say, to the process of the de-subjectification or the naturalisation of the Other which would constitute the essential phenomenon of the sublimation to the very extent of its greater or lesser totality or perfection, something always occurs on the level of the imaginary in a form that is accentuated to a greater or lesser extent, namely an inversion of the relations between ego and other.

Here, in the case of Leonardo da Vinci, we truly have someone who addresses himself and who makes comments to himself from his own imaginary other. We have to take his mirror writing as the bare fact of his proper position with respect to himself. Here we have the same radical alienation that I posed as a question at the end of the last session regarding the amnesia of Hans as a youth.

I shall pose the same question today, as to whether the process that we shall call sublimation, or psychologisation, or alienation, or egoisation, might not entail in its very steering a correlative dimension whereby a being forgets himself as an imaginary object of the other.

Indeed, in the imaginary ego, there is a fundamental possibility of forgetting.

The collective work cited in the opening chapter bears the title La Psychanalyse d'aujourd'hui [a selection of the articles appeared in 'American Adaptation' in the single volume Psychoanalysis of Today, New York: Grune & Stratton, 1959]; further commentary on the same is given in 'La direction de la cure et les principes de son pouvoir', Écrits, pp. 585–645, passim.

The bulletin referenced in chapters IV and V is the Bulletin d'activités de l'Association des psychanalystes de Belgique, no. 25, 118 rue Froissart, Brussels (cf. Écrits, pp. 609–12).

It has not been possible to identify the painting alluded to on page 328. It may be that the painting is not by Titian, but Veronese: the Venus and Mars United by Love in the Metropolitan Museum in New York. Nor has it been possible to identify the letter by Freud mentioned on page 295.

A number of annotations in Lacan's own hand feature in the typescript that was given to me. Thereafter, I was able to consult notes taken down directly by Paul Lemoine; I thank my dear friend Gennie Lemoine for allowing me to draw on these notes for the établissement of the present Book, as for the Books of the Seminar in their entirety.

I would also like to thank: Claude Cherki, who now manages Éditions du Seuil after Paul Flamand and Michel Chodkiewicz; Evelyne Cazade-Havas, who has taken over from François Wahl as copy-editor; she was the first reader of the [French] manuscript and kindly accepted my request to check the charts of Vienna, which Paul Lemoine had jotted down; and Jean-Claude Baillieul, who went through the [French] text at the various stages of putting this book together.

Lastly, I would like to give a word of thanks for the warm welcome I received from the Library of the École de la Cause Freudienne, 1 rue Huysmans, in the sixth arrondissement of Paris.

Since the établissement of the Seminar of Jacques Lacan is a work-in-progress, I would be grateful for any possible corrections and additions, which may be addressed c/o the editor.

I Introduction

1 Concerning situation analytique, cf. B. Fink's endnote (192, ¶3) on page 412 of his translation of Book VIII of the Seminar (Cambridge: Polity, 2015).

2 Note that in the late 1950s, Lacan uses tendance, on and off, to translate Freud's Trieb and Regung. Cf. 'La direction de la cure et les principes de son pouvoir', in Écrits (Paris: Seuil), p. 597: 'Quand il dénonce une tendance, ce qu'il [Freud] appelle Trieb, [. . .].' In most instances, the present translation renders tendance with the paraphrase 'drive tendency'.

3 Lacan's regular use of the adjective adéquat to qualify the object of cognisance is in reference to the doctrine of Veritas est adæquatio rei et intellectus, ascribed by Thomas Aquinas to Isaac Israeli ben Solomon (Cf. 'La Chose freudienne', in Écrits, op. cit., pp. 420, 434). Here and throughout, the present translation opts for 'corresponding'.

4 It may be noted that at the time of the present Seminar, the only authoritative indication in English of the title of Lacan's paper was the indexical reference: 'The Looking-Glass Phase' in the International Journal of Psycho-Analysis, 1937, 18(1): 78.

II The Three Forms of the Lack of Object

1 Chocolat was the clown persona of the performer Rafael, of Afro-Cuban descent. Between 1895 and 1910 he performed in a duo with the clown Foottit, and their skits often featured 'comedic slaps'. The expression 'être chocolat' has passed into colloquial use in French, meaning 'to be taken for a ride' or 'to miss out'. The mention of Chocolat and Auguste is unattested in the authorially annotated typescript (cf. Jacques-Alain Miller's Note, page 427) and so, as with the many subsequent editorial interpolations (signalled below), may derive from the Lemoine notebooks.

2 Perhaps an allusion to Dranem and his hat, which he named 'Poupoute'. Dranem also popularised the song 'Nous nous plûmes' (lyrics by Georges Sibre), which Lacan works into 'Fonction et champ de la parole et du langage', Écrits, op. cit., p. 276.

3 The diagram reproduced at 000002.09 of the stenographer's typescript is unattested elsewhere in the seminar typescripts. The variations on the diagram, constituting the figures on pages 57, 85 and 202 of the Seuil edition, are editorial. Of further note are Lacan's two thumbnail sketches flanking the diagram in the authorially annotated typescript: on the left, a schematic version of the 'R schema' (developed in January 1958 and featuring in its fully expanded form in Écrits, op. cit., p. 553; on the right, the upper and diagonal vectors of the 'L schema' (as corresponding to the imaginary triangle φIM in the R schema).
4 Mention of Helene Deutsch and Melanie Klein is unattested at 000002.14 of the stenographer's typescript.
5 Lacan seems to be confusing punishment for incest with the penance for 'sex with an elder's wife' listed as one of the 'Penances for Grievous Sins Causing Loss of Caste' in the Manusmṛti. Among the various alternative penances is that the penitent should 'cut off his penis and testicles by himself, hold them in his cupped hands, and walk straight towards the south-west until he falls down dead' (Manu's Code of Law; A Critical Edition and Translation of the Mānava-Dharmaśāstra, translated by P. Olivelle, Oxford University Press, 2005, p. 220).

III The Signifier and the Holy Spirit

1 This interrogative quip is unattested in the stenographer's typescript (cf. 000003.3).
2 The clause . . . , par l'intermédiaire du message de l'Autre, . . . is editorial (p. 46 of the Seuil edition, unattested at 000003.11).
3 Freud writes 'die Empfindung des Bedürfnisses als die der Befriedigung', which James Strachey translates as 'the experience both of a need and of a gratification' (Penguin Freud Library 7, p. 45n).
4 A thumbnail sketch in Lacan's hand just below this figure (square-bracketed at the foot of 000003.14) links the two levels of signifier and signified to the two levels of the graph to be developed throughout the following year's seminar, where a retroactive vector rises, loops back, and falls, thus to cross each horizontal line twice.
5 Lacan is overlooking the 1924 edition in the fifth volume of the Gesammelte Schriften, which included further additions, in particular the note added to the subsection on 'Ambivalence' (in the second Essay) incorporating the findings of 'Die infantile Genitalorganisation'.
6 Cf. Freud's remark: 'Unfortunately we can describe this state of things only as it affects the male child' (PFL 7, pp. 308–9)
7 This entire sentence has been interpolated editorially (p. 55 in the Seuil edition, unattested at 000003.32 in the typescript). Cf. Écrits, op. cit., p. 155. B. Fink translates somatognosie as 'agnosia of somatic functions'.

IV The Dialectic of Frustration

1 The bibliographic reference to Alice Balint's 1939 article 'Love for the Mother and Mother Love' is supplied in deference to Lacan's manuscript annotation (p. 63 of the Seuil edition gives the misreference Mother's Love and Love of the Mother), though his spoken remark might equally encompass her 1937 paper, 'Handhabung der Übertragung auf Grund der Ferenczischen Versuche' (in Internationale Zeitschrift für Psychoanalyse, 22: 47–58), mentioned by Michael Balint in 'Early Developmental States of the Ego. Primary Object-Love' with respect to Imre Hermann's notion of 'clinging', there viewed from the perspective of the mother. The interjection in the ensuing sentence . . . au Jardin des Hespérides . . . is unattested at 000004.10–11.

2 This notation is editorially supplied, in anticipation of the authorial occurrence of the same in lesson XXIII (p. 386 below).

3 Cf. Freud's introductory lecture on 'Femininity': 'Her happiness is great if later on this wish for a baby finds fulfilment in reality, and quite especially so if the baby is a little boy who brings the longed-for penis with him' (PFL 2, p. 163).

4 In the 'Observation of a Phobia', Anneliese Schnurmann notes that the brother is Sandy's elder sibling 'Barrie', who, like Sandy, is a child of the first couple formed by Mrs H. and her now deceased husband. Barrie had been evacuated to live with his aunt where he stayed until the end of the war. It is specified that the boy is just two years older than the subject, not five years, though there is mention of an eleven-year-old stepsister in the new household. Cf. (1949) 'Observation of a Phobia', in Psychoanalytic Study of the Child, 4: 253–70.

V On Analysis as Bundling and the Consequences Thereof

1 The noun subodoration is far less common than the already antiquated French verb subodorer. Rarer still is its English cognate, with Charles Talbut Onions citing just two attested uses of 'subodorate', both from the nineteenth century, with the signification 'to smell or scent out' (A New English Dictionary of Historical Principles, Vol. IX, Part II, Su-Th (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1919), p. 38). Though Onions posits a Latin derivation from subodōrāt, the verbal stem subodorari appears to be a mid-sixteenth-century concoction by Denis Lambin (cf. Tournoy, G. and Tunberg, T. O., 'On the Margins of Latinity? Neo-Latin and the Vernacular Languages' in Humanistica Lovaniensia: Journal of Neo-Latin Studies, Vol. XLV, 1996: 147) which, indeed, may derive from the French, given an earlier attested use in Guillaume Briçonnet's 1522 correspondence with Marguerite D'Angoulême: 'seullement savourer, subodorer et gouster nostre naissance celeste' (Martineau-Genieys, C., Veissière, M. and Heller, H. (eds) Correspondance (1521–1524): Tome I, Années 1521–1522 (Geneva: Droz, 1975), p. 172. Lacan made previous reference to the same report (remaining discreet as to whether it was delivered by Fain or Marty) in 'Fonction et champ de la parole et du langage en psychanalyse' (Écrits, p. 267) under the bivocal formula 'une telle subodoration de son sujet', which echoes the reflexivity of 'se flairer réciproquement' from the preceding sentence. A. Sheridan renders the formula with the equally bivocal 'such a sniffing of his subject' (Écrits, A Selection (London: Tavistock, 1977), p. 43), while B. Fink prefers the univocal 'being smelled by his subject' (Écrits in English (New York: Norton, 2006), p. 221). Note also a similar reciprocity implied in the later reference to the occurrence as an intersubodoration (Écrits, p. 337) and its description as a technical device (Écrits, p. 482, n.1: 'technique de subodoration'). For further allusions to the report, see Écrits, pp. 267, 464–6.

2 Lacan may be confusing Stendhal's De l'amour with Reinhold Günther's Kulturgeschichte der Liebe. Ein Versuch, Berlin: Duncker, 1900, which on pages 366–7 mentions the German and Swiss practices of Fensterin and z' Chilt gehen. The same observation had previously featured on page 191 of his Weib und sittlichkeit; studien und darlegungen, Berlin: Duncker, 1898.

3 Ruth Lebovici reports these two stages slightly differently (cf. Bulletin d'activités de l'Association des psychanalystes de Belgique, 25 (1956): 5). In the first stage, 'il dessine des femmes accroupies en train d'uriner ou bien il imagine qu'une femme le voit se masturber dans un urinoir, qu'elle est très excitée et qu'elle se donne à lui' ['he makes drawings of women urinating in a squatting position, or imagines to himself that a woman can see him masturbating into a urinal, that she becomes very aroused and offers herself to him.']. In the second stage, 'il se trouve dans un w.c. dont la cloison intermédiaire avec un autre est percée d'un trou ; il exhibe son sexe ; regarde uriner la femme qui se trouve à côté ; et souhaite embrasser ses organes génitaux' ['he finds himself in a toilet cubicle that is divided from another by a partition wall with a hole in it; he exposes his penis; watches the woman on the other side urinating; and wishes he could kiss her on the genitals'].

4 Lacan here inverts the attributes of the two women as reported in the case history (ibid.). The first, a fishmonger and a friend of his parents, is the woman the subject had seen urinating when he was a child and who features in the dream as the one with whom he wants to have sexual relations. The second, the fishmonger's maid, is the woman he had loved as a child, and the sight of whom in the dream stops him in his tracks. The subject adds that as a child he had been afraid of the maid's husband.

VI The Primacy of the Phallus and the Young Homosexual Woman

1 J. Strachey translates 'Das typische Mißlingen der kindlichen Sexualforschung' as 'Typical Failure of Infantile Sexual Researches' (PFL 7, p. 115).

2 Freud uses the French term demi-mondaine to describe the woman's love object.

3 J. Strachey chooses not to 'stereotype' Schwärmerei, instead rendering variously as 'devoted admiration', 'infatuation' and 'adoration'.

VII A Child is Being Beaten and the Young Homosexual Woman

1 A marginal note in the authorially annotated typescript here reads: 'Là non plus, L. ne voit pas le problème' (000007.14), and then a further note just below, indexed to 'un rapport duel, et donc ambigu', reads: 'L. ici n'a pas encore vu le problème, qu'il vera dans V' (000007.15). Referring to himself in the third person, these two notes anticipate Lacan's revised reading of the second stage of the beating fantasy in the lesson of 12 February 1958.

2 Another note in the authorially annotated typescript here reads: 'distinction qui n'est pas encore bien acquise. Sera dans [V]' (000007.18).

3 A further authorial apostil here reads: 'Ce n'est pas ainsi que F[reud]. nous présente la chose' (000007.27).

VIII Dora and the Young Homosexual Woman

1 A marginal note in the authorially annotated typescript here reads: 'C'est ici que surgit pour la 1ère fois le thème de la Verwerfung de la femme. Cf. V' (000008.27), this being an anticipation of the lesson of 23 April 1958.

2 This sentence is editorial, seemingly prompted by Lacan's manuscript note: 'ici, Jakobson' (000008.30). The example is borrowed from the fifth section of Roman Jakobson's 1956 essay, 'Two Aspects of Language and Two Types of Aphasic Disturbances': '[. . .] in War and Peace the synecdoches "hair on the upper lip" or "bare shoulders" are used [. . .] to stand for the female characters to whom these features belong' (in Fundamentals of Language, The Hague: Mouton, 1956, p. 78).

IX The Function of the Veil

1 Here, le sexe could also be understood as 'the sexual organ'.

2 Alternatively, toutes les tendances may be intended in the sense of 'all the drive tendencies'. Cf. endnote 2 to Chapter I, above.

X Identification with the Phallus

1 Here and throughout, the terms 'scoptophilia' and 'scoptophilic' have been retained over 'scopophilia' and 'scopophilic'. Though the former had even at the time been singled out as mistranslations of Freud's Schaulust (cf. Ernest Jones's 1936 'Review of the Dictionary of Psychology', in IJP 17: 247), such were the terms then being used by the authors Lacan is here critiquing and he respects their choice of vocabulary. See also J. Strachey's later remark in his 1963 'Obituary of Joan Riviere', IJP 44: 229.

2 Assuming the stenographer's typescript to be an accurate transcription, Lacan here misremembers the line from Wilhelm Meisters theatralische Sendung reproduced in Fenichel's article: 'Die beiden waren bei ihm geblieben, der Harfner, den er brauchte, und Mignon, den er nicht entbehren konnte' (Book 6, Chapter 5). Goethe is describing how both Mignon and the Harper have become indispensible for Wilhelm.

3 The 1921 edition of Massenpsychologie und Ich-Analyse has 'oder etwas später', and the 1925 edition has 'vielleicht sogar vorher'. Curiously, the wording in Samuel Jankélévitch's 1921 translation 'Psychologie collective et analyse du moi' (the erroneous 'ou un peu plus tard') finds a correlative formation in J. Strachey's 1922 translation 'Group Psychology and the Analysis of the Ego' (which gives, 'or a little later'), perhaps indicating that both translations were made from a same or similar fair copy that differed from the corrected proof used for the first print. The later translation by J. A. Underwood under the title 'Mass Psychology and Analysis of the "I"' is more dependable here (in Mass Psychology and Other Writings, Penguin, 2004).

4 A marginal note in the authorially annotated typescript here reads: 'non ! erreur lieé à la confusion I/II ? La I est orale – II est anale (Safouan)' (000010.20).

XI The Phallus and the Unfulfilled Mother

1 Reading renonciation and renoncer à for dénonciation and dénoncer (recorded at 000011.4). Cf. 'Situation de la psychanalyse et formation du psychanalyste en 1956', Écrits, pp. 460–1: 'Or on cherchait vainement dans toute l'œuvre de Freud, de ce terme [de frustration] la moindre trace : car on y trouvait seulement occasion à le rectifier par celui de Versagung, lequel implique renonciation [. . .].'

2 In the stenographer's paginated typescript, Je vous ai falls at the end of page 13, and page 14 begins relation primitive de la mère, &c. The discussion on anorexie mentale in the Seuil edition is thus an interpolation based apparently on the conjecture that this lacuna must correspond to an entire missing page. The interpolated material features in the present translation as the text leading up to '. . . primary relation with the mother . . .' in the following paragraph.

3 This sentence is unattested in the typescript. It may further be noted that Lacan's question to Lévi-Strauss bears on the latent structure of the communities, not on their manifest structure as patriarchies or matriarchies (cf. the comment on androcentric political power in matriarchal societies in the following paragraph). Compare also Lévi-Strauss's comment on adopting the 'opposite convention' and his allusion to 'a few societies of a highly developed matrilineal type' at the close of his 1956 article 'The Family' (originally written in English in H. L. Shapiro (ed.) Man, Culture, and Society, Oxford University Press; later revised in The View From Afar, Basic Books, 1985). Of further interest is the manuscript apostil at 000011.26: [Cf. Creswell], almost certainly a reference to Robert Cresswell's research on endogamy and kinship published in English and French in the 1970s.

4 Lacan's textual source is the Selected Papers of Karl Abraham published in English translation by Douglas Bryan and Alix Strachey in 1927 (Hogarth Press).

XII On the Oedipus Complex

1 This mention of a preceding lesson dedicated to the theme of castration invites the inference of an error in the manuscript dates appended to the stenographer's typescript, having led in turn to an inversion of the scripts for sessions 12 and 13. This inference is supported tentatively by the ensuing reminders of having dealt just previously with the retroactive constitution of stages and the introduction of the Oedipus complex (which seem to correspond to the discussion of regression and the preoedipal stage on pages 215–20), and more persuasively by the reminder of having in the previous lesson examined little Hans's anxiety and having dealt with 'material from the first few pages of the text' (the latter surely corresponding to the commentary on pages 214–15, then 217–20).

2 Freud's comment that 'the girl's Oedipus complex is much simpler than that of the small bearer of the penis' was in fact from the 1924 article 'The Dissolution of the Oedipus Complex', and was not repeated thereafter.

3 This allusion to Sachs's 1927 paper, delivered at the Innsbruck congress and published in 1929 as 'One of the Motive Factors in the Formation of the Super-Ego in Women', is unattested in the typescript.

4 In 1935 a first edition of Freud's case studies was published in French translation under the title Cinq psychanalyses. Alongside the case reports on Dora, the Rat Man and the Wolf Man, it includes the notes on Schreber and the observation on little Hans, but not the case of the Young Homosexual Woman. The collection has regularly been reprinted and re-edited, such that its title has become a major reference in French psychoanalysis. In his Seminar, Lacan mentions the book by name, which in the present translation is rendered by a paraphrase. Furthermore, in the authorially annotated typescript, 000012.13 is headed by the manuscript note: 'Imp[ortant] de souligner qu'ici, L. tient encore les Sém. –1 et –2 pour partie de son enseignement.' The seminar held in Lacan's rooms in 1951–1952 bore on the cases of Dora and the Rat Man; the seminar of 1952–1953 bore, as Lacan mentions above, in part on the Wolf Man case. These two seminars are not included in the canonical Books of the Seminar, which begin with the 1953–1954 Seminar at Sainte-Anne.

XIII On the Castration Complex

1 This is a far from satisfactory attempt to render: Au lieu de noyer le poisson, essayons au contraire de bien l'isoler. La privation, c'est la privation du poisson. The French idiom noyer le poisson, literally 'to drown the fish', means 'to muddy the waters' or 'to cloud the issue'.

XIV The Signifier in the Real

1 There is an omission here of the further possibility of '3 to 3', which in the Introduction to 'Le séminaire sur "La Lettre volée"' is also listed under α (La Psychanalyse 2:5; compare also page 48 of the revised article in the 1966 Écrits, where the Introduction is moved to the end of the text).

2 This reference to a painting by Titian is uncharacteristically vague and is unattested in the stenographer's typescript, thus doubtless deriving from the Lemoine notebooks. In the 'Note' on p. 427, Veronese's Venus and Mars United by Love is mooted as an alternative. Given that the horse on this canvas, standing behind the couple, not looming above, bears neither on its mouth nor elsewhere the blackness in question, Veronese's Venus and Mars with Cupid and a Horse in the Turin Sabauda is perhaps a more likely referent.

XV What Myth is For

1 In this context, tendanciel very probably carries the sense of 'drive tendency'. See again endnote 2 to Chapter 1, above.
2 The term 'mytheme' has here been inserted in deference to Lacan's retrospective manuscript note (at 000015.14). The original English-language version of Lévi-Strauss's 1955 article referenced in the following lesson, 'The Structural Study of Myth' (The Journal of American Folklore, 68(270): 428–44), did not carry the term. The first attested use of mythème is in the French edition of the text, which was not published until January 1958 (chapter 9 of L'anthropologie structurale, Paris: Plon). The second English-language version, in the 1963 Structural Anthropology (New York: Basic Books, pp. 206–31), accordingly carries the term. The mention of Polynices in the following paragraph is also an editorial interpolation, explicitly matching Lacan's development here to its source in the same article.
3 On this occasion Freud uses the term Exkretionskomplex, 'excretory complex'.
4 It is not clear what Lacan has in mind here. Wiwimacher belongs to Hans's idiolect, and while the child does sometimes use Wiwi in isolation to denote 'wee', not once does he incorporate it into other linguistic constructions. The more commonly heard infantile term in German is Pipi machen. Furthermore, the example of Uhrmacher ('watchmaker') is editorially interpolated.
5 In a parenthesis here in the stenographer's typescript (000015.32), there is a recurrence of the lines from Prévert's L'opéra des girafes previously quoted at the close of the eleventh lesson: Les grandes girafes sont muettes / Les petites girafes sont rares.
6 Hans qualifies the fantasy of the plumber sticking a borer into his stomach as something he imagined or recalled ('ich hab mir was gedacht'), not as a dream.

XVI How Myth is Analysed

1 This phrase alludes to a proverbial locution, 'Ah! Le bon billet qu'a La Châtre!' denoting an oath or pledge on which no reliance can be placed. According to the (almost certainly fictitious) account penned under the pseudonym 'Monsieur B*' (identified variously as Antoine Bret, Louis Damours and Claude-Prosper Jolyot de Crébillon), when the Marquis of La Châtre was ordered to return to his regiment, he made his lover, Ninon de Lenclos, sign a 'bond of constancy' pledging her fidelity to him. Two days later, she took another lover and, remembering the note in the throes of her seduction, uttered the now infamous line (*Mémoires sur la vie de Mademoiselle de Lenclos, par Mr. B, Corrected Edition, Part I, Amsterdam: François Joly, 1758, pp. 67–9). Voltaire, a former acquaintance of Ninon, gives a shorter account in his remarks on the Souvenirs de Madame de Caylus ('Le beau billet qu'a La Châtre!') and reworked the phrase into his 1739 comedy La Prude: 'Le bon Billet qu'a là l'ami Blanford!' (Act I, Scene 3). Lacan will use the phrase again the following year in Les Formations de l'inconscient.

2 The reference to Angelus Silesius in the Seuil edition supplies an ellipsis in the stenographer's typescript (at 000016.29). While there is indeed in the transcript of the 16 February 1955 a comment on the wordplay in the Cherubinischer Wandersmann on Ort and Wort, it is a little too brief to warrant being qualified as a 'development'. The couplet in question bears the title 'Der Ort ist das Wort' (22.205):

> Der Ort und's Wort ist Eins, und wäre nicht der Ort > (Bei ew'ger Ewigkeit!) es wäre nicht das Wort.

3 While Hans is clearly referring to a plumber's 'grips' or 'wrench', Lacan's more expansive discussion on the signification and etymology of the French pince and the German Zange in lesson XIX have led to 'pincers' being favoured for the present translation, as used previously by J. Strachey in his translation of the case.

XVII The Signifier and Der Witz

1 The barely disguised French word is con.

2 The maiden issue of La Psychanalyse, of which Lacan himself was editor-in-chief, bore on its cover a figure from a French translation of Horapollo's Hieroglyphica illustrating the (doubtfully sourced) lemma to be mentioned in the final lesson (p. 416): 'The image of an ear signifies work to come' (II, 23).

XVIII Circuits

1 The Seuil edition reproduces the hiatus in the stenographer's typescript (000018.02). Perhaps the missing content is something along the lines of 'in a good mood', as may be tentatively reconstructed on the basis of Freud's letter of 6 August 1899 to Wilhelm Fliess: 'on the next rainy day I shall tramp on foot to my beloved Salzberg, where I actually unearthed a few Egyptian antiquities last time. These things put me in a good mood and speak of distant times and countries' (The Complete Letters of Sigmund Freud to Wilhelm Fliess 1887–1904, translated by J. M. Masson, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1985, p. 366).
2 Lainz is a little under seven miles from Wien Mitte (formerly the Hauptzollamt station), while Vaucresson is some ten miles from central Paris.
3 Initially used in dialects in Western France before becoming more widespread in the early twentieth century, the informal term comprenoire and its sister term comprenette denote the faculty of understanding or mental grasp.

XIX Permutations

1 The phrase Bon Dieu, qu'il le lui foute is unattested in the stenographer's typescript.
2 As Hans's father reports it in the observation, they went directly to the grandmother's house on 29 March. The longer Sunday outing, taking in Schönbrunn on the way to the Lainz, occurred the week before, on Sunday the 22nd.
3 Dorothy Bussy translates this line from Si le grain ne meurt . . . as 'You owe it to yourself; you owe it to your son' (If it Die . . ., London: Secker & Warburg, 1950, p. 114).

XX Transformations

1 This 'fable' is extracted from the Codex Atlanticus, f. 393^{r-a} (formerly 145^{r-a}). Here on 22 May, and contemporaneously in the text 'L'instance de la lettre dans l'inconscient ou la raison depuis Freud' dated 14–26 May 1957, Lacan reproduces the Louise Servicen translation from Carnets de Léonard de Vinci, Tome II, Paris: Gallimard, p. 400. The English-language translation here is by R. C. Bell from The Notebooks of Leonardo Da Vinci; compiled and edited from the original manuscripts by Jean Paul Richter, Vol. II, Oxford University Press, enlarged and revised edition, 1939, p. 354. The original folio reads:

> De'fanciulli che stanno legati nelle fascie.
> O città marine, io vedo in uoi i uostri cittadini così femine come maschi strettamente dai forti legami colle braccia e ganbe esser legati da gente che non ītenderanno i uostri līguaggi, e sol ui potrete sfogare li vostri dolori e perduta libertà mediante i lagrimosi piāti e li sospiri e lamentatione infra uoi medesimi, chè chi vi lega, non v'intenderà, nè voi loro intenderete.

2 Kurt Goldstein coined the term Katastrophenreaktion in 1934 in Der Aufbau des Organismus: Einführung in die Biologie unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Erfahrungen am kranken Menschen, The Hague: Nijoff, which was translated (anonymously) as 'catastrophic reaction' in The Organism: A Holistic Approach to Biology Derived from Pathological Data in Man, New York: American Book Company, 1939. The French translation was published in 1951. Lacan will use the term again in Seminar VII and, more extensively, in Seminar X.

3 From Act 1, Scene 9. Louis Simpson's 1961 translation (The Breasts of Tiresias in M. B. Gale and J. F. Deeney (eds), The Routledge Drama Anthology and Sourcebook: From Modernism to Contemporary Performance (London: Routledge, 2010), p. 214, gives:

> They are just the same as we > Yet they're not men as you can see

Meanwhile, Maya Slater (The Mammaries of Tiresias in Three Pre-Surrealist Plays (Oxford University Press, 1997), p. 187) gives:

> Though physically she's just the same
> To call her man's not playing the game

XXI The Mother's Drawers and the Father's Shortcoming

1 The two variants: en-soi, that which exists in itself, and pour-soi, that which exists for itself, were popularised in Sartre's L'être et le néant.

2 The line:

לדוד אמר נבל בלבו אין אלהים

is from Psalms (13:1, and again 52:1) and not the Book of Ecclesiastes. Lemaistre de Sacy's Bible de Port-Royal, like the Authorised Version (where these psalms are numbered 14 and 53), translates the present tense אמר as a past tense verb.

3 While the verb form suppléer ('to make up for' or 'to stand in for') has already occurred extensively in the present Seminar, this is the first recorded use in Lacan's teaching of the nounal suppléance. The present translation follows R. Grigg in using 'suppletion' (The Seminar Book V, Formations of the Unconscious (Cambridge: Polity, 2017), pp. 6, 173, and 459, with a word of explanation from Grigg on p. 493).

4 Freud draws on Karl Abraham's 1909 book Traum und Mythus, Eine Studie zur Völkerpsychologie, Leipzig: F. Deuticke, which reproduces the hypothesis that Pramantha means 'forth-rubber', the bringing forth (Hervorreibende) by rubbing (Reiben). Abraham is apparently drawing in turn on Adalbert Kuhn's conjecture of an originary signification of 'Fire-driller' (in 'Die Sprachvergleichung und die Urgeschichte der indogermanischen Völker' in Zeitschrift für Vergleichende Sprachforschung 4 (1855): 124; and Die Herabkunft des Feuers und des Göttertranks, Berlin: Ferd, Dümmler, 1859, pp. 12–18). It was subsequently noted, however, that Kuhn was falsely conflating manth ('twirl' or 'drill') and math ('seize'), the latter being frequently compounded with pra to mean 'forcibly snatch to oneself'. Cf. Johanna Narten, 'Das vedische Verbum Math' in Indo-Iranian Journal 4(2/3) (1960): 121–35; seconded by Marcello Durante in Sulla preistoria della tradizione poetica greca. Parte seconda: risultanze della comparazione indoeuropea, Rome: Dell'Ateneo, 1976, p. 57, and Calvert Watkins in How to Kill a Dragon: Aspects of Indo-European Poetics, Oxford University Press: 1995, p. 256n.

XXII An Essay in Rubber-Sheet Logic

1 The annotated typescript here bears an asterisk linking to an apostil in Lacan's hand: 'l'ouvrage apocryphe Theologia Aristotelis n'est en fait que Proclus (et/ou Plotin ?) si je me souviens bien. Cf. Gilson'. The concluding note is surely a reference to Etienne Gilson's La philosophie au Moyen Age, Tome I: De Scot Érigène à S. Bonaventure, Paris: Payot, 1922, p. 98, 'Deux traités essentiellement néoplatoniciens, la Théologie d'Aristote et le Liber de Causis, passèrent pour des productions authentiques du maître et influencent profondément l'interprétation que l'on donne de sa pensée. Le contenu du premier est emprunté aux Ennéades de Plotin (livres IV-VI), et celui du second à l'Elementatio theologica de Proclus.'

2 From Act 1, Scene 7. Simpson (op. cit. p. 213) gives:

> I am a decent woman-mister
> My wife is a man-lady
> She's taken the piano the violin the butter dish
> She's a soldier minister mover of shit

And Slater (op. cit., p. 182) gives:

> I'm a respectable wife-monsieur
> My wife's a man-madame
> She's gone off with the piano the violin the butter-dish
> She's a soldier a minister a phy-shit-ian

3 Anthony Hatley, in his translation 'Booz Sleeping' (in The Penguin Book of French Verse, With Plain Prose Translation of Each Poem, Vol. 3, 1957, p. 69), gives, 'His sheaves of corn were not mean or hateful'. E. H. and A. M. Blackmore in their 'Boaz Asleep' in Selected Poems of Victor Hugo; A Bilingual Edition (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001), p. 337, lose the metaphor somewhat by giving, 'He harvested with neither greed nor spite'; so too does Brooks Haxton, in his translation 'Boaz Asleep' (in The American Scholar 70(4):66, reprinted in Victor Hugo; Selected Poems, Penguin, 2002), giving, 'He bound sheaves without the strain of hate / or envy'. Steven Monte, in his translation

'Boaz Asleep' (Victor Hugo, Selected Poetry (Routledge, 2002), p. 219), gives, 'His sheaves were neither miserly nor filled with bitterness'. John Richmond, in his translation 'Boaz Asleep' in My Proper Life – Poems 1975–2017 (Cottesloe, WA: Chalkface Press, 2017), gives, 'His sheaves contained no hate nor meanness in their yield.'

4 Hatley (ibid., p. 71) gives, 'Booz saw an oak, which, issuing from his stomach, went up to the blue sky; a people ascended it like a long chain; a king was singing at the bottom, a god dying at the top.' The Blackmores (ibid., p. 339) have, 'Boaz saw an oak tree grow / Out of his loins, and reach up to the sky, / Where a long chain of people climbed; below / A king sang, and a god was slain on high.' Haxton (ibid., p. 67) gives, 'he saw a live oak grow out of his belly / far up into the blue; and many people / climbed it in a long chain, while a king sat / singing at the root, and a god died at the crown.' Monte (ibid., p. 221) gives, 'Boaz saw an oak tree grow out of / The middle of his stomach and ascend into the blue. / A nation climbed upward like the links of a chain: / A king sung at the bottom and a God died above.' Richmond (ibid.) gives, 'out of his belly, like a sprouting rod, / An oak tree rose into the sky. A chosen race, / Links in a long chain, scaled its height; down at its base / A king sang; at its top, men put to death their god.'

5 Hatley (ibid., p. 72) gives, 'While he slept, Ruth, a Moabite, had lain down at the feet of Booz, with naked breast, hoping we know not what unknown gleam, when the sudden light of awakening shone.' The Blackmores (ibid., p. 341) give, 'While he was sleeping, Ruth, a Moabite, / Came to his feet and, with her breast bared, lay / Hoping for some unknown uncertain ray / When, suddenly, they would waken into light'. Haxton (ibid. p. 68) has 'Ruth, a Moabite, had come while Boaz slept, / and now lay at his feet, who knows what light / from what door in the heavens finding her breast / naked, tender to its stirring as his dreams.' Monte (ibid., p. 221) gives, 'While he was sleeping there, Ruth, a Moabite, / Lay down with her breasts bared at Boaz's feet, / Hoping for some sort of unfamiliar ray / In which understanding would flare up like a light.' Richmond (ibid.) gives, 'In his oblivion, came Ruth, a Moabite, / And lay down at the old man's feet. Her breasts were bare. / She hoped we know not what chance ray might touch her there / When he should start awake, his eyes renewed with light.'

6 Hatley (ibid., p. 73) gives, 'what God, what harvester of the eternal summer, had negligently thrown down this golden sickle in the field of stars.' Haxton has (ibid. p. 68) 'what god / of the eternal summer passing dropped / his golden scythe there in that field of stars.' The Blackmores (ibid., p. 343) give, 'what stray god, as he cropped / The timeless summer, had so idly dropped / That golden sickle in the starry field.' Monte (ibid., p. 223) gives, 'what reaper of eternity – what kind / Of God – had, leaving us, carelessly tossed behind / This golden sickle in the dark field of the stars.' Richmond (ibid.) gives, 'once eternal summer's crop was mown, / What god, what harvester so carelessly had thrown / His golden sickle on that field of stars, and gone?'

XXIII 'Me donnera sans femme une progéniture'

1 The Seuil edition modifies the passage in the typescript reading, 'nous nous permettons de parler de la fonction hypnopompique et hypnagogique' (000023.07), to 'nous nous permettons de parler de fonction métaphorique et de fonction métonymique' (p. 392). In a 1911 footnote to the Traumdeutung, and in some contributions thereafter, Freud mentions Herbert Silberer's 1909 study devoted in part to hypnagogic phenomena, 'Bericht über eine Methode gewisse symbolische Halluzinations-Erscheinungen hervorzurufen und zu beodachten' in Jahrbuch für psychoanalytische und psychopathologische Forschungen, 1(2): 513–25 (translated in 1951 as 'Report on a method of eliciting and observing certain symbolic hallucination-phenomena' in Rapaport, D. (ed.) Organization and Pathology of Thought: Selected Sources, New York: Columbia University Press, 1951 pp. 195–207). Lacan will cite this reference two years after the present Seminar in 'Sur la théorie du symbolisme d'Ernest Jones', and then in 1966 in 'D'un syllabaire après coup'.

2 An authorial annotation inserts [Lévi-Strauss?] to supply the stenographer's ellipsis (000022.23), footnoted in turn to expand on the uncertainty denoted by the question mark: 'Totémisme d'aujourd'hui, ou Kroeber ? – Je doute'. Lévi-Strauss's book was not published until 1962 (Paris: PUF), and in its Introduction the author claims it was begun just two years previously, thus three years after the present lesson. Alfred L. Kroeber's text, 'Totem and Taboo: An Ethnologic Psychoanalysis' was published in 1920 (in American Anthropologist 22(1): 48–55), and its sequel, 'Totem and Taboo in Retrospect', in 1939 (American Journal of Sociology 45: 446–51; both were reprinted in his collected papers, The Nature of Culture, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1952, pp. 301–5, pp. 306–9). Lacan will mention Kroeber's work in his 'Proposition du 9 octobre 1967 sur le psychanalyste de l'École' and again in Seminars XVI and XVII. The Seuil edition, here respected, circumvents the doubt by interpolating 'l'anthropologie structurale' (p. 399).

3 The nonce word historiole is a French calque for the Latin historiola, especially as used by Spinoza in his expression 'historiola mentis' in the 10 June 1666 letter to Johannes Bouwmeester (Ep. XXXVII).

4 Further to its primary signification of 'transport' or 'traffic', Verkehr can mean 'contact' or 'dealings' and also 'sexual intercourse' or 'coitus'.

5 Lacan's retrospective manuscript apostil at 000023.35, 'La donna è mobile', suggests that mobile might also be understood with its Italian overtones of 'fickle' or 'flighty'.

6 Again from Act 1, Scene 9. Simpson (op. cit. p. 214) gives:

> Return this night to see how nature can > Provide me with progeny without a woman.

And Slater (op. cit., p. 187) gives:

> I will have offspring though I have no wife
> To see how it is done come back to me tonight.

XXIV From Hans-the-Fetish to Leonardo-in-the-Mirror

1 The stenographer's typescript (000024.13) has . . . comme je vous l'ai dit, non pas fille d'une mère, mais fille de deux mères, but there is little in the material thus far developed to anticipate such an attribution of daughterly positioning to little Hans, nor is the point here amplified. While the text should most likely read either fils de deux mères, or phi de deux mères, the phrase is merely bracketed out in the authorially annotated typescript, not emended.

2 J. Strachey's 'editor's note' to Alan Tyson's translation for the Standard Edition claims the first scholar to notice the error was Irma A. Richter, in a footnote to her Selections from her father's editions of Leonardo's Notebooks (Galaxy, 1952, p. 286). An earlier example however is the 1923 article cited by Schapiro: Eric Maclagen, 'Leonardo in the Consulting Room', Burlington Magazine, 42: 54–57; see also the 1948 article by Raymond Stites, 'A Criticism of Freud's Leonardo', College Art Journal 7(4):257–67. The text from the Codex Atlanticus f. 186^{v-b} (formerly 66^{v-b}) reads:

> questo scriuersi distintamẽte del nibbio par che sia moi destino, perchè nella prima ricordatione della mia infantia e' mi parea che, essendo lo in culla, che vn nibbio venisse a me e mi aprisse la bocca colla sua coda, e molte volte mi percuotesse co tal coda dentro alle labra.

3 Lacan may be drawing, here and in the following paragraph, on Ludwig Keimer's critical note of 1927 in The American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures 43(3): 226–31.

4 From the Institut de France Notebook (MS 2180), f. $I.^1 18^{r-a}$: 'La natura è piena d'infinite ragioni che nō furō mai in isperiẽtia'. The present translation again reproduces R. C. Bell's rendering.

5 There is a blending here of Vasari's account (in Le Vite) of Leonardo's commission for the Annunziata, with Novellara's account in his letter. For a more involved enquiry, see Virginia Budny's 1983 article, 'The Sequence of Leonardo's Sketches for The Virgin and Child with Saint Anne and Saint John the Baptist', The Art Bulletin 65(1): 34–50; though some details have since been challenged by more recent findings (briskly summarised in Chapter 21 of Walter Isaacson's Leonardo da Vinci, New York, Simon & Schuster, 2017, pp. 315–24). Lacan is almost certainly reading out the passage from Novellara's letter as reproduced in the Schapiro article (pp. 168–9), which is also the source of the mentions below of both Kris and the indulgences. The letter was first published in A. Luzio, I precettori di Isabella d'Este: appunti e documenti, Ancona: Morelli, 1887, p. 32, note 1. Schapiro quotes the John Shapley rendering in the latter's 1925 article, 'A Lost Cartoon for Leonardo's Madonna with St. Anne' The Art Bulletin, 7(3): 96–102, where the original is printed in full on p. 98, note 3. For an alternative Englishing, cf. D. S. Chambers, Patrons and Artists in the Italian Renaissance, London: Palgrave Macmillan, 1970, pp. 145–6.

Translator's Preface

Throughout this Seminar, the French terms 'trait d'esprit', its synonym 'mot d'esprit' and the less common 'esprit' have most often been translated as witticism, occasionally as wit or joke. As Lacan mentions (p. 13), trait d'esprit is his preferred translation for Freud's 'Witz', though he doesn't follow this practice consistently and often uses the more common expression 'mot d'esprit', which is how 'Witz' in Freud's Der Witz und seine Beziehung zum Unbewussten (Jokes and Their Relation to the Unconscious) has been rendered in the two major French translations.

It is true that 'witticism' is not in widespread use in English and carries the connotation of refined and intellectual forms of humour, as James Strachey noted in his preface to Jokes and Their Relation to the Unconscious, published in The Standard Edition of the Complete Works of Sigmund Freud. However, not only is 'joke' closer to the French terms 'blague' and 'histoire drôle', but it is also true that, in this Seminar in which Lacan emphasizes connotations of the finesse of language, the choice of the word 'witticism' is not out of place. I have very occasionally translated 'trait d'esprit' and 'mot d'esprit' as joke, when it has been clear that a joke is what Lacan has in mind.

Many of the choices I have made for the translation of crucial terms of Lacan's are discussed in the translator's endnotes as they arise.

The numbers in the margins of this translation refer to the pagination of the French edition published by Éditions du Seuil in 1998.

I owe thanks to the following people: Yael Baldwin, for her valuable comments on the entire translation; Bruce Fink, whose thoughts on ways to render Lacan into good English have always been greatly appreciated; Adrian Price, who sent me detailed comments on parts of the translation; and Geoffrey Young, who generously sent me his own translation of this Seminar when he heard that I was working on the authorized version.

I do not doubt that the translation could still be improved and I invite anyone who has suggestions or corrections to write to me directly or contact me via the publisher.

What can only be seen by looking away

This year I have taken 'formations of the unconscious' as my topic.

Those of you, and I think this includes most of you, who were at our scientific meeting last night are already up to date and aware that the questions I raise here concern – directly, this time – the function in the unconscious of what in previous years I have been developing as the signifier.

Some of you – I express myself like this because my ambitions are modest – have, I hope, read the article entitled 'L'instance de la lettre dans l'inconscient' ['The Instance of the Letter in the Unconscious'] that I published in the third issue of the journal La psychanalyse. Those who had the stamina for it will be well prepared, or better prepared than the others, to follow the discussion. Moreover, my hope, a modest one, or so it seems to me, is that you who make the effort to listen to what I have to say also make the effort to read what I write, since in the end it's for you that I write it. Those of you who have not done so would therefore do well to read it, especially as I will be referring to it constantly. I am obliged to assume you are familiar with what has already been said.

In thinking about those of you who have come unprepared in any of these ways, I am going to tell you what I will limit myself to today and what the object of this introductory lesson to our topic will be.

In the first instance, I will necessarily briefly and allusively, because I cannot go back to square one, recall several major [ponctuant] points from previous years that initiated and foreshadowed what I have to tell you about the function of signifiers in the unconscious.

10 Then, as a pause for those whose minds may be left a little out of breath by this brief reminder, I will explain to you what the schema I will be referring to over the course of our theoretical experience this year means.

And then I will finish with an example. It's the first example that Freud employs in his book on witticisms. I am not doing this as an illustration, but because a witticism is always particular – there is no such thing as a witticism in the abstract. I will make a start at showing, in this respect, how witticisms happen to be the best point of entry into our topic, that of formations of the unconscious. This is not only the best point of entry but also the most striking form in which Freud himself indicates the unconscious's relations with signifiers and their techniques.

These, then, are my three parts. You know, then, what to expect from what I am going to explain to you, and this should also spare you some mental effort.

The first year of my Seminar, devoted to Freud's writings on technique, essentially consisted in introducing you to the notion of the function of the symbolic as alone capable of explaining what can be called the determination as to meaning insofar as it relates to the fundamental reality of Freudian experience.

Since 'determination as to meaning' is on this occasion nothing but a definition of reason, let me remind you that this reason is to be found at the very origins of the possibility of analysis. It's because something has become tied to something like speech that discourse can untie the knot.

I pointed out to you in this respect the distance separating speech, insofar as it's filled by a subject's being, from the empty discourse that drones away over the actions of humans. These actions are rendered impenetrable by the imagining of motives that are irrational, inasmuch as they are only rationalized from the ego's perspective of misrecognition. As I also taught you in that first year, the ego is itself a function of the symbolic relation and is apt to be affected by it in its density and functions of synthesis – all also made from a mirage, but a captivating mirage. This is only possible because of the gap opened up in human beings by the original, biological pres-11 ence of death in them, owing to what I have called the prematurity of birth. This is the point where the symbolic intrudes.

That was where we had come to at the juncture of my first and second Seminars.

The second Seminar highlighted the factor of repetitive insistence arising from the unconscious. I identified its consistence with the structure of the signifying chain, and this is what I tried to get you to see by giving you a model of it in the form of the so-called syntax of α, β, γ, δ.

You now have a written exposition of this in my article, 'The Purloined Letter', which gives a brief summary of this syntax. Despite the criticisms it has received, some of which were justified – there are two minor mistakes that should be corrected in a future edition – you should still manage to find it useful for a long while to come. I am even convinced that it will change with age, and that you will find it less difficult to refer to in several months' time, or even by the end of the year. I say this in answer to the laudable efforts that have been made by certain people seeking to limit its significance. It was in any case an opportunity for them to put themselves to the test, and this is precisely all I look for. Whatever dead-end they might have found in it, these gymnastics have nevertheless been useful to them. They will have the opportunity for more gymnastics in what I will have occasion to show them this year.

Of course, as the people who have made this effort stressed to me, even in writing, each of these four terms is marked by a fundamental ambiguity. But that is precisely what makes it a valuable example. With these groupings we have set off down the path of what forms current speculation on groups and sets. These researches are founded on the principle that one starts with complex structures, simple structures merely presenting themselves as special cases. I won't go back over how these little letters are created but it's clear that, following operations by means of which we can define them, we end up with something extremely simple. Each of them is effectively defined on the basis of the relations between two terms in [one of] two pairs of terms, the pair including [configurations] that go from symmetrical to dissymmetrical and from dissymmetrical to symmetrical [see Écrits, pp. 47–50], and then the pair that goes from same to different and from different to same. We have here, then, a group of four signifiers [α, β, γ, δ] with the property that each of them can be analysed in terms of its relations with the other three. To confirm this analysis, incidentally, I would add that according to Roman Jakobson, in his own words which I heard from him when I met him recently, four is the minimum number of signifiers necessary for the primary, elementary conditions of linguistic analysis. Now, as you will see, the latter has the closest of relationships to analysis as such. They are indistinguishable, even. If we look closely, they are essentially no different from one another. 12

In the third year of my Seminar, I spoke about psychosis insofar as it's founded on a primordial deficiency of a signifier. I showed what sort of subduction of the real arises when, induced by vital invocation, the real comes to take its place within this deficiency of a signifier, which we were speaking about last night in terms of Verwerfung and that, I agree, is not free of difficulties – which is why we will have to return to it this year. I nevertheless believe that the Seminar on psychosis made it possible for you to understand, if not the ultimate mainspring, at least the essential mechanism by which the Other, the big Other, the Other as the seat of speech, is reduced to the imaginary other. It involves the suppletion of the symbolic by the imaginary.

As a consequence, you grasped how it is that we are able to conceptualize the effect of total foreignness of the real produced at moments of rupture in the psychotic's delusional dialogue, which is his sole means of maintaining within himself what I will call a certain kind of intransitivity of the subject. It seems quite natural to us. 'I am thinking, therefore I am', as we say, intransitively. For sure, this is where the difficulty lies for the psychotic, precisely because of the reduction of the duality of the Other with a big O and the other with a little o, the Other as the seat of speech and guarantor of truth, and the dual other, the one whom the subject finds himself faced with as his own image. The disappearance of this double aspect is precisely what makes it so difficult for the psychotic to maintain himself in the human real, that is to say, in the symbolic real.

Over the course of that third year, dealing with the dimension of what I call dialogue, insofar as it makes it possible for a subject to sustain himself, I illustrated it with no more, no less than an example from the first scene of Racine's Athaliah. This is a Seminar that I would have quite liked to return to and write up, had I had the time.

Nevertheless, I think that you won't have forgotten the extraordinary first dialogue of the play, where one sees this Abner come forward, prototype of the false friend and double agent, coming to test the water right from the word go. His 'Yes, I come into his temple to adore the Eternal Lord' [Act 1, Scene 1] initially sounds like some sort of attempt at seduction. The way in which we crowned this play has no doubt made us forget all these resonances 13 somewhat, but do admire how extraordinary it is. I stressed how, for his part, the High Priest put in a few essential signifiers – 'And God found faithful in all his threats', or, again, 'Why do you renounce the promises of heaven?' The term 'heaven', and also several other well-chosen words, are nothing but pure signifiers. I stressed their total emptiness. Jehoiada skewers, as it were, his opponent to the point of henceforth transforming him into this pathetic earthworm who, as I said, re-enters the ranks of the procession and serves as the bait for Athaliah, who ends up falling for this little game.

The signifier's relation to the signified, so palpable in this dramatic dialogue, led me to refer to Ferdinand de Saussure's famous schema in which you see the double parallel flow of signifiers and signifieds, distinct and destined to perpetually slide over one another. It was in reference to this that I fabricated the image, borrowed from the upholsterer's craft, of the quilting point. There does have to be some point, effectively, at which the fabric of one becomes attached to the fabric of the other, so that we know where we stand, at least with respect to the possible limits of the sliding. There are quilting points, then, but they leave some elasticity in the links between the two terms.

We will pick things up from here this year, once I have told you where the dialogue between Jehoiada and Abner, in parallel and symmetrically with this, ends up – namely, with the fact that the only real subject that stands up is the subject who speaks in the name of speech. You won't have forgotten the plane on which Jehoiada speaks – 'Hear how this God replies to you through my mouth.' There is no subject except in reference to this Other. This is symbolic of what exists in all valid speech.

Similarly, in the fourth year of my Seminar, I wanted to show you that the only object is a metonymic object, the object of desire being the object of the Other's desire, and desire always being desire for some Other thing, very precisely for what is lacking, a, the primordially lost object, insofar as Freud shows it to us as always having to be refound. Similarly, the only meaning is metaphorical meaning, meaning emerging only from the substitution of one signifier for another in the symbolic chain.

This is connoted in the work I was talking about before, which I invited you to read, 'The Instance of the Letter in the Unconscious'. The following symbols are those for metonymy and metaphor, respectively.

$$f(\mathrm{S} \ldots \mathrm{S}')\,\mathrm{S}'' \cong \mathrm{S}\,(-)\,s$$

In the first formula, S is linked to S′ in the chain's combination, both of them in relation to S″, the result of which is to put S in a certain metonymic relationship with s at the level of signification. 14

Similarly, the substitution of S′ for S in relation to S″ results in the relationship S(+)s, which here indicates – this is easier to say than in the case of metonymy – the emergence or creation of meaning.

This, then, is where we are. We are now going to start on what will be the object of our research this year.

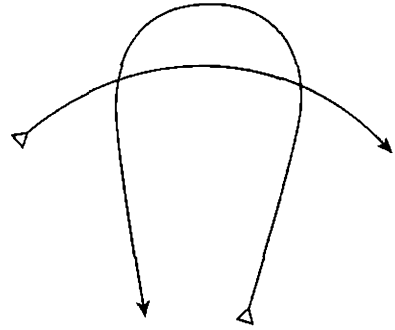
I have constructed a schema for investigating this object and I am now going to tell you what, at least for today, it can be used to connote.

If we have to find a way to examine the signifying chain's relations with the signified chain, it would be by means of the crude image of the quilting point.

For it to be valid, you would still have to ask where the upholsterer is. He is obviously somewhere, but the place where we could put him in the schema would, nevertheless, be far too simplistic.



Since, between the signifying chain and the flow of the signified, there is, as it were, a reciprocal sliding, which is what is essential in their relationship, and since, despite this sliding, there is a liaison or coherence between these two currents, and we have to grasp where it appears, it may occur to us that this sliding, if sliding there be, is necessarily a relative sliding. Displacement in one produces displacement in the other. Thus, it must be through something like the 15 intersecting of the two lines in opposite directions, in a sort of ideal present, that we will find an exemplary schema.

This, then, is what we might focus our speculations on.

All the same, whatever importance this notion of the present must possess for us, a discourse is not a punctiform event, à la Russell, if I can put it like that. A discourse not only has a substance, a texture, but it takes time, it has a dimension in time, a thickness. We absolutely cannot be satisfied with an instantaneous present, our entire experience runs counter to it, as does everything that we have said. We can present this immediately through the experience of speech. For instance, if I begin a sentence, you will not understand its meaning until I have got to the end. It's completely necessary – this is the definition of a sentence – that I say the final word for you to understand what the first was about. This provides us with the most tangible example of what can be called the nachträglich action of a signifier. This is precisely what I am constantly showing you in the text of analytic experience itself, on an infinitely grander scale, when we are dealing with the history of the past.

Moreover, one thing is clear – this is one way of putting it – which I stress in a precise manner in 'The Instance of the Letter in the Unconscious'. I ask you to refer to it provisionally. I expressed it in the form of a topological metaphor, if I can put it like that. It's impossible to represent the signifier, the signified and the subject on the same plane. This is neither mysterious nor opaque. It's demonstrable in a very simple way in the text with respect to the Cartesian cogito. I will refrain from returning to it now because we will come across it in a different form.

The aim of this reminder is simply to justify the two lines that we are now going to work with.

The little stopper stands for the beginning of the trajectory, and the tip of the arrow is its end. You will recognize my first line here, which the other hooks onto once it has crossed it twice.

Note that you cannot confuse what these two lines previously represented [in Saussure's diagram] – namely the signifier and the signified – with what they represent here, which is slightly different, for now we are going to place ourselves entirely at the level of the signifier. The effects on the signified are elsewhere; they are not directly represented. In this schema, we see the two states or functions that we can apprehend in a sequence of signifiers.

The first line [which goes from left to right] represents the signifying chain insofar as it remains completely permeable to the properly signifying effects of metaphor and metonymy, which 16 implies the possible actualization of signifying effects at all levels, and down to the phonemic level in particular. The phonological element is in effect what puns, word plays and so on are based on. In short, it's the signifying material we analysts constantly have to play with. Apart from those of you who have come here for the first time, you will have some idea of this, and this is why today we will start exploring the subject of the unconscious by way of wit, Witz.

The other line [from right to left] is the line of rational discourse, into which a number of reference points or fixed things are already integrated. These things can only be properly grasped in this case at the level of the usage of signifiers, that is, at the level of what concretely, in the use of discourse, constitutes fixed points. As you know, they are a long way from corresponding univocally to a thing. No one single semanteme corresponds to one single thing. Most of the time, a semanteme corresponds to a wide variety of things. We are pausing here at the level of the semanteme, that is, at what is fixed and defined by usage.

This, then, is the line of common, everyday discourse, such as is admitted into the code of the discourse that I will call the discourse of reality we all share. This is also the level at which the fewest meanings are created, since meaning is already there and in some way already given. Most of the time this discourse only consists of a subtle mixture of received ideas. It's precisely at this level that the famous empty discourse is produced, which is what a number of my remarks on the function of speech and the field of language were based on.

As you can plainly see, this line is the individual subject's concrete discourse, the discourse of the person who speaks and makes 17 himself understood. It's discourse that can be recorded on a disk, whereas the former [line] is everything that this includes by way of possibilities of decomposition, reinterpretation, resonance, and metaphorical and metonymic effects. They go in opposite directions, for the simple reason that they slide over one another. But one intersects the other. And they intersect at two perfectly recognizable points.

If we start with discourse, the first point at which it meets the properly signifying chain is what I have just been explaining to you from the point of view of the signifier, namely the bundle of usages. I will call this the code, at a point here marked α.

The code really has to be somewhere here if the discourse is to be capable of being heard. This code is very obviously located in the big Other, that is, in the Other insofar as it's the companion of language. It's absolutely necessary that this big Other exist, and, I beg you to take note of this, there is absolutely no need to call it by the idiotic and delusional name 'collective consciousness'. An Other is an Other. One is enough for a language to be a living language – so much so that this Other is able to constitute the first moment all on its own. The fact that there is one person who remains and is able to speak his own language to himself is enough for there to be he himself plus not only one Other but even two, in any case someone who understands him. One can still make word plays in a language of which one is the sole possessor.

That, then, is the initial encounter, which occurs at the level of what I am calling the code. The second intersection, which closes the circle and constitutes meaning properly so-called, and constitutes it on the basis of the code that it initially encountered, occurs at this endpoint labelled γ. As you can see, two arrows terminate there, and I will dispense with telling you today what the second one is. The result of the conjunction of discourse with the signifier as the medium that creates meaning is the message.

Meaning comes into being in the message. The truth that is there to be announced, if truth there be, is here. Most of the time no truth is announced, for the simple reason that most often discourse absolutely does not go via the signifying chain and is the pure and simple purring of repetition, idle chatter, short-circuiting between β and β′. The discourse says absolutely nothing, apart from indicating to you that I am a speaking animal. This is everyday discourse, words put together for the purpose of saying nothing, owing to which you reassure yourself that you are not simply dealing, opposite you, with what man is in his natural state, namely a ferocious beast.

The two points – the minimum nodal points for the short-circuit of discourse – are easily recognizable. There is, on the one hand, at 18 β′, the object in the sense of the metonymic object I spoke to you about last year. There is, on the other hand, at β, the I insofar as it indicates the place in discourse itself of the one who is speaking.

In this schema it's possible to put our finger, in a tangible way, on what binds and what distinguishes statement [énoncé] and utterance [énonciation]. This is a truth that is perfectly and immediately accessible to linguistic experience, but which in Freudian experience coincides with the distinction that exists, at least in principle, between the I that is nothing other than the place of him who is speaking in the discourse chain, which moreover doesn't even need to be designated by an I, and, on the other hand, the message, which, to exist, requires the apparatus of this schema as an absolute minimum. It's totally impossible to bring out a message or a statement of any kind whatsoever, in a radiating and concentric manner, on the basis of any subject, without this entire complexity – and this is for the good reason that speech specifically presupposes the existence of a signifying chain.

Its genesis is far from simple to obtain – we spent a year getting there. It presumes the existence of a network of uses, in other words, of usage for a given language. It presumes as well an entire mechanism that makes it the case that – whatever you say in thinking about it, or in not thinking about it, whatever you formulate – once you have mounted the treadmill of idle chatter, your discourse always says more than what you are saying.

Moreover, solely by virtue of the fact that it's speech, discourse is founded on the existence somewhere of this reference point that is the plane of truth – of truth as distinct from reality, which brings into play the possible emergence of new meanings introduced into the world or reality. These are not meanings that are already there, but meanings that are brought about by speech and that speech literally brings into the world.

Here you have, radiating out from the message on the one hand and from the I on the other, these little fins which indicate two divergent directions. From the I, one goes towards the metonymic object and the second towards the Other. Symmetrically, following the return path of discourse, the message goes towards the metonymic object and towards the Other. This is all provisional, I ask you to take note, but you will see that these two lines that may look like they are self-evident, the one that goes from the I towards the Other, and the one that goes from the I towards the metonymic object, will be very useful to us.

You will also see what the other two lines, which are incredibly fascinating, correspond to, those that go from the message towards the code and from the code towards the message. Effectively, the 19 return line exists and, if it did not exist, there would not be the slightest hope of creating meaning, as the schema shows you. The essential dimension that witticisms [trait d'esprit] bring us right into is at work specifically in the interplay between message and code, thus also in the return from the code to the message.

We will stay at this point for a number of seminars so that we can see everything that is extraordinarily suggestive and indicative that may occur there.

This will also give us a further opportunity to grasp how the metonymic object, this famous object that we started looking at last year, this object that is never there, that is always situated elsewhere, that is always something else, is in a relationship of dependence.

Let's now turn to the Witz.

'Witz' has been translated into French as trait d'esprit. 'Mot d'esprit' has also been used. I'll spare you the reasons why I prefer the former translation. But 'Witz' also means esprit. The term is therefore immediately presented to us with an extreme ambiguity.

Traits d'esprit, witticisms, are sometimes an object of disparagement – they are light, not serious, fanciful and capricious. What about esprit? Here, on the other hand, one pauses and thinks twice before speaking of it in the same way.

It's fitting that all these ambiguities should be left open to 'esprit', including even 'esprit' in the broad sense, as in the esprit that obviously serves all too often as an ensign for doubtful merchandise, the esprit of spiritualism. But the notion of esprit nonetheless has a centre of gravity, which for us resides in esprit in the sense in which one speaks of an homme spirituel, a witty man, and does so even if he does not have a terribly good reputation. We centre esprit on the trait d'esprit, that is, on what in it seems the most contingent, the most outdated and the most open to criticism. It's indeed part of the genius of psychoanalysis to do things like that, and this is why we should not be astonished that the one point in Freud's work where he mentions what is elsewhere honoured with a capital letter, namely, Esprit, is in his work on Witz. There is, nonetheless, a relationship between the two poles of the term, which has always been a source of disagreement.

It would be amusing to evoke the English tradition with you. 'Wit' is even more clearly ambiguous than 'Witz', and even more than 'esprit' in French. Discussions have flourished on true, authentic wit – in a word, good wit – and also on bad wit, that is, the wit with which charlatans entertain their audience. How are they to be distinguished? We would have to refer to the difficulties that critics have got themselves into. After the eighteenth century with Addison, Pope, and so on, this discussion continues into the early nineteenth century with the English Romantic school, where the question of wit could not fail to be put on the agenda. Hazlitt's writings are very significant in this regard. It was Coleridge, whom we will have occasion to discuss, who went the furthest in this direction. 20

Equally, I could speak of the German tradition. In particular the promotion of esprit to the highest plane of literary Christianity followed a strictly parallel evolution in Germany. The question of Witz is there at the heart of all Romantic speculation, which will hold our interest as much from a historical point of view as from that of the situation of analysis.

What is altogether striking is that there is nothing in France that corresponds to this interest by critics in the question of Witz or wit.* The only people who have taken any serious interest in the matter are poets. In the nineteenth century, not only is the question a live one for them, but it's at the heart of the work of Baudelaire and Mallarmé. Elsewhere, it has only ever been present, even in essays, from the standpoint of criticism, I mean from the standpoint of an intellectual formulation of the problem.

I leave to one side the main tradition, the Spanish one, because it's too important for us not to have to return to it frequently later on.

The decisive point is this – whatever you read on the problem of Witz or wit,* the fact is that you will always arrive at tangible impasses, which only time prevents me from developing today. I'll come back to this. I will omit this part of my talk, but later I will prove to you what a leap, what a sharp rupture, what a difference in quality and results, characterize Freud's work.

Freud did not carry out the enquiry I have just been alluding to on the European tradition of Witz. He tells us what his sources are, and they are clear – there are three very sensible, very readable books by good German professors from minor universities who had the time to reflect peacefully and who wrote these things that were not at all pedantic. They are Kruno Fischer, Theodor Vischer and Theodor Lipps, a Munich professor whose work is the best of 21 the three, and who goes quite far, to the point of lending a hand to Freud's research. Simply put, if Herr Lipps had not been so worried about the respectability of Witz, if he hadn't wanted there to be false wit and true wit, he would certainly have gone a lot further. This, on the contrary, was never something that held Freud back. He had already formed the habit of compromising himself, and this is why he was able to see much more clearly. It's also because he saw the structural relations that exist between Witz and the unconscious.

On what plane did he see them? Uniquely on a plane that can be called formal. I mean 'formal', not in the sense of pretty forms, curves and everything with which people try to drown you in the blackest obscurantism, but in the sense in which one speaks of form in literary theory, for example. There is effectively yet another tradition that I have not spoken to you about, but this is also because I will have to come back to it often, a recent tradition, which is the Czech tradition. Your ignorance leads you to think that the reference to formalism has a vague meaning. Not at all. 'Formalism' has an extremely precise meaning – it's a school of literary criticism, which the state apparatus located in the land of the Sputnik has been persecuting for some time now. Be that as it may, Freud places himself at the level of this formalism, that is, of a structural theory of the signifier as such, and the result is not in doubt – it's even thoroughly convincing. This is a key that makes it possible to go much further.

Having asked you to read my articles from time to time, I do not really need to ask you to read Freud's book, Der Witz und seine Beziehung zum Unbewussten. Since I am talking about Witz this year, this seems to me to be the least one can do. You will see that the economy of this book is founded on the fact that Freud starts with the technique of witticisms, and constantly returns to it. What does this mean for him? It's a matter of a 'verbal technique', as they say. I say, more precisely, a 'technique of the signifier'.

Because Freud begins with the technique of the signifier, and because he constantly returns to it, he really does unpack the problem. He brings out distinct levels, and we suddenly see, with the greatest clarity, what you have to know how to distinguish if you are to avoid getting lost in perpetual confusions over the signified, in thoughts that you are unable to extract yourself from. You will see, for example, that there is the problem of witticisms and the problem of the comic, and these are not at all the same thing. Similarly, the problem of the comic and the problem of laughter, even though these sometimes go together, and even though all three get confused, are not at all the same problem.

In short, to clarify the problem of wit, Freud starts with signifying technique, and we too will start from there along with him. 22

What is curious is that this takes place at a level about which absolutely nothing indicates that it's at the level of the unconscious. But, for deep reasons which have to do with the very nature of what is at issue in Witz, it's precisely by looking there that we will see most clearly what is not completely there but is off to the side – namely, the unconscious. The unconscious, in fact, is only ever illuminated and only reveals itself when you look away a little. This is something that you will rediscover in Witz all the time, for it's in its very nature – you look away and this makes it possible for you to see what is not there.

Let's begin, then, along with Freud, with the keys to the technique of the signifier.

Freud didn't go to too much trouble to look for examples – almost all the ones he gives, and they may strike us as a bit banal and unequal in value, are taken from these three professors, and this is why I spoke of the esteem in which I hold them. But there is, nevertheless, another author in whom Freud truly is steeped – Heinrich Heine – and it's from this source that he takes his first example.

There is a marvellous quip that comes from the mouth of Hirsch-Hyacinth, a Jew from Hamburg, lottery ticket agent, hard-working and half starved, whom Heine encounters in the baths at Lucca. If you want to undertake a comprehensive reading of Freud's Witz, you will need to read Reisebilder, Travel Pictures. It's astonishing that it's not a classic. In it you will discover, in the part set in Italy, a passage in which this indescribable character features, and whose properties I hope I still have time to say something about today.

In the course of their conversation, Hirsch-Hyacinth declares to Heine that he had the honour of treating the corns of the great Rothschild, Nathan the Wise. While he is trimming his corns, he says to himself that he, Hirsch-Hyacinth, is an important man. He is effectively thinking that during this procedure Nathan the Wise was mulling over the various letters that he would be sending to kings, and that if he, Hirsch-Hyacinth, should trim his corns a little too closely, this would result in an irritation in the upper regions that would in turn cause Nathan to clip the hide of kings a little more.

And thus, one thing leads to another. Hirsch-Hyacinth goes on to talk about another Rothschild that he knew, Salomon Rothschild. One day, when he announces himself as Hirsch-Hyacinth, he receives a reply in nonchalant terms, 'I am a lottery-agent myself, 23 for the Rothschild lottery, I do not want any colleague of mine in the kitchen.' And, Hirsch-Hyacinth exclaims, 'He treated me in quite a famillionaire manner.'

This is where Freud pauses.

What is 'famillionaire'? Is it a neologism, a slip of the tongue, a witticism? It's a witticism, for sure, but the simple fact that I am able to ask these other two questions already introduces us to a fundamental ambiguity concerning signifiers in the unconscious.

What does Freud say? That we can recognize here the mechanism of condensation, that it's materialized in the material of the signifiers and that it involves a sort of stamping together, by means of some machinery or other, of two lines of the signifying chain. Freud completes the witticism with a very nice signifying schema on which 'familiär' is first entered, then, underneath, 'Millionär'. Phonetically, 'är' is on both lines, 'mili' also; things get condensed and, in the interval between the two, 'familionär' appears.

faMILIon	ÄR

Let's try and see what this produces using the schema on the blackboard. I am obliged to move quickly here, but I have something to point out to you.

Discourse can obviously be schematized by saying that it starts from the I and goes to the Other. It's more correct to recognize that, whatever we might think, all discourse starts from the Other, α, that it's reflected by the I at β, since the latter must play some part in the matter, that it returns to the Other at a second moment – hence the invoking of the Other, 'I was on completely familiar terms with Salomon Rothschild' – and that it then heads off towards the message, γ.

But don't forget that the reason this schema is interesting is that there are two lines and that things circulate at one and the same time along the line of the signifying chain. Owing to the mysterious property of the phonemes that are in both words, something correlatively stirs within the signifiers – there is an unsettling of the elementary signifying chain as such. Three moments can also be distinguished on the side of the chain.

At the first moment the message takes shape.

At the second moment, the chain is reflected by the metonymic object at β′, 'my millionaire'. In effect, what is involved for Hirsch-Hyacinth is the schematized, metonymic object that belongs to him. He is 'his' millionaire, but at the same time he is not, because the case is, indeed, rather that the millionaire owns him. Result – it doesn't go through and this is precisely why, at the second moment, 24 'millionaire' is reflected back at β′, at the same time as the other term, the 'familiar' manner, arrives at α.

At the third moment, 'millionaire' and 'familiar' meet and come together in the message at γ to form 'famillionaire'.

This schema may strike you as a frivolous one to provide, even though a good one because I am the one who put it together. However, as it falls into place over the course of the year, maybe you will say to yourselves that it has been useful for something. In particular, owing to the topographical requirements it presents us with, it enables us to proceed in a measured way as far as the signifier is concerned. In the way it's constructed, however you run through it, it limits all our steps – I mean that with every step we have to take, the schema requires us to take no more than three elementary ones. This is what the little stoppers at the beginning and the arrowheads are defined for, as are the [directional] fins along the segments, which always have to be in an intermediary, second position. The others either start or end.

Thus, in three moments, the two chains – that of discourse and that of the signifier – have ended up converging on the same point, which is that of the message. This makes it the case that Herr Hirsch-Hyacinth was treated in a completely 'famillionaire' manner.

This message is completely incongruous, in the sense that it's not received, it's not in the code. That is the crux of the matter. To be sure, the message is in theory designed to be distinct from the code, but here, it's on the actual plane of the signifier that it's manifestly in violation of the code.

The definition of 'witticism' I propose rests, first, on the fact that the message is produced at a particular level of signifying production, that it's differentiated and distinguished from the code, and that it assumes its value as a message by virtue of this distinction and this differentiation. The message lies in its difference from the code.

How is this difference confirmed? This is where the second plane comes in. This difference is confirmed as a witticism by the Other. This is indispensable and it's in Freud.

There are two things in Freud's book on witticisms – the emphasis on the signifying technique, and the explicit reference to the Other as a third party. This reference, which I have been drilling into you for ages, is absolutely spelt out by Freud, especially in the second part of his work, but necessarily from the outset.

For instance, Freud is constantly stressing the difference between witticisms and the comic, which is due to the fact that the comic 25 is dual. The comic is a dual relation, and there has to be a third Other for witticisms to exist. Confirmation by the Other as third party, whether supported or not by an individual person, is essential here. The Other lobs it back, he places the message in the code as a witticism, he says in the code, 'This is a witticism'. If no one does this, there is no witticism. If no one observes it, if 'famillionaire' is a slip, there is no witticism. It's therefore necessary that the Other codify it as a witticism, that it be inscribed in the code through the Other's intervention.

The third element of my definition is that witticisms are related to something that is profoundly located at the level of meaning. I am not saying that this is a truth, for the subtle allusions to some kind of psychology of millionaires and parasites – even though they contribute greatly to our pleasure, we will come back to this – do not explain the production of 'famillionaire'. I am saying it's the truth.

I put it to you, as of today, that the essence of witticisms – if we wish to seek it, and seek it with Freud, for he will take us as far as is possible in the direction where its crux lies, since it's a question of its crux, and crux there is – resides in their relation to a radical dimension, which essentially depends on truth, namely, what I called in my article 'The Instance of the Letter', the dimension of truth's alibi.

No matter how close we get to the essence of witticisms, which never fail to produce a kind of mental double vision in us, what is always at issue, and which is what witticisms explicitly do, is this – they designate, and always off to the side, what is only ever seen by looking elsewhere.

This is where we will pick things up next time. I am clearly ending with something left up in the air, with an enigma. I think, however, that I have at least set the terms that, as I will show you in what is to come, we must necessarily rally to.

THE FAT-MILLIONAIRE

Substitution, condensation and metaphor
'Atterré'
From jokes to slips and to the forgetting of names
Ruins and metonymic sparks
The parasite and his master

Let me pick up the discussion from where I left off last time, at the point at which Hirsch-Hyacinth, talking to the author of Reisebilder, whom he met at the baths of Lucca, says to him, 'As true as God shall grant me all good things, I was sitting with Salomon Rothschild, and he treated me quite like an equal, he was completely famillionaire.'

1

We will begin, then, with the word 'famillionaire', which, all in all, had its moment of fame and fortune. It's known for being Freud's starting point, and I will thereby attempt to show you how he approaches witticisms.

If his analysis is of use to us and if this point is exemplary, it's because it shows us – and, sadly, we need this badly – the indisputable importance of the signifier in what, with Freud, we can call unconscious mechanisms.

It's surprising to see that when they grapple with the delicate subject of aphasia, that is, with speech deficits, neurologists, whose discipline doesn't prepare them for this particularly well, make remarkably steady progress in what might be called their linguistic training. Psychoanalysts, on the other hand, whose entire art and technique rest on the use of speech, have never paid it the least bit of attention, despite the fact that Freud's references to philology are not simply humanistic references displaying his culture or his reading, but grow organically from his research work.

Since at least the majority of you will have had a look at Freud's work on Witz since we last met, you will have seen that his entire argument revolves around the technique of witticisms as a linguistic technique. While the meaning and signification that emerge in witticisms seem to him to deserve to be compared to the unconscious, this is based solely on their function of creating pleasure. I am hammering away at this, since everything that I have to say about witticisms refers to it – the essential element always and uniquely revolves around structural analogies that can only be conceptualized on the linguistic plane, and that appear between the technical or verbal aspect of witticisms and the mechanisms specific to the unconscious which he discovered, giving them such names as 'condensation' and 'displacement' – I will limit myself to those two today. 28

This is where we are. Hirsch-Hyacinth, one of Heinrich Heine's fictional characters, recounts what happened to him. To cleave to the segment that I picked out to begin with, a very clear utterance is produced at the outset, elevating what follows, putting it on display and exalting it. It's an invocation addressed to the universal Witness and to the subject's personal relations with this Witness, that is, with God. 'As true as God shall grant me all good things' – this is both undeniably significant with respect to its meaning and ironic because of what in reality is shown to be lacking. Then what follows – 'I was sitting next to Salomon Rothschild, totally like an equal' – makes the object emerge. This 'totally' [tout à fait] contains something that is quite significant. Whenever we invoke a totality, it's because we are not totally certain that it actually obtains. You find this at many levels, I would even say at all [tous] levels, in the use of the notion of totality.

Finally, the unexpected phenomenon, the scandal when it comes to enunciation, is produced, namely, this novel message, and we don't yet know what it is, for we can't name it yet – 'in quite a famillionaire manner, quite famillionairely'.

Is this a bungled act or a successful one? A slip or a poetic creation? We don't know. Maybe it's both at once. But it's fitting to think about the formation of the phenomenon strictly on the plane of the signifier. Effectively, as I declared last time, there is a signifying function here that is specific to witticisms, involving a signifier that is not included in the code, that is, not in any of the signifying formations that, in the signifier's signified-creating functions, have accumulated up to that point. Something new appears, which can be conceived of as tied to the very mainspring of what we can call the progress of, or the changes in, language, but which requires that 29 before we get to it we think about its very formation in order to locate it in relation to the signifier's formative mechanism.

The essential phenomenon is the nodal point [noeud] at which 'famillionaire', this new and paradoxical signifier, appears. Freud begins with it and returns to it repeatedly. He asks us to dwell on it and, right till the end of his speculations on witticisms, as you will see, he doesn't fail to reflect on it as an essential phenomenon. It's the technical phenomenon that distinguishes witticisms. That is the central phenomenon. He teaches us about the level that is specifically ours, the level of relations with the unconscious, while simultaneously clarifying from a new perspective what leads him into the tendencies – this is the word used in this work – as well as what is there around it and radiating out from it, the comic, laughter and so on. If we fail to reflect on this, we will be unable to validly articulate the consequences and accompaniments of the phenomenon as well as its sources and reference points.

Let's think, then, about 'famillionaire'. There are several ways of going about it. The aim of my schema is to make it possible for you to do this, but also to allow you to inscribe on it the different planes of elaboration involving the signifier – I have chosen the word 'elaboration' because it's emphasized by Freud. So as not to give you too great a surprise, let's start at the level of meaning.

What happens when 'famillionaire' appears? We initially experience something like an aiming towards meaning, a meaning that is ironic, even satirical. Less apparent, unfolding in the after-effects of the phenomenon, propagating itself in the world in its wake, an object also emerges, one that tends towards the comic, the absurd and nonsense. This is the character of the famillionaire, insofar as it ridicules the millionaire, and begins to take shape as a figure.

It doesn't take much to show you in what direction he begins to be incarnated. Freud himself points out to us in passing that Heinrich Heine, redoubling his witticism, calls the millionaire the Millionarr, which in German means something like the scatter-brained millionaire. Along the same line of turning famillionaire into a noun, in French we could say, 'le fat-millionaire', with a hyphen, the conceited millionaire.

This approach shows you that we are not inhuman. This is a good thing, as long as we do not go too much further in that direction. It's the kind of step that shouldn't be rushed. We mustn't understand too quickly because, by understanding too quickly, we don't understand a thing. Such considerations do not explain the phenomenon, or in what way the latter is connected to the general economy of signifiers.

On this point, I must insist that you all familiarize yourselves with the examples I gave in 'The Instance of the Letter' of what I call the essential functions of the signifier, insofar as it's by means of them that the ploughshare of the signifier ploughs the signified into the real, literally evoking it, making it emerge, working it and creating it. They concern the functions of metaphor and metonymy.

It seems that for some people it's my style, let's say, that makes it impossible to read the article.

I regret it, but there's nothing I can do about it – my style is what it is. I ask them to make an effort here. I will just add that whatever deficiencies have been introduced by my own personal doing, there is also something – perhaps they are half-aware of this – that corresponds to the very object in question in the difficulties of this style. Since the point in the article is to speak in a valid way about the creative functions that signifiers exercise over signifieds, namely, not simply to speak about speech but to speak wholly in keeping with speech, as it were, so as to evoke its very functions, perhaps there are internal necessities of style that are required – such as conciseness, allusion, and even a few barbs, which are elements needed for entering the field where they dominate not only its avenues but its entire texture. I hope that what I have to say this year will demonstrate this. We shall return to it concerning a certain style that I will not hesitate to call by its name, as ambiguous as it may seem, namely, mannerism. I will try to show you that it not only has a great tradition behind it but that it also serves an irreplaceable function.

That was only a parenthesis to bring us back to my text.

In it, then, you will see that what I call, following Roman Jakobson who invented them, the metaphorical and metonymic functions of language can be very simply expressed in the register of signifiers.

As I have already stated several times over the course of previous years, the characteristics of signifiers are those of the existence of an articulated chain, and, as I add in this article, they tend to form closed groups, that is, groups formed by a series of rings linked together to form chains, which themselves link up like rings with other chains. The general form of my schema also evokes this a little, without presenting it directly. The existence of these chains implies that the connections or links between signifiers involve two 31 dimensions, one that can be called the combination, continuity or concatenation of the chain, and one of substitution, whose possibilities are always implicit in each element of the chain. This second dimension is left out of the linear definitions that are given of the relationship between signifiers and signifieds.

In other words, in every linguistic act, while the diachronic dimension is essential, synchrony is also implied or evoked by the permanent possibility of substitution inherent in each of the signifying terms.

Last time I wrote two formulas up on the board for you, one that gave a representation of combination and the other an image of the relationship of substitution that is always implicit in every signifying articulation. We need no extraordinary powers of intuition to see that there must be some relationship between the formula for metaphor and what Freud gives us with the schema of the formation of 'famillionaire'.

What might his schema mean? It could mean that something has fallen out in the interval, which has been eluded in the articulation of meaning, at the same time as something has occurred that has compressed or concertinaed 'familiar' and 'millionaire' into one another to produce 'famillionaire', which is what is left. There is, here, a sort of special case of the function of substitution, a special case whose traces remain in some way. Condensation is, if you will, a specific form of what can occur at the level of substitution as a function.

It would be good if you keep in mind, starting now, my lengthy commentary on a metaphor, that of Booz's sheaf, 'Sa gerbe n'était point avare ni haineuse', 'His sheaf was neither miserly nor hateful', showing how the fact that 'his sheaf' replaces the term 'Booz' forms the metaphor here. Owing to this metaphor, a meaning emerges around the figure of Booz, the meaning of the advent of his paternity, with everything that can radiate and spring from it, by virtue of the fact that he comes to it in an unlikely, belated, unforeseen, providential and divine manner. This metaphor is there in the poem precisely to show the advent of a new meaning around Booz, this character who seemed to have been excluded, foreclosed from it.

It's in the relationship of substitution that metaphor's creative mainspring, creative force or power to engender – that's the word for it! – lies.

Metaphor has a completely general function. I would even say that it's the possibility of substitution that allows the engendering, so to speak, of the world of meaning to be conceived. It's here, and nowhere else, that we must grasp the entire history of language, 32 namely the changes in function owing to which a language is constituted.

If some day we wished to give a model or example of the genesis and appearance of a language in the midst of the unformed reality of the world as it was before anyone spoke, we would need to assume the existence of an original, irreducible given, which would of course be the smallest possible signifying chain. I won't insist on this 'smallest possible' today, but I have already given you enough indications about this for you to know that it's by way of metaphor, by the play of the substitution of one signifier for another in a given place, that the possibility is created not only of signifying developments but also of the emergence of ever new meanings, always tending towards refining, complicating, deepening and giving its sense of depth to what in the real is nothing but pure opacity.

To illustrate this, I would like to give an example of what might be called the evolution of meaning, where we almost always find the mechanism of substitution. As is my wont, I let chance provide me with examples. And, indeed, one was provided to me by someone close to me who, while working on a translation, had to look up the meaning of the word 'atterré' in the dictionary, and was surprised to realize that he had never understood the actual meaning of the word until then. In effect, 'atterré' did not originally, nor in many of its uses, have the meaning of stricken with terror, but that of mis-à-terre, knocked to the ground or brought to the ground.

In Bossuet, 'atterrer' literally means to knock to the ground. In other, slightly later texts we see the weight of 'terreur', which purists would say contaminates, changes the meaning of the word 'atterré'. The purists are indisputably wrong about this. There isn't any such contamination. Even if, all of a sudden, following this reminder about the etymological meaning of the word 'atterré', some of you are under the illusion that 'atterrer' obviously means nothing other than turn towards the ground, bring to the ground, or place at the level of the ground – in other words, fill with consternation – the fact remains that the word's current usage implies a backdrop of terror.

Take another word that bears a certain relationship to the original meaning of the word 'atterré'. This is purely conventional, because there is no origin of the word 'atterré', but let's agree [for the sake of argument] that it's the word 'abattu', brought down, killed, demoralized or exhausted, insofar as it effectively evokes what the word 'atterré' might evoke for us in its purportedly pure meaning.

The word 'atterré' is, then, substituted for the word 'abattu'. It's a metaphor.

It's a metaphor that doesn't look like one, since we start with the 33 hypothesis that they originally meant the same thing, thrown to the ground or on the ground. This is what I ask you to notice – it's not because the meaning of 'atterré' changes the meaning of 'abattu' in any way that the word is fertile, generating new meaning.

However, saying that someone has been atterré is not the same thing as saying that someone has been abattu and, however much terror is implied, it doesn't mean terrorized either. There is an extra nuance, something new, a new meaning. A new nuance of terror is thereby introduced into the psychological and already metaphorical meaning of the word 'abattu'.

It's self-evident that, psychologically speaking, no one is 'atterré', or 'abattu', in the strict sense. This is something that we cannot say so long as there are no words, and these words are a product of a metaphor – namely, what happens when a tree is felled, abattu, or when a wrestler is taken down [mis à terre], atterré, a second metaphor.

But what is interesting about the thing is seeing that terror, terreur, is introduced by earth [terre], which is in 'atterré'. In other words, a metaphor is not an injection of meaning – as if that were possible, as if meanings existed in a reservoir somewhere [just waiting to be injected]. If the word 'atterré' brings a new meaning with it, it's not insofar as it has a signification, but insofar as it's a signifier. It's because it contains a phoneme that is also found in the word 'terreur'. It's by way of the signifier, that of equivocation or homonymy – that is, by way of the most meaningless thing there is – that the word comes to create this nuance of meaning, this nuance of terror, which it's going to introduce or inject into the already metaphorical meaning of the word 'abattu'.

In other words, it's in the relationship of one signifier to another signifier that a certain relationship of signifier over signified will be engendered. The distinction between the two is essential.

$$\frac{S}{S'} \rightarrow \frac{S}{s}$$

It's on the basis of the signifier-to-signifier relationship, of the link between this signifier over here and that signifier over there – on the basis of a relationship between signifiers alone, that is, the homonymic relationship, between 'atterré' and 'terreur' – that the action of creating signification, namely, the nuancing by 'terror' of what already existed by way of meaning on a metaphorical basis, is going to occur.

This exemplifies for us what happens at the level of metaphor. The metaphorical pathway presides not only over the creation and 34 evolution of a language, but also over the creation and evolution of meaning as such, I mean over meaning insofar as it's not only perceived, but insofar as the subject is included therein, that is, insofar as meaning enriches our lives.

I would again like to point out to you just the beginning of a pathway which connects up with what we see happening in the unconscious.

I have already indicated to you the essential role of the hook, 'terre', which we must regard purely as a signifier, and the role of the homonymic domain in which metaphors operate, whether we see it or not. But something else is happening as well. I do not know if you will grasp it immediately. You will grasp it better once you have seen it elaborated. This is just the start of an essential pathway.

The nuance of signification that 'atterré' brings with it, to the full extent that it's constituted and affirmed, implies – notice this – a degree of domination and a certain taming of your terror. Terror is not only named but also attenuated, and indeed it's this that enables you, moreover, to keep the ambiguity of the word 'atterré' in your mind. You say to yourself that, after all, 'atterré' does indeed have a relationship with the ground, la terre, that the terror in it is not complete, that the abattement, felling, in the sense in which it's unambiguous for you, is prevalent, and that terror is just a shade of meaning.

In short, terror remains partly in the shadows on this occasion, it's not observed head on and is grasped by the intermediary aspect of a depression. What has happened is completely forgotten up till the very moment I remind you of it. The model is, as such, not included in the circuit. In other words, insofar as the nuance 'atterré' has become established in usage, insofar as it has become meaning and usage of meaning, the signifier is, let's use the word, repressed in the strict sense of the term. Once the use of the word 'atterré' became established in its current nuance, the model was no longer within reach – unless we looked it up in a dictionary or in a scholarly study – but, as 'terre', or 'terra', was repressed.

I've got a bit ahead of myself here, because this is a mode of thinking that you are not very accustomed to yet, but I think that this will save us the trouble of coming back to it again. You will see the extent to which this beginning finds confirmation in our analysis of the phenomena.

Let's come back to our 'famillionaire' and to the point of metaphorical conjunction or condensation at which we saw it form.

It's useful to begin by separating the thing from its context, namely, from the fact that it's Hirsch-Hyacinth, that is, the mind 35 of Heine, that created it. We will ultimately seek its genesis much further back in Heinrich Heine's antecedents and relations with the Rothschild family. We would even need to reread the entire history of the Rothschild family to be completely sure not to make any mistakes. But we are not at that point yet, we are at 'famillionaire'.

Let's isolate it for a moment. Let's zoom in for a close-up on this 'famillionaire'. After all, it might have been born elsewhere than in Heinrich Heine's imagination. Perhaps he didn't make it up when he was sitting in front of a blank sheet of paper, pen in hand. Perhaps it was one evening, during one of those strolls around Paris that I will discuss, that it popped into his head. There is even every chance that it was in a state of fatigue or twilight. 'Famillionaire' might also have been a slip; it's quite conceivable.

I have already referred to a slip that I gathered as it rolled off the tongue of one of my patients. I have others, too, but I will come back to this one because one must always return to the same things until they have been exhausted. Then one can move on to other things. This is the patient who, in the course of recounting his history and associations on my couch, mentioned the period in his life when, with his companion whom he ended up marrying through the good offices of the Mayor, he was living merely maritablement, maritably.

All of you will have already grasped that this can be inscribed on Freud's schema – on top we write 'maritalement', which means that one is not married, and underneath we write an adverb in which the situations of married and unmarried people come together perfectly: 'misérablement', miserably. This gives 'maritablement'. It's not said, which is much better than being said. You can see here to what extent the message goes beyond, not the messenger – for it's truly the messenger of the gods who is speaking through the mouth of this innocent man – but the medium of speech.

The context, as Freud would say, completely rules out the possibility that my patient was making a joke, and you wouldn't know about it if on this occasion I hadn't been the Other with a big O, that is the listener, and not only the attentive listener, but the listener who hears [entendant], in the true sense of the term. The fact remains that, when put in its place, which is precisely in the Other, it's a particularly sensational and brilliant witticism.

Freud gave us countless examples of the close connection between witticisms and slips in The Psychopathology of Everyday Life. In certain circumstances a slip can so closely resemble a witticism that 36 Freud himself is obliged to say, and we are obliged to take his word for it, that the context excludes the possibility that the patient in question was trying to make a joke.

Somewhere in the book, Freud gives the example of a woman who, in speaking of the respective situations of men and women, says, 'For a woman to be of interest to men she has to be pretty' – which is not true of everyone, she implies in her sentence – 'but for a man it suffices that he have his five straight limbs'.

Expressions like this are not always entirely translatable, and I am quite often obliged to completely transpose them, that is, to re-create the slips in French. Here it would almost be necessary to use the expression 'completely stiff'. The word 'droit', 'straight', is not in common usage, so much so that it isn't in common usage in German either. Freud has to gloss the four and five members to explain the genesis of the thing. The ever-so-slightly suggestive overtone is undeniable. What Freud shows us, in any case, is that the slip doesn't quite go straight to the point, any more in German than in French. Moreover, the context rules out the possibility, according to him, that the woman could have been so crude deliberately. It's quite clearly a slip, but you see how closely it resembles a witticism.

It could therefore be a witticism, it could be a slip, and I would even say that it could even just purely and simply be something stupid, something linguistically naive. After all, for my patient, who was a particularly likeable man, maritablement was not even a true slip, since the word was clearly part and parcel of his own personal lexicon – he did not in the slightest think he was saying anything extraordinary. There are people who wander through life like that, who sometimes occupy quite high positions, and who utter words of this kind. A famous film producer used to come out with words like that by the bucketful, it seems, all day long. He used to say, for example, to conclude some of his imperious remarks, 'And then, that's how it is, it's signed with a "No".' It was not a slip; it was the simple result of ignorance and stupidity.

Since we have been speaking about parapraxes, which in all of this is what interests us most, let's take a bit of a look at what is going on at this level. Let's return to the parapraxis that we have gone over several times now in order to emphasize the signifier's essential function, the original parapraxis, so to speak, the one that is at the core of Freudian theory, the one that opens The Psychopathology of Everyday Life and had been published previously – namely, the forgetting of a proper name, in this instance, 'Signorelli'.

At first sight, a case of forgetting and what I have just been speaking to you about are not the same thing. But if what I am explaining to you carries any weight, if the mechanism or metabolism of the 37 signifier is truly the crux and mainspring of formations of the unconscious, we should be able to find all of them in one of them. What differs outwardly must display its unity inwardly.

In forgetting a name, instead of seeing a word like 'famillionaire' emerge, we have the contrary – something goes missing. What does the analysis that Freud provides of the forgetting of proper names and foreign names, to boot, show us?

We read The Psychopathology of Everyday Life as if it were the newspaper, and we know so much about it that we don't think it's worth pausing over. These things were, however, Freud's steps, and each of his steps deserves to be examined. They are the vehicle of his teachings, rich in consequences. Let me point out to you in passing that names – proper names – are situated at the level of the message. We will have to come back to the implications of this later, for I cannot tell you everything at once, unlike 'today's psychoanalysts' who are so knowledgeable that they say everything at once, speaking of the I and the ego [moi] as if these things had no complexity at all, mixing everything up. I bring you some titbits, to which I will return, and which I will develop further for you later.

The proper name in question is a foreign name, in the sense that its elements are foreign to Freud's own language. 'Signor' is not a German word, and Freud stresses that this is not unimportant. He doesn't tell us why, but the fact that he singles it out in the initial chapter proves that he thinks it's a particularly striking facet of the reality he is addressing. If Freud states this, it's because this introduces another dimension than that of proper names as such, which is always more or less attached to cabbalistic signs. If a name were absolutely proper and particular, it would have no homeland.

There is another fact that Freud immediately emphasizes just as much, whereas we don't usually dwell on it. What strikes him as remarkable, in effect, in the forgetting of a proper name that he mentions at the beginning of The Psychopathology of Everyday Life is that this forgetting is not an absolute forgetting – a hole or gap – but that other names present themselves in its place. It's here that is located, for him, what is found at the beginning of every science, namely, astonishment. One can only be truly astonished by what one has already begun, however little, to pick up on already, otherwise one doesn't dwell on it at all because one doesn't perceive anything. But Freud, forewarned by his experience with neurotics, perceives that the fact that substitutions occur is worth dwelling on.

38 Now I need to pick up the pace a bit, and spell out for you the entire economy of Freud's analysis of this forgetting of a name, which is a parapraxis, in the sense in which the name has dropped out.

Everything is centred on what we can call a metonymic approximation. Why? Because what re-emerges first are replacement names – 'Botticelli', 'Boltraffio'. There is no doubt but that Freud locates the phenomenon on the metonymic level. We can grasp this in the fact – this is why I am making a detour via the analysis of a case of forgetting – that the emergence of these names in the place of the forgotten 'Signorelli' is located at the level of a formation involving, not substitution this time, but combination. In the analysis of the case that Freud gives, there is no perceptible relationship between 'Signorelli', 'Boltraffio' and 'Botticelli', except indirect relationships linked solely to phenomena involving signifiers.

I am initially restricting myself to what Freud tells us, which stands out by its rigour. This is one of the clearest demonstrations he ever gives of the mechanisms at work in a phenomenon of formation and deformation linked to the unconscious. It leaves absolutely nothing to be desired with respect to clarity. As for me, I am forced here, for the clarity of my own account, to present this analysis to you indirectly, by saying, 'This is what Freud says.'

He tells us why 'Botticelli' appears. The last half of the name, '-elli', is the remnant of 'Signorelli', rendered incomplete by the fact that the 'Signor' has been forgotten. 'Bo' is the incomplete remnant of 'Bosnia-Herzegovina', 'Herr' having been repressed. It's this same repression that explains that 'Boltraffio' connects the 'Bo' of 'Bosnia-Herzegovina' with 'Trafoi', the name of the locality in which Freud had learned that one of his patients had committed suicide because of sexual impotence.

This latter theme had come up in the course of a conversation Freud had with someone on the train from Ragusa to Herzegovina, which immediately preceded the forgetting of the name. His interlocutor was telling him about the Turks of Bosnia-Herzegovina, these Muslims, ever so endearing, who, when their doctor has been unsuccessful at curing them, tell him, 'Herr, Sir, we know that you have done everything you could.' The 'Herr' here has its own weight and significant accent – it's at the limit of the sayable, it's the absolute Herr, which is death, this death that, as La Rochefoucauld says, like the sun, one cannot look at directly. And, in effect, Freud is no more able to than anyone else.

Death is here rendered present to Freud twice over. It's rendered present through the incident concerning his function as a doctor. It's also made blatantly present through a specific link, which has quite a personal aspect, between death and sexual potency. It's highly likely that this link, which is undeniable in the text, is not only in 39 the object, that is, not only in what is rendered present to him by his patient's suicide.

What do we have before us? Nothing but a pure and simple combination of signifiers. They are the metonymic ruins of the object in question. The object is behind the various specific elements that are at play there in the immediate past. Who lies behind that? The absolute Herr, death. The word moves on, fades away, withdraws, is repelled, and is, strictly speaking, unterdrückt.

There are two words that Freud plays with in an ambiguous manner. The first is 'unterdrückt', which I have already translated for you as 'fallen into the lower regions' [tombé dans les dessous]. The second is 'verdrängt'.

If we situate this forgetting on our schema, Herr has fled the level of the metonymic object, and for a very good reason, which is that it was liable to be a little too present after Freud's conversations on the train. We rediscover, as an ersatz, the debris or ruins of this metonymic object, namely, this 'Bo-' that comes along and combines with the other ruins of the name which is repressed at that moment, namely '-elli', which doesn't figure in the other substitute name [Boltraffio].

This is the trace or clue that we have of the metonymic level. It's what makes it possible for us to rediscover the chain of the phenomenon in discourse. It's here that, in analysis, what we call free association is located, insofar as it enables us to track what happens in the unconscious.

Since this object is metonymic, it's already fractured. Everything that occurs in the order of language is always already accomplished. If the metonymic object fractures so readily, it's because, as a metonymic object, it's never anything but a fragment of the reality it represents. That's not all. In effect, 'Signor' is not to be found amongst the traces, the fragments of the fractured metonymic object. This is what needs to be explained now.

If 'Signor' cannot be evoked, if this is what makes Freud unable to retrieve the name 'Signorelli', it's because he is implicated in it. He is obviously implicated indirectly by way of 'Herr'. 'Herr' has in fact been uttered at a particularly significant moment of the function that it could take on as the absolute Herr, the representative of death, which on this occasion is unterdrück. Signor is implicated only insofar as it's a simple translation of 'Herr'. This is where we encounter anew the level of substitution.

Substitution is the articulation, the signifying means whereby metaphorical action is instituted. This doesn't mean that substitution is metaphor. If I teach you to proceed down all these pathways 40 in an articulated manner here, it's so that you don't constantly misuse words. To say that a metaphor is produced at the level of substitution means that substitution is one possible way to articulate signifiers, that metaphors exercise their function of creating signifieds in the place where substitution can occur, but they are two different things. Similarly, metonymy and combination are two different things.

I will spell it out for you, as an aside, because such non-distinctions lead to what are called misuses of language. In what is defined in the terms of mathematical logic as a set or a subset when that set has only one member, the set in question must not be confused with this one member. This is a typical example of the misuse of language. This may be useful to those who have criticized my inventions involving α, β, γ and δ.

Coming back to what takes place at the level of 'Signor' and 'Herr', the substitutive link in question is a substitution that is called heteronymous. This is what happens in every translation – the translation of one term into a foreign language on the substitutive axis, in the comparison required by the existence of different linguistic systems, is called a heteronymous substitution. You are going to tell me that it isn't a metaphor. I agree, I only need establish one thing, which is that it's a substitution.

Note that I am only following what you are forced to admit in reading the text. In other words, I want to get you to extract from your knowledge the fact that you knew it. Moreover, I am not innovating here – you must accept all of this if you accept Freud's text.

Therefore, if 'Signor' is implicated or involved, there is indeed something that binds it to what the phenomenon of metonymic decomposition is a sign of, here at the place at which it's produced. 'Signor' is implicated as a substitute for 'Herr'.

There is nothing more I need to establish in order to tell you that if 'Herr' has gone off that way, in the direction of the βs, 'Signor', as indicated by the direction of the arrows, has gone off in the direction of α – γ. Not only has it gone off in that direction, but we can allow for the moment, till I come back to it, that it rebounds like a ball back and forth between code and message. It goes around in circles in what can be called memory. Remember what I gave you a glimpse of in the past, when I said that we should conceive of the mechanism of forgetting, and, by the same token, of analytic remembering, as like the memory of a machine. What is in the memory of a machine, in effect, goes round in circles until one needs it – it's obliged to go round in circles, for memory cannot be built into a machine in any other way. Curiously enough, we find an application of this in the fact that we can think of 'Signor' as in constant rotation between code and message, until it's refound. 41

By the same token, you will see there the slight nuance that we can discern between the unterdrückt, on the one hand, and the verdrängt, on the other. Whereas unterdrückt need happen but once and for all, under conditions to which a being, at the level of his mortal condition, cannot descend, something else is going on when 'Signor' is maintained in the circuit without being able to re-enter it for a certain period of time. It's necessary for us to admit what Freud admits, namely, the existence of a special force that maintains it there, that is, strictly speaking, a Verdrängung.

Now that I have shown you where I wanted to get to regarding this precise point, I will return to the relations between metaphor and substitution. Although, in effect, there is only a substitution between 'Herr' and 'Signor', there is also a metaphor. Whenever there is a substitution, there is a metaphorical effect or induction as well.

For someone who is German-speaking, saying 'Signor' is not quite the same thing as saying 'Herr'. I would go even further – it's never insignificant when our bilingual patients, or those who simply know another language, having something to say, suddenly change languages. This change of register is always, you can be sure of it, much more convenient for them, and never occurs without a reason. If the patient really is a polyglot, it has a meaning. If he knows the language he is referring to imperfectly, then naturally it has another meaning. If he is bilingual from birth, it has yet another. But in each case, it has one.

I provisionally told you that in substituting 'Signor' for 'Herr' there was no metaphor, but simply a heteronymic substitution. I am coming back to this to say that on this occasion, on the contrary, 'Signor', given the whole context it's attached to, namely, the painter Signorelli, the Orvieto frescoes and the evocation of the last things, represents the most beautiful elaborations there are of this impossible-to-confront reality that is death. It's precisely through recounting a thousand fictions – I am using 'fiction' here in its most veridical sense – on the subject of final things that we metaphorize, or tame, the confrontation with death and bring it into language. It's therefore clear that 'Signor' here, insofar as it's attached to the context of 'Signorelli', really does represent a metaphor.

42 This is what we have arrived at, and it enables us to reapply, point by point, the phenomenon of Witz to the forgetting of a name, since we have found that they share a topography.

'Famillionaire' is a positive production, but the point at which it's produced is the same hole as the one that the phenomenon of a slip displays. I could take another example, and perform the demonstration again. By way of homework, I could give you the task of spelling out the example of Latin verse mentioned by one of Freud's interlocutors – 'Exoriare ex nostris ossibus ultor' – where the speaker changed the order a bit – the 'ex' is between 'nostris' and 'ossibus' – and also drops the second word, which is indispensable for the scansion, 'aliquis', which he is unable to articulate. You can only truly understand the phenomenon by referring it to this same grid or framework.

It comprises two levels – the combinatory level, with the special point at which the metonymic object as such is produced, and the substitutive level, with the special point at which the two chains meet, that of discourse and that of the signifying chain in a pure state, where the message is produced. 'Signor' is repressed, verdrängt, in the message-code circuit, whereas 'Herr' is unterdrückt at the level of discourse. Indeed, the preceding discourse captures 'Herr', and what puts us on the track of the lost signifier are the metonymic ruins of the object.

This is what the analysis of Freud's example of the forgetting of a name yields. Now we can see more clearly what we are able to make of 'famillionaire', this formation that, in itself, has something ambiguous about it.

The creation of a witticism, as we have seen, belongs to the same order as the production of a linguistic symptom like the forgetting of a name.

If the two are superimposable and have the same signifying economy, then we should find what, at the level of witticisms, complements – I hinted at something about their double function earlier – their aim with respect to meaning, their disturbing, disruptive neologistic function. What complements it is to be found on the side of what may be called dissolution of the object.

It's no longer a question just of 'he welcomed me like an equal, completely famillionairely', but of the emergence of this fantastical and pathetic character that we can call 'the famillionaire'. He is like one of these creations that a certain fantastic poetry enables us to 43 imagine, halfway between a 'fou-millionaire', a 'mad-millionaire', and a millipede. This would be a kind of human type whose specimens one could imagine moving, living and growing in the interstices of things, a mycetoma or some analogous parasite. Even without going that far, the word could be assimilated into language in the same way as, for some time now, 'une respectueuse' has meant a whore.

These sorts of creations have a value of their own, which is that of introducing us to a domain that was previously unexplored. They bring out what we might call a verbal being. But a verbal being is still a being, and it increasingly tends to become embodied. 'Famillionaire' has thus played, it seems to me, many roles, not simply in the imagination of poets, but in history as well.

There are many creations that have come closer to it than

'famillionaire'. Gide makes the entire story of his Prometheus Misbound revolve around what is not really a god but a machine, namely the banker Zeus, whom he calls the 'Miglionaire'. Should it be pronounced in French or in Italian? We can't tell, but for my part I think it has to be pronounced in Italian. I will show you the essential function, in Freud, of the Miglionnaire in the creation of a witticism.

If we now examine 'famillionaire', we see that the direction I am indicating is not achieved at the level of Heine's text. In no way does the latter give it freedom or independence as a substantive. If I translated it just before as 'completely famillionairely', it was so as to point out to you that Heine remains at the adverbial level. We can make a play on words here and appeal to language – there is a world of difference between the manner of being and the direction I was showing you, namely, a manner of being. You can see that there is continuity between the two. Heine remains at the level of the manner of being when he writes 'ganz famillionär'.

What does Heine's 'completely famillionairely' bring us? Without us in any way ending up with a being of poetry, it's an extraordinarily rich, swarming and proliferating term, much like what we find at the level of metonymic decomposition.

Heinrich Heine's creation deserves to be put back here in its context, The Baths of Lucca, in which we encounter, along with Hirsch-Hyacinth, the Marquis Cristoforo di Gumpelino, a very fashionable man who lavishes all manner of courtesy and attentiveness on beautiful women, to which is added the fabulous familiarity of Hirsch-Hyacinth clinging to his heels.

44 The latter's function as a parasite, valet, manservant or doorman evokes another possible decomposition of the word for us, the 'affamillionaire', 'famine-llionaire', stressing Gumpelino's hungering for success, the hunger that is no longer the auri sacra fames, but that of acceding to the highest spheres, a satisfaction which had previously been denied him. I don't want to allude to something still further in the background – namely, the sad, heartrending function of women in the life of this caricature of a marquis.

We could trace the possible signification of the word in yet another way by decomposing it thus – 'fat-millionaire', 'conceited millionaire'. The 'fat-millionaire' is both Hirsch-Hyacinth and Gumpelino. And it's far more than that, because behind them lie Heinrich Heine's singularly famillionaire relations, including those he had with the Rothschilds.

You can see, then, the two axes of metaphorical creation in this witticism. There is the axis of meaning, insofar as this word hits home, moves us, is rich in psychological significations and immediately hits the nail on the head, owing to its improvisation, and captures our attention through a talent that is at the limit of poetic creation. But there is another side, which may not be immediately perceived – by virtue of the combinations that we could extend indefinitely, the word is crawling with all the needs that proliferate around an object.

I alluded to fames. There is also 'fama', namely, the need to shine and be famous that hounds the character of Hirsch-Hyacinth's master. There is also the fundamental 'infamy' of this servile familiarity, which, in the scene at the baths of Lucca, results in the fact that Hirsch-Hyacinth gives his master one of those purges only he knows how to prepare, giving Gumpelino agonizing stomach cramps at the very moment the poor fellow finally receives from his beloved lady the letter that, in other circumstances, would have enabled him to realize his fondest wishes. This hugely farcical scene exposes the underside of this infamous familiarity. It really does give the formation of the witticism its weight, its meaning, its ties, its front and back, its metaphorical aspect and its metonymic aspect. This is, however, not the essence.

We have now seen both sides, the ins and the outs of it. There is, on the one hand, the creation of meaning by 'famillionaire', which also implies a waste product, something that is repressed. It's necessarily something connected to Heinrich Heine, and it will start, just like 'Signor' did, circulating between code and message. On the other hand, there is the metonymic thing, with all the scraps of meaning, sparks and splatters that are produced around the creation of the word 'famillionaire', and which constitute its influence, its weight, which for us establish its literary value. The fact remains that the only thing that matters, the centre of the phenomenon, is 45 what happens at the level of signifying creation, which makes it a witticism. Everything that happens around it puts us on the scent of its function, but must not be confused with the phenomenon's centre of gravity.

What gives the phenomenon its tone and weight must be sought out in its very centre, sought out, that is, on the one hand at the level of the conjunction of signifiers and, on the other, at the level – as I have already pointed out – of the confirmation that the Other gives this creation. It's the Other who gives the signifying creation its value as a signifier in its own right, its value as a signifier in relation to the phenomenon of signifying creation. It's the Other's confirmation that distinguishes a witticism from the pure and simple phenomenon of a symptom, for example. A witticism resides in the shift to this second function.

But if it weren't for everything that I have just told you today, that is, if it weren't for what occurs at the level of signifying conjunction, which is the essential phenomenon, and at the level of what this conjunction develops insofar as it shares in the fundamental dimensions of the signifier, namely, metaphor and metonymy, then no confirmation of a witticism would be possible. There would be no means of distinguishing it from the comic, from a joke, or from a crude explosion of laughter.

In order to understand what is at issue in witticisms as signifying phenomena, we need to have identified all their facets, particularities, ties, and ins and outs at the level of the signifier. Witticisms are located at such an elevated level of signifying elaboration that Freud paused there to perceive a specific example of formations of the unconscious. This, too, is what holds our interest.

You must be beginning to glimpse their importance, since you have been able to observe that they make it possible for us to enter further, and in a rigorous manner, into the analysis of a properly psychopathological phenomenon, namely, parapraxes.

THE MIGLIONAIRE

From Kant to Jakobson
The repressed in witticisms
The forgetting of a name, a failed metaphor
The appeal to a signifier
The young woman and the count

So, we have now started on this year's topic, having begun with witticisms.

Last time, we started analysing the first example Freud brought up, which was in the form of this word 'famillionaire' attributed by Heinrich Heine to the character of Hirsch-Hyacinth. It is a poetic creation full of meaning, and it is no accident that Freud found himself in the position of choosing this example from the context of poetic creation. As usually happens, moreover, I have found this example to be particularly apt for demonstrating what I wish to demonstrate here.

The analysis of the psychological phenomenon involved in witticisms leads us, as you will have no doubt seen, to the level of a signifying articulation which, as interesting as it is to so many of you – at least I hope it is – may nevertheless appear to be quite puzzling, as you can easily imagine. What is surprising and baffling here is also the central thread running through this return to analytic experience which I want to undertake with you and which concerns the place and, up to a point, the existence of the subject.

Someone who was clearly far from being uninformed, neither uninformed about this question nor uninformed about what I am trying to contribute to it, asked me, 'But then, what becomes of the subject? Where is he?'

The response was easy. Since it was a philosopher who asked this 48 question at the French Society of Philosophy, where I was speaking, I was tempted to reply, 'I'll refer the question back to you, I leave it to the philosophers to respond on this point. There's no question of my doing all the work myself.'

To be sure, the notion of the subject needs to be revised on the basis of Freudian experience. There's no surprise there. On the other hand, given the essential contribution Freud made, would we have ever expected to see minds, and especially the minds of psychoanalysts, even more strongly attached to a notion of the subject that is embodied in some particular way of conceptualizing the ego, no less? This is just returning to what we might call grammatical confusion over the issue of the subject.

Of course, nothing in our experience authorizes us to maintain that the ego should be identified with a power of synthesis. Is there even any need to resort to Freudian experience to see this? A simple and sincere inspection of the life of each and every one of us makes it possible to glimpse the fact that this so-called power of synthesis is less than ineffective. As a matter of fact, fiction aside, there is really no more common experience than that not only are our reasons for doing things incoherent, but we don't know what those reasons are and are fundamentally alienated from them. Freud brings us the notion of a subject that operates beyond this. He shows us the mainsprings and the action of this subject within us that is so difficult to grasp. Something there that should have caught people's attention is that this subject – which introduces a hidden, secret unity into what, at the level of the most common experience, appears to be profoundly divided, profoundly bewitched and profoundly alienated in relation to our very motives – is other.

Is this other subject merely some kind of double or, as has been said, a bad ego insofar as it effectively hides lots of surprising tendencies? Or is it another ego or, as you might take me to be saying, a true ego? Is that what it is about? Is it simply a double? Another ego, purely and simply, one that we can think of as structured like the experiential ego? That is the question, and that too is why we are going to explore it this year at the level of and under the title of 'formations of the unconscious'.

To be sure, the question answers itself – the subject isn't structured in the same way as the ego of experience. What is present in the subject has its own laws. Its formations have not only a specific style but also a specific structure. Freud investigates this structure and reveals it at the level of neuroses, symptoms, dreams, bungled actions and witticisms, and he detects that there is just the one, homogeneous structure. This is his fundamental argument for treating witticisms as a manifestation of the unconscious. It is the crux of what he lays out for us on the topic of witticisms, and this is why I have chosen them as our way in. 49

Witticisms are structured and organized according to the same laws as those we found in dreams. Freud detects these laws in the structure of witticisms, enumerates them and spells them out. They are the laws of condensation, Verdichtung, displacement, Verschiebung, and a third element that belongs to this list, and which at the end of my article I call 'égard aux nécessités de la mise en scène', 'considerations of representability', to translate 'Rücksicht auf Darstellung'. But naming them isn't the point. The key to his analysis is the recognition of common structural laws. This is how we can tell that a process, as he expresses it, has been drawn into the unconscious – it is structured according to laws of this kind. This is what is involved where the unconscious is concerned.

Now, there is something that happens at the level of what I teach you. It is that now – that is, after Freud – we are in a position to grasp that this unconscious structure, by which a phenomenon is recognized as belonging to the unconscious, completely coincides with everything that through linguistic analysis we can identify as the essential ways that meaning, insofar as it is created by combining signifiers, is formed. This outcome is all the more convincing for having come as a complete surprise.

The notion of signifying elements acquired its full meaning, in the concrete evolution of linguistics, when the notion of the phoneme was isolated. It means that we can take language at the level of a doubly defined elementary register – as a diachronic chain and, within this chain, as the permanent possibility of substitution in the synchronic sense. It also means that we can detect, at the level of the functions of signifiers, an original power as the location for a certain creation of what is called meaning. Without any need for us to labour away any further at this conception, which in itself is very rich in its psychological implications, it is complemented by what Freud already prepared for us at the point where the field of linguistics meets the field specific to analysis, insofar as the psychological effects by which meaning is created are, as he showed us, nothing but formations of the unconscious.

We can grasp and situate here a fact about the place of man that had been overlooked till then. It is obvious that for man there is a heterogeneity, a diversity and a variability of objects that is truly surprising in comparison with biological objects. Every living organism's existence is correlated with a singular set of objects in the world 50 of a particular style. But where man is concerned, this set has a superabundant and luxuriant variety. Furthermore, human objects, the world of human objects, cannot be grasped as biological objects. Now, it turns out that in this context this fact has to be placed in a close, even indissoluble, relationship with the human being's submission to or subduction by the phenomenon of language.

To be sure, this did in fact emerge, but only up to a point and, in a way, it remained masked. Effectively, what can be grasped at the level of concrete discourse in relation to creating meaning is always in an ambiguous position, given that language is turned towards objects that already bear within themselves something of the creation they have received from language itself. This became the object of an entire tradition, even an entire philosophical rhetoric – that of critique in the broadest sense of the term – which poses the question, 'What is the value of language?' What do these connections represent in relation to the connections that they appear to lead to, even put in place for reflecting, and which are the connections with the real?

This is effectively the question raised by a philosophical tradition whose highest point can be defined as Kant's critical philosophy, which can be interpreted as the most profound questioning of every form of the real, insofar as it is subject to the a priori categories not only of the aesthetic but also of the logic. This was a pivotal moment, one at which human meditation made a new start and rediscovered what was not at all perceived in that way of raising the question at the level of logical discourse and enquiring into the correspondence between the real and a certain syntax of the circle of intention, insofar as it is completed in every sentence. We must take this up again, underneath and across this critique, on the basis of the action of speech in this creative chain where it is always liable to engender new meaning – by way of metaphor, in the most obvious manner, or by way of metonymy, in a manner that has stayed profoundly masked till quite recently. I will explain why when the time comes.

This introduction has already been difficult enough and so I will go back to my 'famillionaire' example and try to finish analysing it.

We got as far as the idea that in the course of an intentional discourse in which the subject presents himself as wanting to say something, something happens that goes beyond his will and that looks like an accident, a paradox, or even a scandal.

This neo-formation, a witticism, appears with features that are not at all negative, whereas they could be considered a sort of stumbling or bungled action – I have shown you things that oddly resemble this at the level of a pure and simple slip of the tongue. On the contrary, under the conditions in which this accident occurs it gets registered and valued as a signifying phenomenon that creates a meaning.

A signifying neo-formation presents a sort of collapse of signifiers, which, as Freud says, get compressed and concertinaed into one another. The result is the creation of signification, whose nuances and enigma I have shown you, between an evocation of a properly metaphorical manner of being – 'He treated me quite famillionairely' – and an evocation of a manner of being, of verbal being, that almost comes to life in the odd form the phantom of which I tried to raise for you with the character of the 'famillionaire'.

The word 'famillionaire' makes its entry into the world as the representative of a being that for us is highly likely to adopt a reality and a weight that, for us, are infinitely more substantial than those of the millionaire, which are more indistinct. I have shown you how much force it retains, lively enough to really represent a character typical of a specific historical period. I pointed out to you, finally, that it wasn't only Heine who had invented it, and I spoke to you about Gide's Prometheus Misbound and his 'Miglionaire'.

It would be extremely interesting to dwell for a moment on this creation of Gide's. His 'Miglionaire' is Zeus the banker. Nothing is more surprising than the creation of this character. The memory this work of Gide's leaves us with is perhaps eclipsed by the extraordinary brilliance of Paludes, of which it is nevertheless a sort of double. We have the same character in both cases. They have many overlapping characteristics. In any case, this Miglionaire turns out to engage in some odd conduct with his semblables, since it is there that we see the idea of the gratuitous act emerge.

Effectively, Zeus the banker is unable to have a real and authentic exchange with anyone at all, insofar as he is identified here with 52 absolute power, with money as a 'pure signifier' that calls into question the existence of any possibly meaningful exchange. The only way he has of escaping from his solitude is by doing the following. He goes out into the street with an envelope containing a five-hundred franc note, which was worth something back then, in one hand and in the other a slap in the face, as it were. He drops the envelope and a passer-by obligingly picks it up for him. He asks the latter to write a name and an address on the envelope, in return for which he gives him a slap in the face – and since he isn't Zeus for nothing, it is a tremendous slap, one that leaves the subject dizzy and wounded. He then slips away and sends the contents of the envelope to the person whose name was written down by the person he has just roughed up.

Thus, he finds himself in the position of having made no choice himself, and of having offset a gratuitous evil spell by bestowing a gift that he plays no part in. Through his actions he is trying to restore the circuit of exchange that it was not possible to introduce just any old how or from just any angle. Zeus tries to become a part of it by making some kind of forced entry, by incurring a sort of debt in which he plays no part. The rest of the novel shows how the two characters never end up putting together what they owe one another. As a result, one ends up almost blind in one eye and the other dies.

That is the whole storyline of the novel, which is profoundly instructive, moral and useful for what I am trying to show here.

Our Heinrich Heine has, then, managed to create a character out of which, with the signifier 'famillionaire', he generates two dimensions – one of metaphorical creation, plus a sort of new metonymic object, the famillionaire – whose place we can locate on our schema. As I showed you last time, even though our attention isn't drawn to this aspect of the thing, we can find in it all the debris or scraps typical of reflecting on an object used in any metaphorical creation. This is the underside of the signifiers, all those signifying fragments into which the term 'famillionaire' shatters – 'fames', 'fama', 'famulus', 'infamy' and, ultimately, whatever you want, whatever Hirsch-Hyacinth actually is for this caricature of a master, Cristoforo di Gumpelino. Whenever we are dealing with a formation of the unconscious, we have to systematically search for what I call the debris of the metonymic object.

For reasons that are very clear in analytic experience, this debris proves to be particularly important when the metaphorical creation has not been successful – I mean when nothing comes of it, as in the case I presented to you of the forgetting of a name. When the name 'Signorelli' is forgotten and leaves a hollow or makes a hole at the level of metaphor, the metonymic debris becomes all-important for refinding its traces. When the term 'Herr' disappears, the metonymic context in which it has been isolated, namely the context 'Bosnia-Herzegovina', makes it possible to restore it.

Let's return to our 'famillionaire', a neo-formation produced at the level of the message. I pointed out to you that, when it comes to witticisms, we should find metonymic correspondences to these paradoxical formations no less than those corresponding to the conjuring-away or disappearance of 'Signor' when it comes to the forgetting of a name. That is where we ended. How are we to conceptualize what happens at the level of 'famillionaire' insofar as the metaphor, which is a witty one here, works? There must be something that in some way marks the residue or scraps of the metaphorical creation.

A child could tell you straightaway. If we stop being fascinated by the 'thingification' aspect that always makes us treat the phenomenon of language as if an object were involved, we will learn to say simple and obvious things in the same way mathematicians do when they work with their little symbols, x and y, a and b, without thinking of anything, without thinking of what they signify. What is rejected? What marks the remainder and residue of metaphorical creation at the level of metaphor? It is clear that it is the word 'familiar'.

Since the word 'familiar' didn't come and 'famillionaire' came in its place, we have to conclude that the word 'familiar' has gone somewhere and has met with the same fate as that reserved for the 'Signor' of 'Signorelli', which, as I explained to you last time, went off and followed its own little circular circuit somewhere in unconscious memory.

We won't be at all astonished to learn that this is how it is. The word 'familiar' undergoes a fate that corresponds closely to the mechanism of repression in the usual sense – I mean in the sense in which we experience it, and which corresponds to a prior, let's say personal, historical experience, one that goes back a long way. Of course, it is no longer the being of Hirsch-Hyacinth that is then involved, but that of his creator, Heinrich Heine.

If in Heinrich Heine's poetical creation the word 'famillionaire' unfolded in such a felicitous manner, it doesn't really matter what the circumstances in which he discovered it were. Perhaps it didn't come to him while he was at his desk but was invented during one of 54 those solitary walks in night-time Paris he would have taken, after the meetings he had in the 1830s with Baron James de Rothschild, who treated him like an equal and in a manner that was 'completely famillionaire'. It doesn't make any difference, it works well, it's good.

Don't imagine that I am going any further than Freud did. At around a third of the way into the book you will see that he comes back to the example of 'famillionaire' at the level of what he calls the tendencies of the mind and identifies the sources of the formation of this ingeniously invented witticism. He informs us that this creation of Heine's corresponds to something in his past and in his personal family relations. Behind Salomon de Rothschild, whom he calls into question in his fiction, there is effectively another 'famillionaire' who is from his own family this time, Salomon Heine, his uncle. The latter played the most oppressive of roles in his life over the entire course of his existence. Not only did he treat him extremely poorly, not giving him the concrete assistance he could have expected from him, but he stood in the way of the realization of his great love, the love he had for his cousin – he was unable to marry her for the essentially 'famillionaire' reason that his uncle was a millionaire while he wasn't. Heine always considered as a betrayal what was merely the consequence of a family impasse profoundly marked by 'millionarity'.

The word 'familiar', which happens to have the major signifying function here in the repression that matches the witty creation by Heine, an artist of language, shows us, in an obvious way, an underlying personal signifier. What makes it underlying is tied to the word, not to anything that the standing signification may have confusedly accumulated over the poet's life with respect to dissatisfaction and to a singularly difficult position in relation to women in general. If this is a factor here, it enters by way of the signifier 'familiar' as such. In this example, there is no other way of grasping the action or impact of the unconscious than by showing that the signification is closely tied to the presence of the signifying term 'familiar'.

Remarks such as these are designed to show you that the path we are taking, that of linking the entire economy of what is registered in the unconscious to combinations of signifiers, takes us far, launching us into a regression that doesn't go on ad infinitum, but leads us all the way back to the origins of language. Effectively, we have to consider all human significations as having been created metaphorically at one time or another through the conjunction of signifiers.

55 Considerations such as these are certainly not devoid of interest – we always have a lot to learn from the history of signifiers. Identifying the term 'famille' [family], as what is repressed at the level of the metaphor's formation is well suited to serve, in passing, as an illustration of this.

Effectively, unless you have read Freud, or have simply maintained some homogeneity between the way you think while you are in analysis and the way you read a text, you don't think of 'famille' in the term 'famillionaire', any more than you think of 'terre' [ground], in the term 'atterré' [dismayed or distressed]. The more real you make the term 'atterré', the more you will drift into the sense of terror and the more 'terre' will be avoided, whereas it is the active element in the signifying use of the term 'atterré' as a metaphor. It's the same here. The further you go in the direction of 'famillionaire', the more you think about 'famillionaire', that is, about the millionaire having become transcendent, as it were – having become something that exists in being and no longer just as a sign, pure and simple – the more 'famille' tends to elude you as the active term in the creation of the word 'famillionaire'. Take an interest, then, in this term 'famille', just as I have, at the level of the signifier and its history, by opening the Littré dictionary.

The Littré, as Charles Chassé tells us, is where Mallarmé got all his ideas from. The funny thing is that he is right. He is right in the particular context he, no less than his interlocutors, is caught up in, and this gives him the feeling that he is breaking down doors. Of course, he is breaking this door down because it isn't open. If everyone thought about what poetry is, there would be nothing surprising in the realization that Mallarmé took a keen interest in signifiers. But no one has ever broached the question of what poetry really is. People oscillate between some vague and obscure theory of similes and reference to musical terms of one kind or another, by means of which one seeks to explain Mallarmé's so-called lack of meaning. In short, one is completely unaware that there must be a way to define poetry as a function of its relationship to signifiers. As soon as one formulates poetry in a slightly more rigorous way, as Mallarmé did, it is much less surprising that it should be called into question in his more obscure sonnets.

That said, I doubt that anyone will ever make the discovery that I too got my ideas from the Littré dictionary on the grounds that I open it.

I open it, then, and I can inform you of this, which I suppose a number of you know already, but which is of interest all the same – in French, the term 'familial' was a neologism in 1881. Close consultation of some good authors who have addressed the issue 56 has made it possible for me to date this word's appearance at 1865. We didn't have this adjective before that date. Why not?

According to Littré's definition, 'familial' is used to refer to the family at the level, he says, of political science. The word 'familial' is thus tied to the context in which one says, for example, 'allocations familiales' [family welfare benefits]. The adjective came into being, then, when it was possible to treat the family as an object at the level of an interesting political reality, that is, insofar as the family no longer had the same structuring function for the subject it had had up till then, as an integral part of the very bases of one's discourse, without it even occurring to one to isolate it. It was insofar as it was drawn from this level and became subject to a particular technical use that something as simple as its adjectival correlate could appear. This is perhaps not unrelated, as you won't have failed to notice, to the very usage of the signifier 'famille'.

Be that as it may, it seems that the value of this term which, as I have just been saying, was introduced into the circuit of the repressed was absolutely not the same in Heinrich Heine's day as in ours. In effect, the sole fact that the term 'familial' not only wasn't in use in the same context but didn't even exist at this period is enough to change the axis of the signifying function linked to the term 'famille'. This nuance should not be neglected in this case.

It's because we neglect things of this kind that we are capable of imagining that we understand ancient texts as their contemporaries understood them. It is, however, quite likely that a naive reading of Homer will not correspond to its true meaning in any way. It is certainly not for nothing that people dedicate themselves to an exhaustive study of Homer's vocabulary in the hope of approximately situating the dimension of meaning at work in his poems in its proper place. But the fact is that the latter retain their meaning even though a good part of what is improperly called the mental world – which is the world of meanings – of Homeric heroes in all probability escapes us completely and most probably must escape us more or less definitively. The distance between the signifier and the signified makes it possible for us to understand that plausible meanings can always be attributed to a well-formed concatenation, which is precisely what characterizes poetry, probably down to the end of time.

I think I have covered just about everything that can be said about the phenomenon of the creation of witticisms in its own register. Perhaps this will mean we can more precisely formulate what is involved in the forgetting of a name, which I spoke about last week.

What is the forgetting of a name? In this case, there is the fact that the subject poses the question to the Other, and to the Other itself qua Other – 'Who painted the Orvieto frescoes?' And nothing comes to him.

I would like you to notice in this case the amount of care I am taking to give an accurate formulation. On the grounds that analysis reveals that the reason the subject doesn't come up with the name of the painter of the Orvieto frescoes is that 'Signor' is missing, you may think that it is 'Signor' that has been forgotten. This isn't true. It isn't 'Signor' he is looking for, but 'Signorelli', and it is 'Signorelli' that has been forgotten. 'Signor' is the repressed signifying scrap of something that occurs in the place in which 'Signorelli' isn't found.

Do understand the rigorous character of what I am telling you. Recalling 'Signorelli' and recalling 'Signor' are not the same thing. Once 'Signorelli' has become the name of a painter, one no longer thinks about 'Signor'. 'Signor' is detached here from 'Signorelli' by the action of decomposition characteristic of metaphor, and insofar as the name is caught up in the play of metaphor that resulted in its being forgotten.

Our analysis enables us to reconstruct the connection of 'Signor' with 'Herr' in a metaphorical creation that targets the meaning lying beyond 'Herr', which it assumed in the course of Freud's conversation with the person who was accompanying him on his little journey to the Bay of Kotor. 'Herr' became the symbol of the place at which his mastery as a physician fails, that of the absolute master, that is to say, of an ailment that he cannot cure – the patient committed suicide despite his efforts – and, in short, of the death and impotence that threaten him, Freud, personally. It was in the metaphorical creation that the shattering of 'Signorelli' occurred, and this made it possible for the 'Signor' element to go elsewhere. One should therefore not say that it was 'Signor' that was forgotten, when it was 'Signorelli'. 'Signor' is what we find at the level of the metaphorical waste product, qua repressed. 'Signor' was repressed, but it was not forgotten. It doesn't have to be forgotten, since it did not exist beforehand.

If 'Signorelli' was so susceptible to fragmentation and 'Signor' to becoming detached, it was because for Freud 'Signorelli' was a word in a foreign language. It is striking – you will easily observe this even if you have only the slightest experience with foreign languages – that you much more easily discern the component parts of signifiers in another language than your own. When you start to learn a language you become aware of the rules for the composition of words – which you overlook in your own language. In your own language, you do not think of words by breaking them down into root and suffix, whereas you do it quite spontaneously when you learn a foreign language. It is for this reason that a foreign word is more easily fragmented and usable in its component signifiers than any given word of your own language. This merely helps the process along. It can occur with the words of your own language, but the reason Freud started with the forgetting of a foreign name is that the example was readily available and conclusive.

What, then, is there in the place of the name 'Signorelli' that you do not find? An attempt at metaphorical creation was made in that place. What appears here as the forgetting of a name is what is appreciated in the place of 'famillionaire'. There would have been nothing there at all if Heinrich Heine had said, 'He received me as a complete equal, completely, . . . um . . . um.' This is precisely what happens at the level at which Freud is searching for the name 'Signorelli'. There is something that doesn't emerge, that isn't created. He is looking for 'Signorelli' and he looks for it unduly. Why? Because at the level at which he is looking for 'Signorelli', which he expects to be in that place because of the earlier conversation, what is called to that place is a metaphor that would mediate between the topic of the conversation as it is unfolding and what he rejects, namely death.

This is precisely what is involved when he turns his thoughts towards the frescoes at Orvieto, namely, what he himself calls the last things. What is called for is an eschatological elaboration, if one may use this term. This would be the only way in which he could broach this abhorrent and, as it were, unthinkable term in his thinking, which he has to dwell on because death exists and limits his being as a man as well as his action as a doctor and forms an absolutely irrefutable limit to all his thoughts. Now, no metaphor occurs to him on his way to expounding on these last things. Freud rejects all eschatology, except when it takes the form of his admiration for the painted frescoes at Orvieto. And nothing comes.

In the place where he looks for the painter – ultimately, it's about the painter, about naming the painter – nothing is produced, no metaphor succeeds and no equivalent to 'Signorelli' can be found. 'Signorelli' was called for at that moment in quite a different signifying form from that of a simple name. It was invited to enter 59 into play in the manner in which, in 'atterré', the root 'terre' fulfils its function – that is to say, it shatters and is elided. The existence somewhere of the term 'Signor' is the consequence of the unsuccessful metaphor that Freud appeals to for help at that moment and whose effects must be indicated on the schema at the level of the metonymic object.

Freud had no trouble retrieving from memory the object in question, the object that was represented or painted in the last things. 'Not only could I not find the name "Signorelli", but I have never visualized the Orvieto frescoes so clearly, and I am not particularly imaginative' [SE 3: 290–1]. We know that this is true from all sorts of other characteristics, from the form of his dreams for instance. And if Freud succeeded in making all these discoveries, it is most likely because he was much more open and permeable to symbolic play than to imaginary play. He himself notes the intensification of the image at the level of memory, the more intense recalling of the object in question, namely the painting, including the very image of Signorelli himself, who is there adopting the pose in which, in paintings of that period, the donors and sometimes the painter appear. Signorelli is in the painting, and Freud visualizes him.

There is, then, no forgetting pure and simple, no global forgetting of the object. There is, on the contrary, a relationship between the intense revivification of a number of its imaginary components and the loss of certain other components, which are signifying components at the symbolic level. We find here a sign of what is happening at the level of the metonymic object.

We can, then, formulate more or less as follows what happens when a name is forgotten:

$$\frac{X}{Signor} \cdot \frac{Signor}{Herr}$$

We rediscover here the formula for metaphor insofar as it operates by means of a mechanism of substituting one signifier S for another signifier S′. What is the consequence of this substitution? A change in meaning is produced at the level of S′ – the meaning of S′, say s′, becomes the new meaning, which we shall call s, insofar as it corresponds to big S. So as not to leave you in any doubt, for you might think that in this topology small s is the meaning of big S, I would add that the S has to have come into a relation with S′ in order for the little s to be able to produce, as such, what I will call s″. It is the creation of this meaning that is the aim of the functioning of a metaphor. A metaphor is always successful when, once it has been made, the terms are simplified and cancel one another out, just as when you multiply fractions. The meaning is produced at this moment, having entered into operation in the subject.

It is inasmuch as 'atterré' comes to signify what it signifies for us in practice, namely, more or less touched by terror, that 'terre' – which, on the one hand, serves as an intermediary between 'atterré' and 'abattu', and this is the most absolute distinction, for there is no reason for 'atterré' to replace 'abattu', and, on the other, contributes 'terreur' as a homonym – can be simplified on both sides. This phenomenon is similar to what occurs at the level of the forgetting of a name.

This isn't about the loss of the name 'Signorelli'. It's about the loss of an X that I am introducing here because we are going to learn how to recognize it and make use of it. This X marks the appeal to signifying creation. We will come across its place in the economy of other unconscious formations. To tell you what it is straightaway, it is what happens at the level of what we call desire in a dream. We see it here, in a straightforward manner, in the place where Freud should have found 'Signorelli'.

Freud finds nothing there, not just because 'Signorelli' has disappeared, but because at this level he would have had to create something that corresponded to what for him is in question, namely, the last things. Insofar as this X is present, a metaphorical formation tends to be produced, and we see this in the fact that the term

'Signor' appears at the level of two opposed signifying terms. The value S′ is there twice, and it is as such that it undergoes repression. Nothing is produced at the level of the X, which is why Freud doesn't find the name, and why 'Herr' plays the role and occupies the place of the metonymic object, the object that cannot be named and that is only named through its connections. Death is the absolute Herr. But when one speaks of Herr, one isn't speaking about death, because one cannot speak of death and because death is very precisely both the limit of all speech and probably also the place in which it originates.

There you have what it leads to, then, when you relate the formation of witticisms point by point to this unconscious formation whose form you can now see better. It looks negative. In fact, it isn't negative. The forgetting of a name isn't simply a negation, it is a lack, but – we always tend to go too fast – the lack of a name. It isn't because the name isn't grasped that there is a lack. No, the lack is the lack of this name.

Searching for the name, we encounter a lack in the place where it should be serving its function and can no longer serve it, for a new 61 meaning is required, one that demands a new metaphorical creation. This is why 'Signorelli' was not recovered, but, on the contrary, one encounters fragments there where they have to be recovered in the analysis, where they play the function of the second term in the metaphor, namely the term that is elided in metaphor.

This might sound like gobbledygook, but it doesn't matter so long as you simply let yourselves be carried along by what appears. It may sound like gobbledygook to you, but it is rich in consequences. If you remember it when you need to remember it, you will be able to shed light on what occurs in the analysis of this or that unconscious formation and explain it in a satisfactory manner. On the other hand, by eliding it and not taking it into account, you are led to entifications that are summary and crude and, if not constantly producing mistakes, at least to sustaining mistakes in word identification that play such an important role in the construction of a certain psychology, a feeble one at that.

Let's return to our witticism and to what we should make of it. To conclude, I want to introduce a distinction that returns to where I started, namely, the question of the subject.

Thought is always led back to making the subject the person who is designated as such in discourse. I would observe that there is another term opposed to this one. It is the opposition between what I will call the speaking present [le dire du présent] and the present speaking [le présent du dire].

This looks like a play on words. It's nothing of the sort.

'The speaking present' refers to what says 'I' in discourse. Along with a series of other particles – 'here', 'now' and other taboo words in our psychoanalytic vocabulary – it serves to locate the presence of the speaker in discourse, to situate him in his actuality as speaker at the level of the message.

You need only the slightest experience of language to see that the present speaking – namely, what is there, now, in discourse – is a completely different thing. The present speaking can be read in all sorts of modes and registers and has no in-principle relationship with the present insofar as it is designated in the discourse as the present of the person who is enunciating the discourse, who is variable, and where the words for it have only the value of a particle. 'I' has no more value than 'here' or 'now'. The proof of this is that when you, my interlocutor, speak to me of 'here' or 'now', you are 62 not speaking of the same 'here' or 'now' as I am. In any case, your I is clearly not the same as mine.

I am going to give you an illustration of the present speaking straightaway by means of the shortest witticism I know, which introduces us to another dimension than the metaphorical dimension.

The latter dimension corresponds to condensation. I spoke to you a little while ago about displacement, which is what the metonymic dimension corresponds to. The reason I haven't explored it yet is that it is much more difficult to grasp, but this witticism is particularly well suited to give you a sense of it.

The metonymic dimension, insofar as it makes a contribution to witticisms, plays upon contexts and usage. It operates by associating elements already preserved in the treasure trove of metonymies. A word may be linked in different ways in different contexts, and this will give it two completely different meanings. By using it in a certain context with the meaning it has in another, we are in the metonymic dimension.

I will give you a prime example in the form of a witticism that I will let you think about before I discuss it.

Heinrich Heine is with the poet Frédéric Soulié at a salon, and the latter says to him, talking about a person who was rolling in money, a character who occupied an important position at the time, as you can see, and who was very popular, 'You see, my friend, the cult of the Golden Calf isn't yet over.' 'Oh!' Heinrich Heine replies after looking the person over, 'For a calf he strikes me as being a bit past it.'

That's an example of a metonymic witticism. I will dissect it next time, but already you can see that it is a witticism insofar as the word 'calf' is being used, and uniquely being used, in two different metonymic contexts. It adds nothing to the signification of the witticism to say what it means, namely that the person is a cow. It's amusing to say this, but it is a witticism only insofar as, from one reply to the next, 'calf' is used in two different contexts.

It can be demonstrated ultra-quickly that witticisms operate at the level of the play of signifiers.

A young woman in the making, in whom we can recognize all the qualities of a true education – one that consists in her not using but knowing vulgar language – is invited to her first surprise party
63 by a ladies' man, who, after a moment of bored silence, says to her during a dance that has, moreover, not yet ended, 'Vous avez vu, mademoiselle, que je suis comte.' 'You have noticed, Mademoiselle, that I am a count.' 'Ahhht!' she simply replies [thereby highlighting that a 'comte' without a 't' is a 'con', an idiot].

You won't have read this story in any of the small, specialist collections. Perhaps you will have heard it directly from the mouth of the young woman herself, who was quite pleased with herself, I have to say. But the nature of the story is exemplary nonetheless, for it is the incarnation par excellence of what I have been calling the speaking present. There is no 'I', the I isn't named. Nothing exemplifies the speaking present, as opposed to the present speaking, more than a pure and simple exclamation. Exclamations are paradigmatic of the presence of discourse insofar as the person whose discourse it is completely effaces his own present. His present is, if I may say so, retained entirely in the present of discourse.

However, at the level of creation, this subject displays great presence of mind, since something like that isn't premeditated, it just pops out like that, and that's how you recognize that someone is witty. She makes a simple modification to the code which consists in adding a small 't' to it, which draws its value from the context, if I can put it like that – namely, that the count doesn't make her content, apart from the fact that the count, if he is, as I say, so little pleasing, may notice nothing. This trait is therefore completely gratuitous, but nonetheless you see the elementary mechanism of wit here, namely that this slight transgression of the code is, all by itself, taken as a new value enabling the required meaning to be created instantaneously.

What is this meaning? It may seem to you that it is not in doubt, but, after all, this well-bred young woman doesn't tell her count that he was what he was minus a 't'. She tells him nothing of the kind. The meaning to be created remains suspended somewhere between the ego and the Other. This is an indication that something remains to be desired, at least for the moment. Moreover, the text isn't at all transposable – if the text had said that he was a Marquis, this creation would not have been possible. According to the good old formula that apparently gave our fathers such pleasure last century, you would ask, 'How are you?', and you would give the [meaningless] reply, 'Et toile à matelas!' It was best not to reply, 'Et toile à édredon!' You'll tell me they were days of simple pleasures.

'Ahhht!' – there you have wit in its shortest, undeniably phonematic form. This is the shortest composition that you can give a phoneme. Two distinctive traits are required, the shortest formula of a phoneme being this – either a consonant following a vowel or a vowel following a consonant. A consonant following a vowel is the classic formula, and that is what we find here. This is enough to 64 construct an utterance having the value of a message, insofar as it makes a paradoxical reference to actual word usage, and provided that it directs the Other's thoughts to an instantaneous grasp of the meaning.

That's what we call being witty. It is also what primes the properly combinatory element on which all metaphors rely. If I have spoken extensively about metaphor today, again it is by mapping out the mechanism of substitution. The mechanism has the four terms I gave you in 'The Instance of the Letter'. It is uniquely, at least in its form, the essential operation of intelligence, which consists in formulating the correlate of a proportion established with an X.

An intelligence test is perhaps nothing but that. It's just that it isn't enough just to say that man differs from animals by his intelligence. Perhaps man does differ from animals by his intelligence, but perhaps in this fact the introduction of signifying formulations was primordial.

To put in its proper place the question of men's supposed intelligence as the source of their reality plus X, you would have to start by asking yourself this – intelligence with respect to what? What is there to understand? Where the real is concerned, is it so much a question of understanding? If it is purely and simply about a relationship to reality, surely our discourse must come to the point of re-establishing it in its existence as reality, that is, it must, strictly speaking, culminate in nothing. Moreover, this is what discourse does in general. If we arrive at something else, if one can even speak about a story culminating in knowledge of some kind, it is inasmuch as discourse has brought about an essential transformation.

That is what it's about, and perhaps it's quite simply about these four small terms linked together in a particular way, by what are called 'relations of proportion'. Once again we have a tendency to entify these relations. We believe that we find them in objects. But where in objects are these relations of proportion, if we haven't introduced them with the help of our little signifiers?

It remains the case that the very possibility of metaphorical play is founded on the existence of having something to substitute. The basis for this is the signifying chain as the principle of combination and locus of metonymy.

This is what I will attempt to elaborate next time.

Maupassant's double vision
Fénéon's decentring

We left things last time at the point where I showed you the mainspring of one form of witticism, in what I call the metaphorical function, and was about to take up a second aspect in the register of the metonymic function.

You might be surprised at this way of going about it, consisting as it does in starting off with an example and then gradually developing functional relations which as a result do not seem to possess any general relationship to the matter at hand. It stems from a necessity inherent in our subject, whose palpable element I will have an opportunity to show you. Let's say that everything that is at the level of the unconscious insofar as it is structured by language confronts us with the following phenomenon – it is neither the genre nor the class but only specific examples that enable us to grasp the most significant properties.

This is an inversion of our usual analytic perspective – analytic in the sense of the analysis of mental functions. It could be called a failure of the concept, in the abstract sense of the term. More precisely, we need to find another way of grasping it than grasping it conceptually. This is what I was alluding to when I mentioned Mannerism one day, and this feature is entirely appropriate in our field. Given the terrain over which we roam, we're obliged to proceed by misusing concepts rather than using them – and this is due to the domain in which the structurations in question move.

Since the term 'prelogical' is liable to create confusion, I recommend you cross it off your list of categories in advance, given what it's been turned into – namely, a psychological property. We're dealing here with structural properties of language, which are prior 66 to any question that we can put to language about the legitimacy of any aim that it, language, suggests to us. As you know, this is just what philosophers have made the object of anxious enquiry, owing to which we have come to a sort of compromise that goes more or less as follows – if language shows that we can hardly say anything about anything unless it's a being of language, it is with the aim of bringing about a 'for-us' that can be called 'objectivity'. This is undoubtedly a bit too swift as a way of summarizing the entire enterprise that goes from formal logic to transcendental logic, but it is just intended to tell you at the outset that we place ourselves in a different field.

When Freud speaks about the unconscious, he doesn't say that it is structured in a certain way, but he says it nevertheless, inasmuch as the laws that he proposes, the compositional laws of the unconscious, exactly match some of the most fundamental laws of the composition of discourse. Also, all sorts of elements involved in ordinary discourse are missing from the way in which the unconscious is articulated – the link of causality, he tells us, concerning dreams, or negation, and then he returns to it immediately afterwards and shows us that it finds expression in the dream in some other way. This is the field that is already circled, defined, circumscribed, explored and even ploughed by Freud. This is what we are returning to in trying to formulate – let's go even further – in trying to formalize what a moment ago I called the primordial structuring laws of language.

If there's anything that the Freudian experience tells us, it is that we are determined by laws in the very depths of ourselves, as we rightly or wrongly say, adopting an image – let's simply say, at the level of what lies within us beyond our conceptual grasp of ourselves, beyond the idea that we have of ourselves and draw upon, that we hold onto more or less well, and that we sometimes hasten a little too prematurely to make our fate by speaking of synthesis and total personality. And let's not forget that these are all terms that are precisely subject to challenge by the Freudian experience.

Indeed, Freud teaches us – and I will have to make this a signed frontispiece – about the distance, the gap even, that exists between the structuring of desire and the structuring of needs. And while Freudian experience has come to the point of referring to a metapsychology of needs, this certainly has nothing self-evident about it, and one might even describe it as unexpected in relation to what 67 is most obvious, for the entire experience instituted and defined by Freud shows, at every turn, to what extent the structure of desires is determined by something other than needs. Needs only come to us refracted, broken and fragmented, and they are structured precisely by all these mechanisms like condensation, displacement and so on, according to the manifestations of psychical life in which they are reflected – mechanisms which presuppose still other intermediaries and mechanisms in which we recognize a number of the laws that we will come to before the end of the Seminar this year, and which I call laws of the signifier.

These laws prevail here, and in witticisms we learn about a certain way of using them, in a kind of mental game, with the question mark that introducing the term 'esprit' calls for. What is 'esprit'? What is 'ingenius' in Latin? What is 'ingenio' in Spanish, since I referred to the concept? What is this thing that intervenes here and is different from the function of judgement? We can only work out its place once we have spelled out and clarified the method. What is this method? What is its basic aim?

We have already emphasized the ambiguity of witticisms and slips, a basic and in some way constitutive ambiguity. Depending on the circumstances, what is produced may tend towards the sort of psychological accident that slips are, by which we would remain perplexed without Freud's analysis, or rather, on the contrary, it may be taken up and ratified as having been heard by the Other at the level of a specific signifying value – such as the one that has been acquired by the neologistic, paradoxical and scandalous term, 'famillionaire'. The specific signifying function of this word is to designate not only this or that but also some sort of beyond. What is fundamental in what is signified here isn't linked solely to the impasse in the subject's relations with his millionaire protector. We're faced with a certain relationship that fails, with what introduces, into ongoing human relationships, a type of essential impasse that resides in the fact that no desire can ever be received or admitted by the Other save through all sorts of interventions that refract it and turn it into something other than what it is, an object of exchange, and, frankly, right from the outset, submit the process of making a demand to the necessity of refusal.

I will take the liberty of introducing the actual level at which this question arises of translating a demand into an utterance which has an effect by recounting an amusing if not witty story whose register extends well beyond a small, momentary laugh. It's the story that you are all no doubt familiar with about the masochist and the sadist – 'Hurt me!' says the former to the latter, who replies, 'No!'

I see it doesn't make you laugh. No matter. Some people laugh, 68 though. In any case, the story isn't meant to make you laugh. I simply ask you to notice that something unfolds at a level that has nothing witty about it. Effectively, who are better made for one another than the masochist and the sadist? Sure – but, as you can see from this little story, they get along as long as they don't speak to one another.

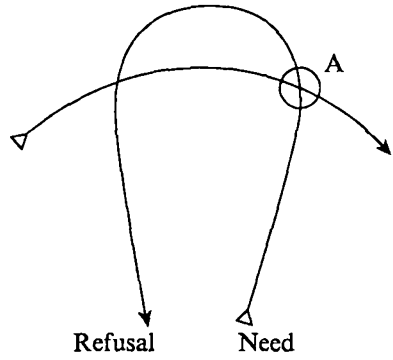
It isn't out of spite that the sadist answers, 'No'. His response is a feature of his sadistic character. And as soon as one has spoken he is obliged to reply at the level of speech. Therefore, inasmuch as we have moved onto the level of speech, what should result in the most profound understanding leads to what a moment ago I called the dialectic of refusal that is necessary for sustaining what, in its essence as demand, manifests itself through speech.



In other words, as you can observe in this schema, there is a symmetry between the two elements of the circuit – a closed loop, which is the circle of discourse, and an open loop. Something is uttered by the subject and, coming to the point at which there is a bifurcation at A, it loops back upon itself as an articulated sentence, a ring of discourse [see graph, p. 10]. On the other hand, if what is presented as a demand doesn't respect the essential symmetry I was talking about and describes a circuit that goes directly from his need to the object of his desire, then the sentence ends on a 'No'. Let's say that need, if we locate it at the point delta prime, necessarily encounters the Other's response, which for the moment we'll call a 'refusal'.

What is presented here merely as a paradox, which only our schema makes it possible to locate, no doubt deserves to be gone into in more detail. Let's now return to the chain of our propositions about the different phases of a witticism.

Today, then, I'll introduce the metonymic phase.

To give you an immediate idea of it, I gave you an example in the form of a story where you can see everything that differentiates it from 'famillionaire'. There is, then, a dialogue between Heinrich Heine and the poet Frédéric Soulié, almost his contemporary, which is recounted in Kuno Fischer's book, which was, I believe, reasonably well known at the time. A group gathers in a salon around an elderly gentleman basking in the reflected aura of his financial power. 'Look!' says Frédéric Soulié to someone who was barely his senior, and whom he admired, 'Look how the nineteenth century worships the Golden Calf!' To which Heinrich Heine replies, looking with a disdainful eye at the object drawn to his attention, 'Yes, but this one strikes me as a bit old for that' [SE 8: 47–8].

What does this witticism signify? What gives it its bite? What is its mainspring?

On the topic of witticisms, Freud, as you know, places us on this level from the outset – witticisms are to be sought where they are, namely, in their text. Nothing is more striking – this man who has been attributed with being a genius at probing what lies beyond, as it were, psychological hypotheses, always sets out on the contrary from the opposite point, namely the materiality of signifiers, treating them as a given, existing in and for themselves. We have a clear example in his analysis of witticisms. Not only does he consistently begin with a technique, but he has confidence that the elements of his technique will uncover the mainspring.

What is the first thing he does? He proceeds to carry out what he calls an attempt at reduction. If we translate the wit of 'famillionaire' into its expanded sense, decompose what it involves and then read the elements – that is, if we say, 'as familiar as one can be with a millionaire' – everything belonging to the witticism vanishes or disappears. This shows clearly that what is at issue lies in the relationship between the fundamental ambiguity specific to metaphor and the function that a signifier acquires when it is substituted for another signifier, one that is latent in the chain through positional similarity or simultaneity.

Having started by examining witticisms at the metaphorical level, Freud finds himself faced with a new variety with the story of the Golden Calf, where one can sense a difference and, as he isn't one to spare us the detours of his approach to the phenomena, he tells us to think about describing it as a 'conceptual joke' as opposed to a 'verbal joke'. But he soon realizes that this distinction is totally inadequate, and that, here, what one should rely on is what is called 70 the form, namely the combining of signifiers. He therefore undertakes anew to submit the example in question to the technique of reduction, making it accountable for what is subjacent to this debatable form, namely subjective agreement that it is a witticism. He encounters something here that doesn't yield to analysis in the same way 'famillionaire' does.

Sharing each of his approaches in his thinking with us, he pauses for a moment – following Kuno Fischer who remained at this level – at the protasis, that is, at the contribution by Heine's interlocutor, Frédéric Soulié. He detects something metaphorical in the Golden Calf and, to be sure, the expression does have a double value – on the one hand, as a symbol of intrigue and, on the other, as a symbol of the power of money. Does this mean that this gentleman receives all these tributes because he is rich? Wouldn't this obscure the mainspring of what this is about? Freud quickly becomes aware of what is fallacious in such an approach. The richness of this example deserves close scrutiny.

It is certain that in what we are initially given to set the scene for this Golden Calf the notion of the matter is implicated. Without going into how all the verbal uses of this undeniably metaphorical term came to be established, suffice it to say that, while the Golden Calf has the closest of relations with the relationship between signifiers and images that forms the aspect under which idolatry effectively comes to be established, ultimately it is only located within a perspective where being recognized by the god who announces himself as 'I am that I am' – namely, the god of the Jews – demands that one renounce not only idolatry pure and simple, that is, the worship of statues, but also, subsequently, the naming, par excellence, of every imaged hypostasis – that is, the renunciation of what presents itself as the very origin of signifiers, and this in order to seek their essential beyond the refusal of which is precisely what gives the Golden Calf its value.

Thus, it is only through what is already a shift that the Golden Calf comes to acquire a metaphorical use. The topical regression that from a religious perspective is involved in substituting the imaginary for the symbolic, which underpins the idolatry, secondarily acquires the metaphorical value of expressing what people other than I have called the fetishistic value of gold, which I do not mention without reason here, since precisely this fetishistic function – we will have to come back to this – is itself only conceivable in the signifying dimension of metonymy.

Here, then, we have the Golden Calf laden with all the intrications 71 and entanglements of the symbolic function with the imaginary. Is this where the Witz resides? No. This isn't at all the place where it is located. The witticism, as Freud is aware, is in Heinrich Heine's riposte, and the latter at least consists precisely in subverting, if not annulling, all the references that underpin the metaphor of the Golden Calf, designating him as someone who is suddenly reduced to the quality of being no more than a vealer worth [un veau qui vaut] so much the pound. Suddenly, this calf is taken for what it is, a living being that the market, itself effectively instituted through the reign of gold, reduces to being only sold as stock, a head of cattle, whereby it is possible to emphasize that he is clearly no longer under the age limit for a vealer – which, according to the definition that Littré gives, is a calf in its first year, and which a butchery purist would define as a calf that has not stopped suckling its mother, 'a calf under its mother'. I allowed myself to say that only in France is this purism respected.

There is no way of reducing the fact that this calf isn't a calf, or that this calf is a bit old to be a calf. With or without the Golden Calf in the background, it's still a witticism. Freud thus grasps a difference between the story about the famillionaire and this one – the first is analysable, the second is unanalysable. And yet they're both witticisms. What does this mean if not that these are undoubtedly two separate dimensions of the experience of witticisms? What is present here, as Freud himself tells us, looks like sleight of hand, a trick or faulty reasoning. Yet it's a trait common to an entire category of witticisms distinct from the category in which famillionaire is inscribed and in which one takes, as one might crudely put it, a word in a different sense from the sense in which it was intended.

Another story belonging to the same category as the Golden Calf refers to the confiscation by Napoleon III of all the property of the house of Orléans when he ascended to the throne. 'It's the first flight [vol] of the Eagle,' someone said, and everyone was delighted with its ambiguity; there was no need to spell it out. Here, there's no question of speaking of a witticism of thought, since it is a witticism of words based on the ambiguity that enables us to take a word in a different sense.

It is, moreover, potentially amusing to probe into what underlies such words and, because this word is recorded in French, Freud takes care to specify the double meaning of 'vol' as action, as the means of locomotion of birds, and as the removal, abduction or theft of property. It's good to bear in mind what Freud elides here – I am not saying he was unaware of it – which is that one of the meanings was historically borrowed from the other and that towards the thirteenth or fourteenth century the term 'volerie' [hunting with birds] had passed from the usage whereby a falcon or a quail flies [vole], to 72 the usage that designates this violation of one of the essential laws of property, known as theft [vol].

This was no accident. I'm not saying it occurs in every language, but it had already occurred in Latin, where 'volare' took on the same meaning from the same origin. I take this opportunity to stress something which isn't unrelated to what we are familiar with, namely what I will call the euphemistic modes of expressing what, in speech, represents the 'violation' [viol] of one's word or a contract. It's not for nothing that the word 'viol' is borrowed from the register of an abduction [rapt] which has nothing to do with what we properly and juridically call theft [vol].

Let's leave it there and return to why I introduce the term 'metonymy' here.

Beyond these elusive ambiguities of meaning, I think we effectively need to search for another reference if we are to define this second register of witticisms, unify its mechanism with the first kind and locate their common mainspring. Freud shows us the way without quite finding the formula for it.

What point would there be in talking about Freud if we didn't try to derive the maximum benefit from what he contributed? It's up to us to move it along a little further by giving it this formalization, and our experience will tell us whether it is right and whether this is the right direction for organizing the phenomena.

It's a question that is rich with consequences, not only for everything concerning our therapeutics but also for our conception of modes of the unconscious. It is absolutely decisive whether there is a particular structure, whether this structure is the structure of signifiers and whether the latter imposes its grid on everything that has to do with human needs.

I have already presented metonymy on several occasions, most notably in the article called 'The Instance of the Letter in the Unconscious' [Écrits, 412–41]. There I deliberately gave an example drawn from our common experience of grammar that draws on your memories of your secondary-school studies. No one could say that you were exactly filled to the brim with the study of the figures of rhetoric – in actual fact, no great fuss has been made of them till now. Metonymy was at the time relegated to the end, under the auspices of a much-underrated Quintilian. Nonetheless, given the point 73 we're at with respect to our conception of forms of discourse, I took 'thirty sails', spoken in the place of 'thirty ships'. There's a literary background to this choice, since, as you are aware, these thirty sails can be found in a certain monologue in Le Cid, a reference we'll perhaps do something with later.

In 'thirty sails' it's not simply a matter of taking the part for the whole, as you've been told with reference to the real, for it is rarely the case that ships have only one sail. We don't know what to do with these thirty sails – either there are thirty of them and there aren't thirty ships, or there are thirty ships and there are more than thirty sails. That is why I say one has to refer to the word-for-word [mot-à-mot] correspondence. That said, I am only presenting you with the problematic aspect of the thing, to be sure, and we need to go deeper into the nature of how it differs from metaphor – for you could say to me that it really is a metaphor. Why isn't it one? Indeed, that is the question.

For a while now I have been hearing from time to time that some of you, in the course of your everyday life, are suddenly struck by encountering something you no longer know whether to classify as metaphor or as metonymy. This is sometimes followed by some excessive disturbance in your organism, a sharp rolling from the port of metaphor to the starboard of metonymy, causing some of you to feel a bit seasick. I've also been told, in connection with Booz, that 'His sheaf was neither miserly nor hateful', which I presented to you as a metaphor, could actually be a metonymy. Still, I think that in my article I clearly showed what this sheaf is, and how much it is something other than part of his property. Insofar as it is precisely a substitute for the father, it brings out the entire dimension of biological fecundity that underlies the spirit of the poem, and it's no accident that on the horizon and further out, in the firmament, the sharp cutting edge of the celestial sickle emerges, evoking castration in the background.

Let's return to our thirty sails and try to pinpoint, once and for all, what it is that I'm calling the metonymic function.

Concerning metaphor, I think I've sufficiently stressed, though not without leaving a number of puzzles, that substitution is its structural source. Metaphor is the result of the function that is brought to a signifier S insofar as this signifier is substituted for another in a signifying chain.

As for metonymy, it is the result of the function that a signifier S adopts when it relates to another signifier along the length of the sig- 74 nifying chain. The function that a sail has in relation to a ship exists along the signifying chain and not in reference to the real – along the length of the chain and not in a substitution. It's thus a question, in the clearest way, of the transfer of signification along the chain.

This is why formal representations or formulas are always liable to place extra demands on you. Someone recently reminded me that at one time I said I was seeking to devise a rubber logic for you to use. It's actually something like that that is involved here. This topographical structuring invariably leaves gaps because it's made up of these ambiguities. Let me say in passing that this is unavoidable.

Then again, if we do manage to develop this topographical structuring well enough, we won't be able to avoid a remainder of extra requirements, no matter how much a univocal formalization is an ideal for you – if indeed a univocal formalization is an ideal for you at all – for some ambiguities are irreducible to the level of the structure of language that we're trying to define.

Let me also say in passing that the notion of metalanguage is very often employed in the most inadequate of fashions, insofar as people misrecognize the following – either a metalanguage has formal requirements that displace the total structuring phenomenon in which it has to be situated, or the metalanguage itself conserves the ambiguities of language. In other words, there is no such thing as a metalanguage, there are formalizations – either at the level of logic, or at the level of this signifying structure whose autonomous level I've been trying to uncover for you. There is no such thing as a metalanguage in the sense in which it would mean, for example, a complete mathematization of the phenomenon of language, and this is so precisely because there's no way of formalizing any further than what's given as the primitive structure of language. Still, not only can this formalization be demanded, it is necessary.

It's necessary here, for instance. In effect, the notion of the substitution of one signifier for another requires that its place already be defined. This is a positional substitution, and position requires a signifying chain, that is, a combinatory succession. I'm not saying it requires every one of its features. I'm saying that this combinatory succession is characterized by elements I will call, for instance, intransitivity, alternation and repetition.

If we go into the constitution of a signifying chain at this original, minimal level, we'll end up a long way off today's topic. There 75 are minimal requirements. I'm not saying I claim to have completely got to them all yet, although I have already given you enough for me to suggest some formulas as a basis for some reflection drawn on particular examples – which, in this domain and no doubt for essential reasons, we must draw upon for all our teachings.

We will proceed in this way once again, observing, even if this sounds like a play on words, that these sails [voiles] veil [voilent] our view, every bit as much as they designate that they don't enter with their full rights as sails, at full sail, into the use we are putting them to. These are sails that rarely slacken. What is reduced in their scope and in their sign can be rediscovered if one evokes 'a village of thirty souls', where the souls are placed there for the shadows of what they represent, lighter than a term suggesting an excessive presence of inhabitants. As in the title of a famous novel, rather than being beings who are not there, these souls may be dead souls. Similarly,

'thirty fires' [for thirty households] also represents a certain degradation or minimization of meaning, for these fires are as much extinguished fires as they are fires about which we say there is no smoke without fire – and it's not for nothing that these fires reappear in a usage that says metonymically what it is that they stand in for.

You will tell me no doubt that I am relying on a reference to meaning to show the difference. I don't believe so, and I'd point out to you that what I started from is the following – metonymy is the fundamental structure within which something new and creative, which is metaphor, can be produced. Even if something of metonymic origin is placed in the position of substitution, as in the case of 'thirty sails', it's different from a metaphor. In short, there would be no metaphor if there were no metonymy.

The chain in which the position at which the metaphorical phenomenon occurs is defined is in a sort of shifting or equivocation where metonymy is concerned. 'There would be no metaphor if there were no metonymy' comes back to me as an echo, and not by chance by any means, of the comic invocation Jarry puts into the mouth of Father Ubu, 'Long live Poland, for without Poland there'd be no Poles!' This is the very essence of our subject. It's a witticism and – this is what's funny – it refers precisely to the metonymic function. You'd be on the wrong track if you thought that what's funny here relates to, for instance, the role the Poles have played in the misfortunes of Poland, which are only too well known. It's just as funny if I say, 'Long live France, Monsieur, for without France there would be no French!' Similarly, if I say, 'Long live Christianity, because without Christianity there'd be no Christians!' 76
And even, 'Long live Christ!', and so on.

One cannot fail to recognize the metonymic dimension in these examples. Every relationship of derivation and every use of a suffix or an ending in inflected languages uses the contiguity of the chain for signifying purposes. The aphasic's experience is indicative here, for instance. There are precisely two types of aphasia, and when we're at the level of disturbances of contiguity – that is, of the metonymic function – the subject has the greatest difficulty with the relation between words and adjectives, between 'benefit' or 'beneficence' and 'beneficent' and also 'benefaction'. It's here in the metonymic Other that this lightning flash occurs, casting a light that's not only comical but also rather farcical.

It's important to try to grasp the signifying chain's properties, and I've tried to find some terms of reference that make it possible to grasp what I would like to describe as the effect of the signifying chain, an effect inherent in its nature as signifying chain, and which one may call its meaning.

Last year, it was by means of an analogical reference – it might have seemed metaphorical to you, but I stressed that it wasn't and that it was intended to be taken to the letter of the metonymic chain – that I situated the essence of all fetishistic displacements of desire, its fixation, in other words, before, after or alongside, or at any rate on the threshold of, its natural object. This was about establishing the fundamental phenomenon that we can call the radical perversion of human desires.

I would now like to indicate another dimension of the metonymic chain, which I will call the sliding of meaning. I've already pointed out how it is related to the literary procedure typically referred to by the term 'realism'.

There is no reason why one cannot have all sorts of experiences in this domain, and I subjected myself to the experience of taking a novel from the realist period and rereading it to see what features might help you grasp the original something that the metonymic use of the signifying chain introduces into the dimension of meaning. Thus, I turned, at random, to a novel by Maupassant, Bel-Ami.

It makes for pleasant reading. Try it some time. Having made 77 a start, I was quite surprised to find in it what I'm attempting to designate here when I talk about sliding. We see our hero, Georges Duroy, setting out from the top of the rue Notre-Dame-de-Lorette.

> When the woman behind the till had given him the change for his five-franc piece, Georges Duroy left the restaurant. A good-looking man, with the poise of an ex-cavalry N.C.O., he drew himself up, twirled his moustache with a familiar military gesture, and quickly glanced around at the remaining diners with one of those looks of a handsome young man on the lookout for prey. [p.105]

That is how the novel begins. It doesn't seem like much, but it goes on from one moment to the next, from one encounter to another, and you witness, in the clearest of ways, a sort of shift. This shift carries off a fairly basic being, I would say, if we think of him at the point to which he has been reduced at the beginning of the novel, because this five-franc piece is all he has left. It gradually leads this being, then, who has been reduced to the most direct of needs, to an immediate preoccupation with love and hunger, into a series of good and bad incidents, but generally good, for he's not only a handsome fellow, but a lucky one. It places him in a circle, a system of displays of exchange, in which the metonymic subversion of
